AMERICA

April 1916

3. War Finances in England
" Mexico.
5 An Irish Centenary
6. Our Boys. 54, 128
8. Shakespeare
10 A Roman Holiday.
13. 4×3=12
17 Cervantes.
21. Education

April 22nd.

29. The Paschal Message
31. Shakespeare's Religion
32. The Drama League
34. The Thrift of Thought
35. Wilfrid Ward
38. Human Vivisection
41. The Man of the Mask
45 Dangers of Secular Universities. 69.

April 29th.

53. The Popes & Peace. 80. 102.
55. Suggestion in Youth.
57. Easter Laughter
62. Personal Practical Work
64. Godless New York
65. Lionel Johnson
70. Her Place in the World.
77. Catholic Charities. &c 101. 125.
79 Spring & the Story of God.
81. Simplicity of Life.
89 The Fragrant Stars
93 Catholic Authors in Training Schools

May 13th

104 The Rosary of a Parish Priest
105 The Silver Wedding Ring
107 Irish Priests & their Flocks. 130.
111 The new Criminology
113 Father Prout.
117 The Kindergarten.
" Paganizing Charity.

123 Ireland
126 Novel Reading.
134 Investigators & Persecutors
136 Bible Societies
137 Robert Hugh Benson
141 Going to College

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

OCTOBER 14, 1916

VOLUME FIFTEEN

1916

FROM APRIL 15 TO OCTOBER 7, 1916, INCLUSIVE

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL
OF RELIGION

SECTION TWO

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

V.15
1916

72320

INDEX

VOLUME XV—APRIL 15 TO OCTOBER 7, 1916, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

Acknowledgment, A Brave (Ed.), Religious Education ... 428
Advertisers, The Veracious (Ed.) ... 63
"Agenics" ... 249
All's Well ... 589
Anne, St., A Candle to ... 563
"Anti-Americans," Native Born (Ed.) ... 404
Anti-Catholicism, Data on, 369; The Philosophy of ... 346
Apologetics in Fiction Form (Ed.) ... 212
"As Those Who Won't See" ... 614
Attendance at Church (Ed.) ... 355

Baptists' Queen of Whistlers, The (Ed.) .. 38
Barclay Street, The Genesis of ... 420
Beam and the Mote, The (Ed.) ... 40
Belloc, Hilaire: A Little Appreciation ... 11
Bible Society, The American Centenary (Ed.) 136
Birth-Control, Concerning ... 418
Body and Mind: Some Contrasts ... 252
Bored, Enter the ... 590
Boys of Our City: Cincinnati, 7; Boston, 54; St. Louis, 128; San Francisco ... 251
Boys, Our (Ed.) ... 331
Boy Problem, A Solution for the ... 321
Brindle, Bishop Robert ... 345
Business Man, A Catholic (Ed.), (Patrick T. Walsh) ... 10

Caliban by the Yellow Sands, Shakespeare Masque ... 184
Carranza, Mr. (Ed.) ... 210
Casement's Execution (Ed.) ... 420
Cathedrals to Pray In (Ed.) ... 499
Catholic, A "Practical" (Ed.), 187; Landmarks of Cincinnati, 207; Hospital Conference (Ed.), 86; History, A Crisis in (Ed.), 260; Lawyers and Reading, 275; Physicians and Reading, 397; The End Seat (Ed.), 112; Week and Federation Convention, 490; Trade Unionists Surrender, Will? (Ed.) ... 547
Charity of a Catholic Monarch, The ... 255
Censorship, Do We Need a? (Ed.) ... 597
Centenary, A Great Sodality's ... 155
Chancellor and the Dublin Weaver, The ... 466
Character and Temperament ... 469
Charities Investigation, 77; Inspiration of the, 101; The Hearings, 125; The Testimony, 149; Bishop Burgess and the Investigators (Ed.), 159; A Mayor, a Church, a Conspiracy, 173; An Oliver Twist School, 179; (Ed.), 282; A Dominican Convent, A School for Drudges, 225; Pigs, Pans, Children (Ed.), 354; Leaks, Dangerous (Ed.), 355; How to Malign an Institution, 386; Some Notable Facts (Ed.), 402; Mr. Kingsbury's Child Placing Bureau, 409; New York Immortals, 40; Mayor Mitchel's "Conspiracy" Collapses ... 565
Child Labor Bill, The (Ed.) ... 452
Children, Base Use of (Charities Investigation, Ed.) ... 380
Chicago, The Gay Rule in (Ed.) ... 308
Children and Dangers (Ed.) ... 260
"Christianity," Modern ... 112
Church, Music, A Venture in, 129; Terms, Old Irish ... 576
Churches Closed in Summer (Ed.) ... 379
City Brides (Ed.) ... 187
Civil Engineering, The Young Man and 348
Cleverness, The Cult of ... 465
Commandments Shortened, The (Ed.) ... 547
Criminology, The New (Ed) ... 111
"Cur" of the North, The (Ed., Mexico) .. 405
"Cold Light" (Ed.) ... 356
College Indictment, A ... 274
Colleges, The Following (Ed.) ... 594
Coloe, Private, S. J. (Ed.) ... 476
Colors, Call to the ... 302
Concession, A, Indeed (Church and Sensationalism, Ed.) ... 426
Conference Evenings, People's (Ed.) ... 595
Contrast, A Study in ... 301

Damien, Father, Latest Champion of (Ed.) . 306
Davises, The Eye of the (Ed.) ... 236
Daylight Life, More ... 613
Decadence in America ... 561
Decency, Adventures in ... 493
Defense, The Line of (Military Training) .. 394
Devil and His Friends, The (Ed. Charities Investigation) ... 354
Devout, The Audibly (Ed.) ... 135

PAGE

Divorce, The Battle Against ... 178
Duffy, Charles Gavan, Centenary of ... 5
Duties to Things (Ed.) ... 111
Duty, Our (Ed.), (Foreign Missions) ... 450
Dogs and Disease ... 395
Don't ... 441
Drama League of America, The ... 32
Drink Traffic in England ... 519

Easter Laughter ... 54
Editor, The Cruelly Slandered (Ed.) .. 88
Electrical Engineering, The Young Man and. 447
English Labor Market, The War and the 612
Episcopalianism from Within ... 351
Episcopalian, What Is an (Ed.) ... 451
"Epistolegraphameleia" ... 403

Faith, A Lay Apostle of the ... 59
Faith or Tooth-Brushes (Panama Congress), (Ed.) ... 110
Fair Play (Indian Schools), (Ed.) ... 158
Fair Play (Ed. Anti-Catholic Legislation) .. 452
Father's Eye, For a ... 548
Federation, Catholic (Ed.), 474; Catholic Week ... 490
Flag, The Burned (Ed.) ... 211
Fear as an Immoral Issue ... 541
Fordham University, Diamond Jubilee, 205; School of Sociology (Ed.) ... 548
France Is Not Mad (Ed. Expatriating War Orphans) ... 14
French Prisoners of War, The ... 304
French Wounded Soldiers, Among the ... 231

Galileo Again (Ed.) ... 595
Glorious Fourth, The, in a Convent ... 324
Godliness and Persecution (Ed.) ... 403
Good Friday for Peace (Ed.) ... 14
Gospel at Atlantic City, The (Ed.) ... 186
Government by Rebellion (Ed.) ... 187
Graduate, The Sweet Girl ... 278
Great is Diana of the Ephesians (Efficiency Fad) ... 181
Greenbaum Decision, Notes on the (Ed.) ... 594
"Grinds," The Fate of (Ed.) ... 523

Haeckel as a Consoler (Ed.) ... 571
Hagiology and Spoon River (Ed.) 572
Hard, It's Too (Ed.) ... 160
Harpies and Their Traffic (Ed.) ... 474
Heaven, The Geography of ... 445
Herbermann, Charles George (Ed.) ... 498
"History Fabulous" (South America Slanders. Ed.) ... 86
Humor, Wit and Comedy ... 513

Individuality, Cultivating Their (Ed.) ... 618
Ignorance or Malice? (Ed.) ... 620
Infantile Paralysis ... 370
Ireland, May Days in (Ed.) ... 158
Irish Priests and Their Flocks ... 107-130
Irish Children, Appeal for (Ed.) ... 330
Immorality, Never "Beautiful" (Ed.) ... 499
Indian, The American (Ed.) ... 15
Infantile Paralysis (Ed.) ... 330
Infectious Diseases, Artificial Immunity Against ... 153
Investigators and Persecutors (Ed. Good Shepherd Convents) ... 134

Jews, The Popes and the ... 227
Journal, The New York, on Hell (Ed.). 234
Just Seven! (Ed. America Birthday) ... 14
Justice, Modern (Ed.) ... 307

Labor and the Flag (Ed.), 39; Market, The War and the, 562; Revolt (Ed.) .. 571
Landmarks, Catholic, of St. Louis, 83; Pittsburgh, 279; New Orleans ... 400
Language, Our Misleading (Ed.) ... 307
Latin, Saying My Prayers in ... 277
Laws, Man Made (Ed.) ... 87
Large Families in France, Movement for ... 585
Las Casas, B. de ... 374
Lawlessness and the Courts (Ed.) ... 258
Leaks, Stopping the ... 489-514
Lecture Tour, My Last (Socialists) ... 371
Letters, American Men of (Ed.) ... 256
Life, Simplicity of ... 81
Light Eater's Self-Righteousness, The (Ed.). 211
Little Things and Health ... 203
Log-Cabin of Hodgenville, The (Ed.) ... 546
Logopathy (Ed.) ... 186
Long-Sighted, The Vice of Being ... 468
Loot, This Way for (Mexico) ... 152
Luther, From, to Marx ... 610

PAGE

Magazines, Infected (Ed.) ... 188
Manuscripts and Printed Books, An Exhibition of ... 566
Marriage by Proxy (Ed.) ... 307
Mass, Sunday and Infantile Paralysis (Ed.). 475
Messenger's Golden Jubilee (Ed.) ... 40
Mexican Commission, The (Ed.) ... 499
Mexico, A Voice from (Ed.) ... 619
Mining Engineering, The Young Man and .. 587
Missionary Association, The Catholic Women's (Ed.) ... 524
"Modern School," Dr. Flexner's (Ed.) 15
Monsters and the Middle Ages ... 230
Motherhood, A School for (Ed.) ... 474
Murphy, Dr. John B. (Ed.) ... 452-470
Mysticism and a Wooden Post ... 300

Nature or Nurture? (Ed.) ... 356
New York, Godless (Ed.), 64; Saving (Ed.), 427; "Near-Thought" in (Ed.) .. 570
Novel Reading, A Plea for ... 126
Nuns, Newspapers and Restaurants ... 282

Obscenity Laws (Ed.) ... 428
Outlook, The, and the Dunphy Case (Ed.) ... 259
Optimism, In Defense of (Ed.) ... 110

Paganizing the Child in New York ... 393
Paschal Message, The ... 29
"Patent Insides" ... 254
Patriotism, Comparative (Ed.) ... 570
Paths, Tangled (Ed.) ... 87
Panama Commisions, Findings of the (Ed.). 188
Peace and the Sword (Ed.) ... 134
Peasant Women of France, The ... 543
"Personal, Practical Work" (Ed.), (Film Censorship) ... 62
Philippine Bill and New York Post (Ed.) .. 135
Plutocrats, The Song of the (Ed.) ... 331
Poor, Understanding the ... 322
Pope, The, and American Jews ... 25
Popes and Peace, The ... 53-80-103
Prayer, A Comprehensive (Ed.) ... 284
Preach, Shall Women? (Ed.) ... 522
Preparedness and the Scriptures ... 204
Press Association, The Catholic (Ed.), 499; The Freedom of the (Ed.) ... 282
Progress, The Truth About, 373; and Decadence ... 537
Public Schools, Saving the (Ed.) ... 380
Purity, The Guardian of (Ed.) ... 378

Quixote, If Don, Came Back! ... 491

Railway Problem, The ... 517
Ratan Devi: An Impression ... 58
Reformation, Buying a (Movie Censorship), (Ed.) ... 159
Religion, On Modern ... 495
Religious Tests for Office Holders (Ed.) 331
Republican Government in Georgia (Ed.) ... 572
Roman Holiday, A (Modern Degeneracy) .. 10

"Sacred Fund," Our (Ed.) ... 259
Safe, Who is? (Ed.) ... 522
Safety First? (Ed.) ... 63
Salt, The Neglect of ... 424
Seas, Sweeping the ... 417
Sermon, His Most Eloquent (Ed.) ... 39
Schoener, Father G. A. (Rose Culture) 105
Science Autocratic ... 443
Shakespeare, Age and Stage of 8; Religion. 31
Sholem Aleichem (Ed.) ... 159
"Silly Season," Indications of the (Ed.) ... 356
Slime from the Dragon, The ... 398
Sobriety by Conviction (Ed.) ... 498
Social Service, A New School of (Ed.) 619
Social, Warfare, Catholic Young Men in the (Ed.), 596; Notes, A Novelty in ... 524
Socialists, Irish-American ... 540
Soldier, The (Ed.) ... 282
Soldiers' Letters, Our ... 496
Soul, The, and the Solar Plexus (Ed.) 597
Souls, Hunting, on the Border (Ed.) ... 619
Souls, Their, Shall Meet ... 517
Spanish Elections, The ... 156
Speak Up! (Ed) ... 618
"Spectric Poet," Enter the (Ed.) ... 235
Spiritist, Open Letter to a ... 325
Spring and the Story of God ... 79
Stage and the Clergy, The (Ed.) ... 546
Stained Glass, A Triumph in ... 277
Standard, The Wrong (Ed.) ... 451

PAGE

Strike, The New York and the Oppressed (Ed.) ... 450
Strikes and Lockouts, An Era of (Ed.), 210; The Morality of, 422; Some Reflections on ... 538
Suicides and the Cult of Minerva (Ed.) ... 235
Sun, The New York (Ed.) ... 330
"Superstition-Ridden Barracks" (Ed.) ... 306

TEXAS Lynching, The (Ed.) ... 160
Theology, The New ... 586
Thomas, St., and the Chicago Tribune (Ed.) ... 62
Thought, The Thrift of ... 34
Treason, Preaching (Ed.) ... 403
Turk and the Armenian, The (Ed.) ... 211
Twilight Musings (Ed.) ... 523
Twist, The Witness of Oliver ... 273
Type, Far Beyond the (Holy Eucharist) (Ed.) ... 234

UNCLE Sam Sighs (Unpreparedness) ... 326
Unity Conference, The (Ed.) ... 86
"Unionizing" Authorship (Ed.) ... 258
Unity of the Human Race, The ... 350

VACATIONS ... 299
Villa, Lind and the Mexican Church (Ed.) ... 378
Vivisection, Human (Ed.) ... 38

WAR, The Growing Toll of (Ed.) ... 475
War, Two Years of the (Ed.) ... 381
Ward, Wilfrid Philip: Victorian ... 35
Waters, The Toll of the (Ed.) ... 427
Wedding Ring, The Silver, 105; The Iron ... 442
Winona's Enterprising Catholics (Ed.) ... 284
"Wire-Tappers," The ... 609
Working Conditions and Accidents (Ed.) ... 136
Woman Suffrage and Allied Problems ... 297
Wonder Grows, The (Ed.) ... 235

YOUNG Man, The, and Fruit-Growing, 30; Chemistry, 151; Mechanical Engineering, 229; Civil Engineering, 348; Mining Engineering ... 587
Yourself, Feeling Sorry for (Ed.) ... 64
Youth, Suggestions in ... 54

AUTHORS

Abernathy, Julian W.: English Literature ... 504
Antony, C. M.: Saint Catherine of Siena ... 286
Anstey, F.: In Brief Authority ... 456
Ashley, R. L.: Medieval History ... 116
Bacon, Charles W.: The American Plan of Government ... 456
Badé, William Fred: The Old Testament in the Light of Today ... 91
Baker, J. H.: American University Progress ... 479
Barker, Elsa: The Songs of a Vagrom Angel ... 432
Barraud, C. W.: Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith ... 139
Barrett, E. Boyd: Strength of Will ... 42
Bates, S. C.: The Geranium Lady ... 335
Battifol, Louis: The Century of the Renaissance in France ... 526
Baxter, W. S.: Seventeen ... 67
Beard, Dan: The American Boy's Book of Bugs, Butterflies and Beetles ... 384
Beegle, M. P.: Community Drama and Pageantry ... 406
Beresford, J. D.: Dickie ... 432
Bevir, Grace E.: A French Mother in War Time ... 624
Blackwood, A.: Julius le Vallon ... 600
Blanche, Sister: Idyls and Sketches ... 239
Bonger, William A.: Criminality and Modern Economic Conditions ... 622
Bossaert, M.: Short Sermons on Gospel Texts ... 503
Boucard, L.: The Chief Catholic Devotions ... 407
Bowers, Claude C.: The Irish Orators ... 213
Bowman, Isaiah: South America, a Geography Reader ... 430
Bradford, Gamaliel: Union Portraits ... 239
Brewer, John M.: Oral English ... 192
Brooks, A. M.: Dante: How to Know Him ... 358
Brown, Alice: The Prisoner ... 431
Bruce, H. A.: The Riddle of Personality ... 263
Bruno, J. F.: Rosmini's Contribution to Ethical Philosophy ... 479
Burgess, Gelett: The Romance of the Commonplace ... 239
Burnett, T. J.: The Essentials of Teaching ... 624
Burr, A. J.: Life and Living ... 574
Burroughs, John: Under the Apple Trees ... 287
Butler, Samuel: The Way of All Flesh ... 263
Cadman, S. Parker: The Three Religious Leaders of Oxford and their Movements: Wycliffe, Wesley, Newman ... 622
Calippe, Charles: La Guerre en Picardie ... 431
Cannon, Gilbert: Three Sons and a Mother ... 432
Cannon, Mary Agnes: The Education of Women During the Renaissance ... 573
Carpenter, J. E.: Phases of Early Christianity ... 478
Carroll, Rev. Edmund: Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles ... 116
Castle, A. and E.: A Little House in War-Time ... 600
Chapman, F. M.: The Travels of Birds ... 456
Chapman, Chas. E.: The Founding of Spanish California ... 502
Chase, Beatrice: Gorse Blossoms and Dartmoor ... 574
Child, R. W.: Potential Russia ... 576
Cianain, Tadh G. O.: The Flight of the Earls ... 310
Clarke, Isabel C.: Only Anne ... 90
Cobb, Irvin S.: Old Judge Priest ... 262
Coghlan, Philip: The Passion and Death of Jesus ... 116
Corwin, Edward: French Policy and American Alliance ... 550
Cox, Eleanor R.: Singing Fires of Erin ... 66
Crane, Dr. Frank: Common Sense, Adventures In ... 191
Crespigny, Capt. Charles de: Where the Path Breaks ... 19
Cropsey, Adelaide: Verse ... 139
Curtis, Felicia: A More Excellent Way ... 432
Dell, Ethel M.: Bars of Iron ... 90
Dewey, John: Democracy and Education ... 599
Ditchfield, P. H.: The Cathedrals of Great Britain ... 359
Drake, Maurice: The Ocean Sleuth ... 19
Drive, Augustus: The Sodality of Our Lady ... 384
Duffy, F. G. D.: Yonder? ... 264
Dumas, R. P.: Introduction à l'Union intime avec Dieu ... 624
Duncan, Frances: Roberta of Roseberry Gardens ... 140
Dunham, E. M.: How to Know Mosses ... 335
Durand, André: The Life of Père Joyard ... 215
Dwight, H. G.: Stamboul Nights ... 19
Dwight, H. O.: The Centennial History of the American Bible Society ... 480
Eckenrode, H. J.: The Revolution in Virginia ... 43
Ellerker, M. St. S.: Master, Where Dwellest Thou? ... 360
Emerson, Walter: The Latchstring ... 311
Fillion, L. C.: The New Psalter of the Roman Breviary ... 44
Fitzgerald, T. A.; A Good Third ... 360
Fletcher, J. Butler: Dante ... 238
Fletcher, Margaret: Christian Feminism ... 190
Franck, Harry A.: Tramping Through Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras ... 623
Freeman, F. L.: God's Golden Gifts ... 455
Forbes, Madame: The Life of St. Paul ... 215
Foster, John: The Bright Eyes of Danger ... 335
Foulke, D.: Lyrics of War and Peace ... 407
Gaell, Réné: Priests in the Firing Line ... 527
Gardner, E. G.: (Ed.) The Book of St. Bernard on the Love of God ... 382
Garraghan, G. J.: (Ed.) Prose Types in Newman ... 502
Garrold, R. P.: The Onion Peelers ... 139
Gautt, H. L.: Industrial Leadership ... 478
Gibson, Wilfrid Wilson: Battle and Other Poems ... 192
Girardy, Rev. Ferreol, C.SS.R.: The Mother of My Lord ... 116
Gladden, Washington: A Book for Graduates ... 192
Graham, S.: Through Russian Central Asia ... 479
Gray, Maxwell: The World Mender ... 431
Griffith, A.: Meagher of the Sword ... 311
Guenther, Louis: Investments and Speculation ... 43
Guiner, Jeanne le: Letters from France ... 600
Hagar, George J.: Plain Facts About Mexico ... 502
Hall, James A.: Kitchener's Mob ... 191
Hall, Jennie: Our Ancestors in Europe ... 623
Hamilton, Captain Ernest: The First Seven Divisions ... 214
Harbin, R. W.: Paradoxical Pain ... 264
Hazlitt, Henry: Thinking as a Science ... 311
Heft, Louis: Holders of Railroad Notes and Bonds ... 116
Helps, E. A.: Songs and Ballads from Over the Seas ... 623
Hickey, J. S.: Summula Philosophiae Scholasticae ... 238
Hielscher, H. H.: Songs of the Son of Isai ... 18
Hind, C. L.: The Soldier Boy ... 287
Hirsch-Davies, J. E. de: Catholicism in Medieval Wales ... 116
Hough, Emerson: The Magnificent Adventure ... 575
Howe, Sonia E.: A Thousand Years of Russian History ... 191
Howells, W. D.: The Daughter of the Storage ... 240
Johnson, R. A.: Poems of War and Peace ... 407
Jones, Rev. Edward: (Ed.) The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church ... 91
Jusserand, J. J.: With Americans of Past and Present Days ... 334
Kittredge, G. L.: Shakespeare ... 264
Klein, Henry H.: Bankrupting a Great City ... 116
Koren, John: Alcohol and Society ... 383
Kunz, George F.: The Magic of Jewels and Charms ... 239
Laun, F.: The Chief Points of Difference between the Catholic and Protestant Creeds ... 67
Lapp, John A.: Learning to Earn ... 140
Leecock, Stephen: Essays and Literary Studies ... 139
Lee, G. S.: We ... 240
Leete, F. Deland: The Church in the City ... 191
Leslie, Shane: The End of the Chapter ... 115
Levering, J. H.: Historic Indiana ... 430
Lindsay, Vachel: Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty ... 92
Locke, W. J.: Viviette ... 140
Lucy, Sir Henry: Nearing Jordan ... 600
MacBrayne, L. E.: One More Chance ... 501
MacDonald, Mina: Some Experiences in Hungary ... 576
Mackaye, Percy: Caliban by the Yellow Sands ... 115
Macpherson, S.: The Musical Education of the Child ... 430
Madden, R. R.: United Irishmen, Their Lives and Times ... 406
Madelin, Louis: The French Revolution ... 599
Maguire, Edward: Is Schism Lawful? ... 18
Manners, J. Hartley: Wreckage ... 91
Mallet, Christian: Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper ... 214
Margaret Duchess of Newcastle, The Life of the First Duke of Newcastle and other writings ... 190
Martin, Mr. and Mrs. John: Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies ... 190
Marvin, Eleanor: Mary Allen ... 19
Masters, Edgar Lee: Songs and Satires ... 139
Maurel, André: A Month in Rome ... 359
McCabe, Joseph: Crises in the History of the Papacy ... 42-408
McFaul, Rt. Rev. James A.: Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings ... 66
McFee, William: Casuals of the Sea ... 502
McGill, Patrick: The Red Horizon ... 92
McGlinchey, Joseph F.: A Catechism on Catholic Foreign Missions ... 624
McKay, Helen: London, One November ... 139
McMullan, J. A.: A Retreat for Women in Business ... 503
McNabb, Vincent: The Wayside ... 429
McSorley, J.: Italian Confessions: How to Hear Them ... 432
Mendel, L. B.: Changes in the Food Supply ... 478
Mereness, N. D. (Ed.): Travels in the American Colonies ... 214
Meyer, Arnold Oskar: England and the Catholic Church under Elizabeth ... 114
Millard, Thomas F.: Our Eastern Question ... 623
Moeslein, Mark: Mechanism of Discourses ... 19
Monroe, A. S.: Happy Valley ... 384
Moore, George: The Brook Kerith ... 550
Morgan, I. H.: German Atrocities ... 214
Mulholland, Rosa: O'Loughlin of Clare ... 431
Murphy, Joseph A.: An Unknown Master ... 240
Neill, A. S.: A Dominie's Log ... 455
Neilson, F.: How Diplomats Make War ... 264
Olcott, Charles S.: The Life of Wm. McKinley ... 238
O'Brien, E. J.: The Best Short Stories of 1915 ... 140
O'Brien, Seumas: Duty and Other Irish Comedies ... 622
O'Connor, John: Of the Chivalry of Christ ... 624
Osborne, Thomas Mott: Society and Prisons ... 501
O'Shaughnessy, Mrs. N.: A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico ... 237
Oxenham, John: My Lady of the Moore ... 116
Pallen, Condé B.: The Education of Boys ... 66
Pègues, Thomas: Saint Thomas d'Aquin et la Guerre ... 504
Pennell, E. R.: Nights ... 42
Phelps, W. L.: Browning, How to Know Him ... 502
Philipps, W. A.: Poland ... 383
Plummer, Charles: Devotions from Ancient and Mediaeval Sources ... 192
Potter, M. K.: Ten Beautiful Years ... 456
Quiller-Couch, Sir Arthur: On the Art of Writing ... 163
Radin, Max: The Jews among the Greeks and Romans ... 92
Rahilly, Alfred: A Guide to Social Students and Workers ... 600
Rannie, David W.: The Elements of Style ... 310
Reeve, Arthur B.: The Social Gangster ... 575
Repplier, Agnes: Counter-Currents ... 138
Rhinehart, M. R.: Through Glacier Park, 335; Tish ... 502
Richards, Laura E.: Julia Ward Howe 1819-1910 ... 90
Robert, A.: Histoire de la Philosophie, 138; Leçons de Logique; de Morale; de Psychologie, et de Theodicée ... 138
Robinson, A. Van Dyke: Commercial Geography ... 430
Rolland, Romain: Michelangelo ... 89
Roosevelt, Theodore: A Booklover's Holidays in the Open ... 90
Ross, Estelle: Oliver Cromwell ... 139
Rousseau, Henry: William Joseph Chaminars ... 162
Ruhl, Arthur: Antwerp to Gallipoli ... 67
Ryan, John A.: Family Limitation ... 600
Schäfers, Johannes: Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflage ... 140
Schultz, James Willard: Blackfeet Tales of Glacier National Park ... 216
Scroggs, W. O.: Filibusters and Financiers ... 286
Sharp, Dallas Lore: Hills of Hingham ... 93
Shirrill, C. H.: Modernizing the Monroe Doctrine ... 68
Sihler, E. G.: M. Tullius Cicero of Arpinum ... 455
Simonds, J. H.: They Shall Not Pass ... 214
Slater, John R.: Freshmen Rhetoric ... 288
Slattery, C. L.: The Gift of Immortality ... 480
Smith, Joseph: Paul Mary Packenham, Pasionist ... 263
Smith, Lewis W.: The Mechanism of English Style ... 310
Smith, R. W.: Benighted Mexico ... 454

PAGE

Spearman, Frank H.: Nan of Music Mountain ... 43
Stacpoole, H. D.: The Gold Trail ... 384
Staniforth, Edith: Our Home in Heaven ... 92
Stecher, W. A.: Games and Dances ... 456
Stehle, Aurelius: Manual of Episcopal Ceremonies ... 19
Stephens, Kate: The Mastering of Mexico ... 20
Symons, Arthur: Studies in Seven Arts ... 162
Thompson, A. L.: Catechism of Patriotism ... 502
Thorndike, Ashley H.: Shakespeare's Theater ... 114
Thornton, M. F.: When Pan Pipes ... 264
Thurean-Dangin, Paul: The English Catholic Revival in the 19th Century ... 162
Thurston, H.: The Memory of Our Dead ... 262
Tighe, Francis O'Sullivan: The Portion of a Champion ... 43
Tissier, Mgr.: Pour la Victoire ... 431
Tixeront, J.: History of Dogmas ... 18
Tomlinson, E. T.: Scouting with Kit Carson ... 287
Velimirovic, Nicholas: Serbia in Light and Darkness ... 576
Wallis, H. Parker: American Banking ... 43
Ward, Mrs. Humphrey: A Great Success ... 163
Warfield, W.: The Gate of Asia ... 431
Washburn, Stanley: Victory in Defeat ... 240
Watts, Mary: The Rudder ... 92
Webster, Nesta H.: The Chevalier de Boufflers ... 600
Wedewer, Herman: A Short History of the Catholic Church ... 574
Wells, H. G.: What is Coming? ... 264
Wells, P. W.: The Martyr's Return ... 312
Welman, Walter: The German Republic ... 312
Wemyss, Mrs. George: Jaunty in Charge ... 216
West, Julius: G. K. Chesterton ... 262
Wheeler, D.: Abraham Lincoln ... 502
Whitman, Stephen: Children of Hope ... 163
Williams, J. H.: The New Pelagianism ... 18
Williamson, C. N. and A. M.: The Lightning Conductor Discovers America ... 239
Wilson, Woodrow: On Being Human ... 164
Winchester, C. T.: William Wordsworth; How to Know Him ... 92
Wright, C. H. C.: A History of the French Republic ... 383
Wright, F. A.: The House on the Hill ... 574
Wright, H. B.: When a Man's a Man ... 503
Wright, H. F.: Francisci de Victoria de Jure Belli Relectio ... 456
Yeats, W. B.: Reveries over Childhood and Youth ... 263
Young, G. P.: East and West Through Fifteen Centuries ... 431

EDUCATION

"Biology" in the Secular School ... 409
Boy and the Boarding School, The ... 21
Catholic, The Educational Convention, 313; Parents, A Word to, 336; The Apologetic ... 433
Cliff Haven ... 241
College, Going to, 133, 141 ... 165
De La Salle and Popular Education ... 289
Julianne and the Valedictory ... 577
Kindergarten, The ... 117
Law School, The Catholic ... 553
Little Ones, Scandalizing the ... 457
Medical School, The Catholic ... 529
Naturalistic Aptitudes ... 504
Parochial School, The, a National Bulwark, 481; and the Conscience of the Child, 601; The Winona Plan for ... 625
School-Picking ... 385
Secular Education, Dangers of ... 45
Secular Universities, Dangers of ... 69
Times, A Thought for Our ... 217
Vacation Time ... 265
Vaudeville against Intellect ... 361

ECONOMICS

Democratic State, Could a, Endure? ... 482
Economic Socialism, What is? ... 217
Farmer, Giving the, a Chance ... 458

LITERATURE

Apologetics Old and New ... 525
Benson, Robert Hugh ... 137
Brownson, Orestes A ... 549
Catholic Authors in Training Schools ... 93
Cervantes ... 17
Chesterton, Gilbert, K., Poetry of ... 189
Children, Poetry for ... 64
Father Prout ... 113
Francis de Sales, St ... 405
Francis Thompson ... 285
Goldsmith, The Genius of Oliver ... 500
Guiding the Stream ... 309
Hotel Piazza, On the ... 428
Irish Insurrectionary Poets, The ... 212
John Ruskin ... 333
Johnson, Lionel ... 65
Man of the Mask, The ... 41
March Phillips, The Works of ... 598
Mother Juliana's "Sixteen Revelations" ... 236
Norris, Kathleen ... 573
O'Donnell, Rev. Charles L., Poems of ... 381
Perilous Light, The ... 476
"Risus Filiorum Dei" ... 261
Silvio Pellico ... 161
Stars, the Fragrant ... 89
Traherne, Felicitous ... 453
Yeats, Mr., and the Cosmic Moth ... 357

COMMUNICATIONS

"Androcles and the Lion," 85; and "Marie Odile" ... 132
Apathy and Indifference ... 617
Badé's, Dr. Book ... 133-157-209-329-592
Barclay Street, The Genesis of, 568; Publishers ... 593
Biology in the Schools ... 473
Blame, Who is to? ... 544
"Blest" or "Blessed" ... 449-473-521-569-593
Body and Mind ... 305
Books, First American ... 329
Boulanger, Who was Father? ... 257
Boy Scout Movement, The ... 185
Canvasser, A Forceful ... 617
Catholic, Work of Art, A, 85; School Agencies Needed ... 568
Catholics in Protestant Schools, 157; and Public Libraries, 133; in Prisons ... 133
Censors, National Board of ... 13
Censorship for Movies ... 109
Central-American Women, Minister-Slanderer ... 521
Chaplain, A Chance for a Volunteer ... 449
"Character and Temperament" ... 544
Child, The Dependent, 280; Labor Bill ... 520
Christian Brothers, A Tribute to the ... 448
Custom, A Good Old ... 131
Colors, A Call to the ... 185
Conditions among the Afflicted Syrians ... 305
Consumers' League Garments ... 133
Convent-School Training ... 592
Correspondent, Not the ... 448
Damien, Father, Leprosy, 108; Latest Champion of ... 425
Defense, A Legion of ... 157-233-329
Devout, The Audibly ... 544-569
"Don't" ... 521
Ecclesiastical Titles, Correct ... 12-61-85-133-157
English Undefiled, Where Is Today's Well of? ... 545
Episcopalian, What is an? ... 472-617
Error, An, Corrected ... 281
Errors, Occasional ... 401
Expediency of Principle ... 209
Fray Junipero's Habit ... 281
Grammar, Rules of ... 13
Grave, The Story of a Neglected ... 233
German Grammar ... 61
High Schools, Public ... 449
Hoboken and "Devout" Catholics ... 545
Infantile Paralysis, and Catholic Institutions ... 376
Liturgy, The, 449; Our School's and ... 376
Madonna, The Morgan (Mistaken Titles) ... 109
Magazines for a Poor Mission ... 545
Marking Time, Stop ... 401
Marriages, Mixed ... 60
Mass, Indistinct Celebrants of ... 353
Myth, Another, 37; Another Historical ... 281
National Greatness ... 132
"Near-Thought" in New York ... 593
Neutral Flag, The Ever ... 256
New Orleans, Catholic Landmarks of ... 473
New York Car Strike, The ... 616
New York's Latin Quarter ... 591
Open Shop, The ... 592
Ordinance, A Mythical ... 280
Osler Child, The ... 376
Patrick St., The First Church of ... 133
Physicians, Catholic, and Reading ... 497
Proselyting Scheme, A ... 60
Priestly Ministrations in France ... 305
Pussyfooting ... 280
Shakespeare, Tencentenary, The ... 61
Shaw on Ireland, 37; Plays ... 233
"Sobriety by Conviction" ... 545
Social Workers, A School for ... 209
Socialist Call, The ... 593
Suggestion, A Good (Leo XIII. Encyclical) ... 185
Sumner, The Need of Mr. (Indecent Books) ... 13
Teacher, A Great (P. S. Casserly) ... 425
Theater, The Lure of the ... 401
Thrift and Extravagance ... 109
Vacation Schools ... 281
Vivisection, Human ... 84
War Orphans, French, The ... 109-256-327-376-425
Washington's Hint to Irate Subscribers ... 569
Waste, Woful (Catholic Hymns) ... 497
West's, Professor, History ... 617
Work, Not Talk, but ... 281

NOTE AND COMMENT

Advertising, Censorship for, 292; and Church Attendance ... 316
Age, the Superficial ... 532
America, For God and ... 364
Americanism Exaggerated ... 507
Ammunition Sent to Mexico ... 316
Amusements, The Regulation of ... 292
Anti-Catholic Animus in Prohibition Party ... 507
Architecture, Ecclesiastical ... 95
Asquith, Mr., and the Pope ... 47
Assassination Justified in Congress ... 120
Bacteria, A Museum of Living ... 507
Bible in the Schools, The ... 460
Bigotry, Over-reaching Itself in Florida ... 244
Binet-Simon Test, The ... 388
Birth Control Popularized ... 119
Birth Rate, Britain's Declining ... 411
Blind, Publications for the ... 48
Browne Rev. H., Educational Tour of ... 72
Catholic, Statistics for 1916, 24; Journals in Catholic Schools, 143; Schools, Discriminating Against, 243; Hospital, Growth of a, 168; Schools, Trophies for, 195; Children, Saving the, in India, 268; Education in Mexico, 339; Missions Help for, 484; Club House, A Model, 579; Piety in American Camps, 508; Charities, National Conference ... 603
Catholics and the Stage, 387; Worshiping over a Clothing Store ... 95
Capital and Labor, Relations between ... 315
Carmen's Wage Scale ... 483
Caughnawaga's Second Centenary ... 555
Charities, National Conference of Catholic ... 219
"Charity-Trust," Is it Feasible? ... 316
Chesterton on the Rich and Divorce ... 291
Child Fad Suggested, A ... 531
Children and Labor ... 387
"Christian" Filipinos ... 363
Christian Schools a Necessity ... 436
Chivalry, The Passing of ... 579
Church, Running a, Like a Grocery Store, 168; A Natural, 412; Music, Summer Course in ... 167
Citizenship, The Duty-Phase of ... 340
Civil Marriage Law, Panama ... 579
Classical Studies in the U. S ... 267
Clothes, Real Stone ... 267
Colored Missions, the Work of the ... 268
Columbus Cadets, The ... 556
Converts, During 1915, 268; in Boston ... 315
Conscience Fund, The Treasury ... 459
Crown Prince, Casualties of the ... 48
Crime and the Film Drama ... 532
Diet and Cancer ... 315
Divorce, Growth of ... 48
Dust from Books Dangerous, Is the? ... 120
Ecclesiastical Vaudeville ... 267
Education, à la Carte, 531; Convention, The Catholic, 144; Religious and the "National" Conscience ... 436
Empty Pew Problem, The ... 483
England's School Problem ... 507
Exports for May ... 316
Feminism in the Orient ... 604
Fixed Stars, The Vatican Catalogue of ... 220
Flags on Public Buildings ... 412
Florida Bigot, Rebuke for a ... 292
Financial Theories and the War ... 315
Ford Motor Profits ... 603
Game Preservation ... 340
Georgia Convent Inspection Bill, 556; Legislature and Lynching ... 555
Hahn, Mission Labors of Father ... 507
Harvard's "System" Charles F. Adams on, 24; Athletic Future ... 72
Healthfulness of City and Country, Relative ... 144
Height of Buildings, Limiting the ... 531
High Living, The Cost of ... 507
Hill, James J., Admiration for the Church ... 310
Holy Childhood, The Association of the ... 363
Honor System in Penitentiaries, The ... 339
Human Wastage from the Battle Fields, 195; Life and Fireworks, 579; Document, An Interesting ... 531
India, Salvation for ... 435
Indian Names, The Ancient ... 168
Irish Relief Fund Committee, The ... 219
Immigrant Problem Solved, The ... 219
Jewish View of Catholic Work A ... 555
Killing of Wounded Men ... 507
Knights of Columbus, National Convention, 47; Growth of the ... 579
Kappens, Rev. F., Death of ... 47
Labor Laws, 93; New ... 556
Laundry Workers, Women ... 459
Law-Making Mania, The ... 411
Lesson of '98, The ... 364
Lies and Calumny Masked as Authority ... 340
Literature, Undenominational ... 484
Longevity of Women ... 196
Love Me, Love My Dog ... 143
Loyola University Medical Graduates ... 220
Lynching Record, Our ... 412
Lyons, Mgr. John A., Death of ... 23
Memory, Diurnal Variations in ... 220
Merchant Marine Plans for a ... 72
Methodist View of Labor Unions, a ... 532
Mission Spirit, The Rising ... 72
Molokai, Heroic Work at ... 340
Moral Atmosphere of Theaters, The ... 339
Mosquito Week for New York ... 72
Motion-Picture Industry ... 387
"Movies," The Appeal of the ... 436
Moving-Picture Censorship ... 484
Murphy, Memorial to Dr. John B ... 579

PAGE

Negro Year Book, The ... 579
Newspapers, Statistics Concerning ... 604
Nilan, Bishop and Hartford Diocese ... 119
Nomination by Acclamation ... 291
Nugget, A Valuable ... 291
Official, A Faithful ... 315
Operatic Music in Church ... 95-119
Otis, Mrs. A. B., Death of ... 47
Our Lady Honored by Protestants ... 220
Ozanam Association, T. M. Mulry on the ... 244
Patriotism and the Flag ... 287
Patriotic Citizens, The ... 435
Penalty, A Proper ... 604
Pedagogics, Efficiency of Modern ... 72
Pool-Room Dangers ... 412
Polish War Relief ... 268
Publishing, High Cost of ... 95
Purgatory, Protestant Theologians on ... 144
Printed Page, Where Responsibility for the, Belongs ... 292
Prison Reform, True ... 363
Prohibition and Religion, 144; Cheating Laws ... 460
Protestant Missions in South America ... 244
Red Wine, The Vineyard of ... 506
Religion, Texas Style ... 316
Religious Instruction for Children ... 388
René, Rev. J. B., Death of ... 95
Reserve, A Real Army of ... 339
Retreats for Laymen and Women ... 243
Rural Credit Bill ... 167
Russian Idea of America, A ... 531
School, Savings Bank System, The, 436; Population, 459; England's Problem ... 507
Shakespeare, Not a Moralist, 95; Commemoration at Catholic Colleges ... 120
Sister, A, Writes a Play ... 364
Sister, Catholic, Imprisoned ... 120
Social Unrest, The Root of Our, 460; Problems, Catholic Women and ... 460
Socialist Views of Marriage ... 47
Socialism, Demands of Advanced, 95; Inculcated in Public Schools, 508; and the War ... 388
Sociological Church of Today, The ... 196
Sodalists and the Press ... 388
Soul-Saving, The Business of ... 411
Spalding, Death of Archbishop ... 508
"Star-Spangled Banner," Monument to Author of the ... 219
Strikes and Lockouts ... 387
Sunday Observance in Philadelphia ... 436
Teaching, Aims and Objects of American ... 291
Tenement Children, Mothering the ... 195
Texas, Need of Catholic Schools in ... 24
Theology, The New ... 292
Time Loss in Trade ... 484
Total Abstinence Argument, A ... 579
Trappist Abbey in Kentucky, The ... 196
Trinity Church Year Book ... 364
University Professors, Strictures on ... 484
U. S. Steel and Carnegie Pension Fund ... 167
Vincentian Superior Council, New President of ... 603
Verdi's Requiem, Open Air Production of ... 243
Verdun, At ... 47
Waco Horrors, The ... 435
War, Correspondent Indoor, 95; Cost of World, 95; Debts Stupendous, 143; Financial Strain of the ... 604
Washington, The "Dull" ... 243
Workmen's Compensation ... 531
World-Mission Church for U. S. ... 555
Wheat Crop Prospects ... 339
Yiddish, The Meaning of ... 267
Y. M. C. A. Activities at the Front ... 412
Jewish Charities Campaign ... 627
Li Yuan-Hung, Is He a Catholic? ... 627
Nuisance, Anti League ... 627
Food Cost, Minimum of ... 627
Simplicity, Evangelical ... 628
Strength of Man and Insects, Proportional ... 628
Widows' Pensions ... 628

BOOKS

Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflege ... 140
Adelicia of Louvaine, The Rose of Brabant ... 503
Adventures in Common Sense ... 191
Adventure, The Magnificent ... 574
Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty ... 92
Alcohol and Society ... 383
Algebra, Intermediate ... 528
Alice Devine ... 163
AMERICA in the Classroom ... 551
American Banking ... 43
Americans of Past and Present Days, With ... 334
American Plan of Government, The ... 456
Angel, the Songs of a Vagrom ... 432
Anna, Good Old ... 384
Authority, In Brief ... 456
Antwerp to Gallipoli, From ... 67
Apostle, The ... 310
Apple-Trees, Under the ... 287
Artois, La Guerre en ... 503
Asia, The Gate of ... 431
Augustine's Abbey, The Register of St ... 527
Babette ... 45
Baby Catechism ... 552

PAGE

Ballads and Lyrics ... 574
Bankrupting a Great City ... 116
Bars of Iron ... 90
Battle and Other Poems ... 192
Beautiful Years, Ten ... 456
Beef, Iron and Wine ... 600
Beggars on Horseback ... 68
Belfry, The ... 45
Bernard, St., The Book of, on the Love of God ... 382
Best Short Stories of 1915, The ... 140
Bible Society, Centennial History of the American ... 480
Bird House Man, The ... 552
Birds, The Travels of ... 456
Bit, Doing Their ... 503
Blackfeet Tales ... 216
Blades, The Curved ... 68
Blaize, David ... 408
Booklover's Holidays in the Open, A ... 90
Boufflers, The Chevalier de ... 600
Boy, The Human, and the War ... 312
Boys, The Education of ... 66
Brant, The Strange Cases of Mason ... 163
Breviary, The New Psalter of the Roman ... 44
Bride, The Fairy ... 44
Bright Eyes of Danger, The ... 335
Brook Kerith, The ... 550
Browning; How to Know Him ... 502
Bugs, Butterflies, and Beetles, The American Boy's Book of ... 384
Bunner, Stories of H. C ... 262
Business of Being a Friend, The ... 528
Cassidy, Sergeant Michael ... 552
Casuals of the Sea ... 502
Cathedral of Great Britain, The ... 359
Catholic and Protestant Creeds, The Chief Points of Difference Between the ... 67
Catholic Church, The Beauty and Truth of the ... 91
Catholic Life, Essays on ... 480
Catéchisme de la Profession Religieuse ... 503
Catherine of Siena, St ... 286
Catholicism in Medieval Wales ... 116
California, The Founding of Spanish ... 502
Caliban by the Yellow Sands ... 115
Central Asia, Through Russian ... 479
Cicero, M. Tullius, of Arpinum ... 455
Champion, The Portion of a ... 43
Chance, One More ... 501
Chapel ... 216
Chapter, The End of a ... 115
Chesterton, G. K ... 262
Child, How to Know Your ... 312
Child, The Musical Education of the ... 430
Children of Hope ... 163
Chivalry of Christ, Of the ... 624
Christian Feminism ... 190
Christian Armour for Youth ... 92
Christianity and Infallibility: Both or Neither ... 481
Christianity, Phases of Early ... 478
Chorus, The ... 503
Church, A Short History of the Catholic ... 574
Church in the City, The ... 191
Clarke, Cam ... 45
Coming, The Second ... 68
Commercial Geography ... 430
Commonplace, The Romance of the ... 239
Community Drama and Pageantry ... 406
Confessions, Italian: How to Hear Them ... 432
Conquered, I ... 44
Conquest, The ... 216
Counter-Currents ... 138
Country Sky, Under the ... 164
Criminality and Modern Economic Conditions ... 622
Cross, The Way of the ... 67
Dante ... 238
Dante: How to Know Him ... 358
Davenport ... 408
Daughter of the Storage, The ... 240
Democracy and Education ... 599
Devotions from Ancient and Medieval Sources ... 192
Devotions, The Chief Catholic ... 407
Diplomats Make War, How ... 264
Discourses, Mechanism of ... 19
Dogmas, History of ... 18
Dominie's Log, A ... 455
Duncarron, The Heir of ... 19
Duty and Other Irish Comedies ... 622
Earls, The Flight of the ... 310
East and West through Fifteen Centuries ... 431
Eastern Question, Our ... 623
Eggs and Poultry, A Living from ... 312
Encyclopedia, The New International ... 478
England, For ... 335
England and the Catholic Church under Elizabeth ... 114
English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century, The ... 162
English Grammar Simplified ... 20
Episcopal Ceremonies, Manual of ... 19
Erin, Singing Fires of ... 66
Essays and Literary Studies ... 139
Essentials of Teaching, The ... 624
Ethica ... 575
Ethical Philosophy, Rosmini's Contribution to ... 479
Everyman Militant, a Modern Morality ... 480
Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries ... 183
Family Limitation ... 600

PAGE

Farrar, Geraldine ... 20
Father Bernard's Parish ... 264
Fear, The House of ... 552
Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies ... 190
Filibusters and Financiers ... 286
First Seven Divisions ... 214
Flesh, The Way of All ... 263
Food Supply, Changes in the ... 478
Foreign Missions, A Catechism on Catholic ... 624
Forest, The Dark ... 216
France, Letters from ... 600
French Mother, A, in War Time ... 624
French Policy and American Alliance ... 550
French Republic, A History of the Third ... 383
French Revolution, The ... 599
Freshman Rhetoric ... 288
Games and Dances ... 456
Geranium Lady, The ... 335
German Atrocities ... 214
German, Because I Am A ... 214
German Culture, Catholicism and the World War ... 454
Germany, Modern, in Relation to the Great War ... 310
German Republic, The ... 312
Gerontius, Cardinal Newman's Dream of ... 43
Gibby of Clamshell Alley ... 68
Glacier Park, Through ... 335
Gold Trail, The ... 384
Golden Gifts, God's ... 455
Golden Glory ... 68
Gorse Blossoms and Dartmoor ... 574
Gospel Texts, Short Sermons on ... 503
Graduates, A Book for ... 192
Grammar, High School Exercises in ... 20
Graymouse Family, The ... 552
Gregorian Poetry ... 19
Grizzly King, The ... 552
Guerre, en Artois, La ... 504
Guerre en Picardie, La ... 431
Halt! Who's There? ... 239
Happy Valley ... 384
Hausfrau Rampant, The ... 551
Heimatgrusse an unsere Krieger ... 140
Hermit and the King, The ... 551
High Tide ... 19
Hingham, Hills of ... 93
Histoire de la Philosophie ... 138
History, Medieval ... 116
Holders of Railroad Bonds and Notes ... 116
Holy Trinity, The Mystery of the, in Oldest Judaism ... 480
Hound of Heaven, The ... 43
House on the Hill, The ... 574
Howe, Julia Ward, 1819-1910 ... 90
Human, On Being ... 164
Hunchback Zia, The Little ... 528
Hungary, Some Experiences in ... 576
Hymnal, Parish ... 92
Idyls and Sketches ... 239
Immortality, The Gift of ... 480
Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper ... 214
Indiana, Historic ... 430
Industrial Leadership ... 478
Investments and Speculations ... 43
Irish Orators, The ... 213
Irish Regiments, What the, Have Done ... 503
Irish Saints, An Alphabet of ... 552
Irish Songs, Sweet Olde ... 528
Jasper B, The Cruise of the ... 312
Jasper Holt, The Finding of ... 216
Jaunty in Charge ... 216
Jewels and Charms, The Magic of ... 239
Jews among the Greeks and Romans, The ... 92
Joyard, The Life of Père ... 215
Jordan, Nearing ... 600
June ... 551
Khaki, for the King, In ... 407
Kiahlik Iksanana-Aiyimmika i Katikisma ... 359
Kitchen, Come Out of the ... 216
Kitchener's Mob ... 191
Latchstring, The ... 311
Learning to Earn ... 140
Leçons de Logique; de Morale; de Psychologie et de Theodicée ... 138
Life and Living ... 574
Lightning Conductor Discovers America, The ... 239
Lincoln, Abraham ... 502
Literature, English ... 504
London One November ... 139
Louise and Barnavaux ... 312
Lynnekers, These ... 432
Mackinac Island, Names of Places on ... 384
Man, When a Man's a ... 503
Martyr's Return, The ... 312
Mary Allen ... 19
Mary of Mercy of Kéruel, Memoirs of Sister ... 215
Mary Rose of Mifflin ... 68
Master, An Unknown ... 240
Master, Where Dwellest Thou? ... 360
May, Bonnie ... 528
Meagher of the Sword ... 311
Medard, The Pleasant Ways of St ... 550
Medieval History ... 116
Meditations for Every Day in the Year ... 407
Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith ... 139
Memory of Our Dead, The ... 262
Memory, The Rational ... 528
Mender, The World ... 431

	PAGE
Mexico, A Diplomat's Wife in	237
Mexico, Benighted	454
Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras, Tramping Through	623
Mexico, Plain Facts about	502
Mexico, The Mastering of	20
Michelangelo	89
Mission Field, Heroes of the	503
McKinley, The Life of William	238
My Lady of the Moor	116
My Lady's Dress	310
Monroe Doctrine, Modernizing the	68
Moreno, Garcia	480
Moor, My Lady of the	116
Mother of My Lord, The	116
Mothers, The	310
Mosses, How to Know the	335
Nan of Music Mountain	43
Newcastle, The Life of the First Duke of	190
Newman, Prose Type in	502
New Wars for Old	264
Nicolet, John	384
Nights	42
Ocean Sleuth, The	19
Old Judge Priest	262
Old Testament in the Light of Today, The	91
Oliver Cromwell	139
O'Loughlin of Clare	431
One More Chance	501
Onion Peelers, The	139
Only Anne	90
Oral English	192
Orbis Catholicus	360
Our Ancestors in Europe	623
Our Home in Heaven	92
Packenham, Paul Mary, C. P.	263
Papacy, Crises in the History of the	42
Paradoxical Pain	264
Passion and Death of Jesus, The	116
Patriotism, Catechism of	502
Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings	66
Paul, Life of St.	215
Pelagianism, The New	18
Perk, The Unspeakable	384
Personality, The Riddle of	263
Phil, My Friend	44
Philosophiæ Scholasticæ Summula	238
Phyllis McPhilemy	408
Poems of the Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood	334
Poland	383
Priests in the Firing Line	527
Prisoner, The	431
Progressive Music Series, The	430
Psalms, Commentary on the	480
Pudding, The Proof of the	163
Purple Land, The	407
Push, The Great	552
Quinneys	44
Records and Studies, Historical	454
Red Horizon, The	92
Religious Leaders of Oxford and Their Movements: Wycliffe, Wesley, Newman, The Three	622
Renaissance in France, The Century of the	526
Retreat for Women in Business, A	503
Retrospect	406
Reveries over Childhood and Youth	233
Roberta of Roseberry Gardens	140
Rome, A Month in	359
Rosechild, The	552
Rudder, The	92
Russia, Potential	576
Russian History, A Thousand Years of	191
Sailor, The	551
Saint, A False	310
Saranac, The Penny Piper of	552
Sea, Casuals of the	502
Serbia in Light and Darkness	576
Sermons, Plain, by Practical Preachers	432
Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles	116
Sermons, Short, on Gospel Texts	503
Seventeen	67
Schism, Lawful, Is?	18
Shakspere	264
Shakespearean Studies	215
Shakespeare's Theater	114
Ship, A Tall, and Other Naval Occasions	93
Ships in Port	503
Sober Life, Discourses on the	312
Social Gangster, The	575
Social Students and Workers	600
Society and Prisons	501
Sodality of Our Lady, The	384
Soldier Boy, The	287
Songs and Ballads from Over the Seas	623
Songs and Satires	139
Songs of the Son of Isai	18
Sons, Three, and a Mother	432
South America: A Geography Reader	430
Success, A Great	163
Stage Direction for Amateurs, Practical	67
Stamboul Nights	19
Studies in Seven Arts	162
Style, The Elements of	310
Style, The Mechanism of English	310
Tennis for Women	361
They Shall Not Pass	214
Thinking as a Science	311
Third, A Good	360
Thomas d'Aquin et la Guerre	504
Thorn, Instead of the	44
Tish	502
Transmigration, A Controversy on	92
Travels in the American Colonies	214
Union intime avec Dieu, Introduction à l'	624
Union Portraits	239
United Irishmen, The, Their Lives and Times	406
University Progress, American	479
Vallon, Julius Le	600
Verse, Adelaide Cropsey	139
Verse, A Book of Princeton	288
Victoire, Pour la	431
Victoria de, Francisci, de Jure Belli Relectio	456
Victory in Defeat	240
Virginia, The Revolution in	43
Woman, Behold the	19
Woman's Diary of the War, A	552
Women in Business, A Retreat for	503
Women, The Education of, During the Renaissance	573
Wordsworth, William: How to Know Him	92
Wreckage	91
Writing, On the Art of	163
Yonder?	264
Viviette	140
War and Peace, Poems of	407
War and Peace, Lyrics of	407
Way, A More Excellent	432
War-Time, A Little House in	600
Wayside, The	420
We	240
Wild Animal Ways	287
Will, Strength of	42
William Joseph Chaminade	162
Willow Weaver, The	528
What is Coming?	264
When Pan Pipes	264
Where the Path Breaks	19

SOCIOLOGY

	PAGE
Brownson House: Los Angeles	166
Catholic Social Work: Boston	530
Central Verein and the Pillars of Hercules	505
Charity Work, Is it a Sinecure?	194
Criminal Responsibility, The Test of	241
Dorr, Mrs. and the Den	554
Doty, Miss, Writes a Book	626
East Side, On the (New York Settlement Work)	22
Ezechiel, Thirty-Four, Six	578
Fag-Ends of the Charities' Investigation	266
Good Shepherd, The Way of the	142
Guardian Angel Settlement of St. Louis, The	314
In Praise of Folly and Crime	290
Institution, How to Malign an (Charities Investigation)	386
Kingsbury's Child-Placing Bureau	409
Miss Sue Prasia	434
Nuns, With, for Targets	337
Paganizing Charity	117
Place in the World, Her	70
Santa Maria Institute Cincinnati, The	94
Settlement Work in Philadelphia	362
Social Workers, The Training of	46
Sympathetic Strike, Is the, Justifiable?	602

CHRONICLE

	PAGE
Armenia: Acute Distress in	605
Austria Hungary: Emperor's Birthday, 462; Peace, Premonitions of, 169; Russian Barbarities	198
China: Japan's New Demands, 534; Money, the Lack of, 367; New Cabinet, 295; Peace, Patching Up a	50
France: Anti-clericalism Rebuked, 98; Anti-clericals and Charitable Works, 170; Army Orphanage, 247; M. Barrès and the Clergy, 414; Casualties of War, 415; Catholic Admirals, The, 319; Catholic Loyalty, 558; Catholic Senator and Deputies, 122; Combes and a Sister of Charity, 198; Depopulation Peril, The, 534; Godless Education, 463; Mass for Members of Paris Bar, Killed, 222; Nativity Prize. A, 199; Patriotic Record of Clergy, 510; President and Cardinal at Paris Requiem Mass, 223; Priests, Slandered, 26; Red Cross Societies, 1; Religious Conditions, 367; Renaudel Bill, Defeat of the, 439; Vote of Confidence in the Government, 271; War Credits, The, 582; War-Cripples, Helping the, 146; War Orphans, Rights of	50
Germany: Chancellor and Peace, 247; Alliance with Austria, 295; Allies' Economic Compact, 391; Anti-American Policy, No, 2; Appeal to Peasant Women, 486; Bavarian Soldiers Recalled, 146; Chancellor a Storm Center, 342; Changes in Ministry, 170; Conquests in War, 390; Delbrueck's Resignation, 122; Deutschland Home Safe, 486; Emperor, The, at Mass, 27; Food Problem, The, 439; Prices, Fall in, 588; German Aims, 2; Rule in Poland, 98; Germany and the U. S., 146; Goltz, Death of Baron von der, 51; Merchant Marine, The, 558; Navy Honored, 199; Peace or the Sword, 223; Peasant Women, An Appeal to, 486; Press Censorship, 463; Prisoners in Russia, 511; Rumano-Servian Treaty, 27; Socialism Divided, 415; Trade and Finance, 319; Von Hindenburg Promoted, 511; War Loan, 535; Chancellor's Speech, 606; Reserve Troops	606
Great Britain: Agriculture in England and Wales, 416; American Sympathy, Alienating, 464; Birth-Rate, 343; Casement's Sentence, 295; Catholic Education, 583; Charitable Funds, Private, 512; Children in Factories, 440; Churchill's Criticisms, 199; Conscription, 27; 74; 99; 122; 146; 171; Educational Reform, 511· Finances, 3; Intemperance, Decrease of, 535; Kitchener's Death, 223; Lloyd George, The Career of, 319; Military Expenditures, 171; A Useless Campaign and the Navy, 368; Taxation Increased, Direct, 147; Vatican, New Minister at the, 463; Whiteside, Archbishop, Letter of, 51; Women Workers, 487; A Catholic Lord Mayor, 606; Cost of the War	607
Holland: Queen Wilhelmina's Throne Speech	583
Home News: Appropriations, 390; Car Strike, The New York, 557; Congress Adjourns, 533; Danish West Indies, 389; 414; 437; Democratic Convention, The, 245; Eight-Hour Railway Bill, 486; Mexican Affair, The, 293; 317; 438; Withdrawal Correspondence, 365; Carranza's Reply, 413; Commission, 485; Villa at Chihuahua, 581; Hughes, Charles E., Nominated for President, 221; States the Issues, 413; Railway Difficulty, The, 486; Strike, 509; Trainmen's Difficulties, 461; Wilson, President, and Carranza, 269; Speech on Mexico, 294; 341; Notified of Nomination	510
Hungary: Friendship for U. S., 583; Rumania's Action, 535; Tisza, Opposition to Premier	558
Ireland: Belfast Conference, The, 271; Bishop O'Dwyer and General Maxwell, 247; Casement's Execution, 416; Crimeless Assizes, 3; Conference, An Irish, 487; Emigration Statistics, 559; Four Courts Inquiry, The, 487; Gaelic Language, Interest in the, 27; Harmony, A Plea for, 512; Home Rule Debate, 391; A Convert to, 536; Infant Mortality and Housing Problems, 584; Irish Party, Statement by the, 199; Irish Conference, An, 487; Lloyd George's Position, 171; Plan, 296; Proposals, 320; Maxwell, General, Charges against, 440; National Feeling, 368; Provisional Government, 344; Repressive Measures, 75; Self-Government Plan, 3; Sinn Fein Revolt, 74; 99; 123; 147; Skeffington, Shooting of F. S., 224; Inquiry into, 487; Irish Nation League	607
Italy: Boselli Cabinet, 248; Campagna, The Wastes of the, 559; Census Figures, 75; Masonic Propaganda	488
Japan: Russo-Japanese Alliance, 320; New Policy	607
Mexico: Attitude Towards Americans, 28; Carranza Note, Estimate of, 200; Lawlessness, 560; Internal Affairs, 392; 608; International Relations, 124; 248; Mexican-American Peace Commission, 389; 559; 608; Nation, A Rotting, 224; Persecution of Clergy, 536; Press and the Church, 248; Religion, Attacks on, 124; Religious Liberty, 3: 76; Villa, Pursuit of, 4; War, Morals, Religion, 52; Yucatan, Conditions in, 101; Persecutions	148
Rome: Catholics and the Cabinet, 392; Centenaries of Pope St. Leo III and Innocent III, 148; Jogues', Father, Cause of Beatification, 512; Pope's Hospital Plans Successful, 172; the Ambassadors of the Pope, 272; and War Prisoners, 296; 584; and the Ladies of Denmark, 320; and the Peace Congress, 464; 536; Vatican Council, Will it be Reopened?	124
Spain: Catholic Noblemen's Association, 52; Press Campaign, 272; Cervantes Institute, 52; High Cost of Living, 52; La Cierva's Politics, 272; Martial Law, 344; Mella and Maura, 172; Merchant Marine, 560; Dato Betrays Maura, 464; Elections, The, 76; Railway, Strike, The, 488; Regionalism and Catalonia, 296; Riots in Madrid, 4; Societies, Catechetical, 344; University, A New	584
War: Allies Gain in Picardy, 510; American Note to Germany, 49; Austrian Offensive in Alps, 145; in Trentino 169; 197; Appam Case, 390; British, Blockade, 318; in Picardy, 294; 582; Blacklist, British, 366; 390; Deutschland, The, 318; French Victories on Meuse, 414; German Note to U. S., 26; 97; 121; Goritz Captured, 438; Greece Yields to Allies, 271; Italy Declares War on Germany, 486; Kut, Surrender of, 73; Lemberg, 366; 390; Russian Offensive, 246; 270; 318; 414; 439; 462; 510; Sea-Fight, 198; Somme, Battle of, 318; 342; 462; Trebizond, Capture of, 49; U. S. Note to Austria, 294; Verdun, 1; 26; 169; 197; Wilhelmina Case	342

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV, No. 1 } WHOLE No. 366 } APRIL 15, 1916 { PRICE, 10 CENTS { $3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, April 4, p. m.-April 11, a. m.—The Fight for Verdun. France: The Red Cross Societies. Germany: German Aims Described—No Anti-American Policy. Great Britain: Finances. Ireland: A Crimeless Country—A Program. Mexico: Religious Conditions—The Fox Hunt. Spain: Riots.....1-4

TOPICS OF INTEREST

An Irish Centenary—The Boys of Our City—The Age and Stage of Shakespeare—A Roman Holiday—Hilaire Belloc: a Little Appreciation. 5-13

COMMUNICATIONS

Solecisms—"Four Times Three Are Twelve"—"The Need of a Mr. Sumner—The National Board of Censors 13

EDITORIALS

Just Seven!—France Is Not Mad—Good Friday for Peace—Dr. Flexner's "Modern School"—The American Indian—A Catholic Business Man 14-16

LITERATURE

XXIV–Cervantes.

REVIEWS: History of Dogma—Is Schism Lawful?—The New Pelagianism—Songs of the Son of Isai.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Where the Path Breaks"—"Mary Allen"—"Mechanism of Discourses"—"Summa Theologica"—"Manual of Episcopal Ceremonies"—"Stamboul Nights"—"Behold the Woman"—"The Ocean Sleuth"—"The Heir of Duncarron"—"High Tide"—"Geraldine Farrar"—"The Mastering of Mexico"—"English Grammar Simplified"—"A Second Reader"—"High School Exercises in Grammar."

BOOKS RECEIVED 17-20

EDUCATION

II–The Boy and the Boarding School.....21, 22

SOCIOLOGY

On the East Side.....22, 23

NOTE AND COMMENT

Death of Mgr. John A. Lyons, V.G.—Charles Francis Adams on Harvard's "System"—Need of Catholic Schools in Texas—Catholic Statistics for 1916 .....23, 24

CHRONICLE

The War.—Only meager results have been obtained by the military operations on the various battlefields. In Belgium, the Germans succeeded in recapturing a portion of the ground recently gained by British troops south of St. Eloi. Increased activity is reported at many points along the Italian frontier, but neither Austrians nor Italians claim any marked advance. The Russians have resumed their offensive in the Lake Narotch district, east of Vilna, but without notable success. In Armenia, the Turks have lost an important position in the Upper Tchoruk region, northwest of Erzerum. In Mesopotamia the British relief force, which is again advancing up the Tigris, has taken Umm-el-Hanna and Felahie. Elsewhere the situation remains unchanged.

Bulletin, April 4, p. m.-April 11, a. m.

In the fight for Verdun, the French and Germans have both had considerable success. West of the Meuse the Germans have pressed forward, but east of the river the substantial gains have been on the side of the French. In the latter section, the Germans, having captured Vaux and the northern portion of the Caillette woods, attempted to gain an important advantage by taking the heights that lie south of the village. The French not only prevented this, but drove the Germans out of some of the positions they gained last week, so that at present the western part of Vaux is again in French hands. Nor is this all. The French have retaken all of the Caillette woods and have forced the Germans to retire in a northeasterly direction to the Haudaumont woods. The latter, therefore, although they are still attacking the main northeastern defenses of Verdun, have been unable to penetrate them, and the French, in spite of a destructive fire directed against their line from Douaumont to Vaux, have the situation well in hand.

The Fight for Verdun

West of the Meuse the Germans were more successful. After the French had withdrawn to the south bank of the Forges Brook, the Germans attacked the village of Haucourt, surrounded it on three sides, and compelled its evacuation. Later they made a series of attacks on the French positions to the southwest of Haucourt, between the village and Hill 287, and they claim, although the claim is only partially admitted by the French, to have taken the entire ridge of Termiten Hill. This advance represented a gain on a front of a mile and a half, and seriously menaced Bethincourt. The town was accordingly abandoned by the French, and their line was reconstructed with the apex of the salient at Mort Homme Hill. The Germans proceeded at once to attack with great violence the new positions and took 500 yards of French trenches on Hill 295.

France.—The French Red Cross is not one single society. It is composed of these three independent, self-governing bodies: "The French Society of Aid to Wounded Soldiers," the oldest and most aristocratic of the three; "The Union of the Women of France," in which are found more especially the women of the industrial and commercial world; "The Association of French Ladies," composed of ladies of the middle class. These bodies, however, though remaining distinct, have combined their action and worked together harmoniously.

The Red Cross Societies

At the beginning of the war, "The Society of Aid to Wounded Soldiers" had 300 hospitals with 16,000 beds; "The Women of France," 190 hospitals with 10,000 beds; "The French Ladies," 100 hospitals with 6,000 beds. But this number proved inadequate to the needs, and the three Societies were obliged to increase their equipment and their staffs. In January, 1916, "The Society of Aid to Wounded Soldiers" had 796 hospitals, with more than 67,000 beds; "The Women of France," 353 hospitals with 29,000 beds; "The French Ladies," 350 hospitals with 22,000 beds. The service is ensured by nurses, all volunteers, equipping themselves, providing for their own upkeep and paying a subscription to their respective societies. At the present time, "The Society of Aid to Wounded Soldiers" has more than 15,000 certificated nurses; "The Women of France" more than 9,000, aided by 18,000 assistants; "The French Ladies" more than 16,000 field nurses. "The Society of Aid to Wounded Soldiers" has so far lost 22 nurses actually killed at the front or dying from diseases contracted in their work. Nurses have accompanied the French expeditionary corps to Lemnos and Salonika, and are tending the sick and the wounded on the hospital-ships returning from the East. The Bulletin de l'Alliance Française pays a well-deserved tribute to these generous women. It is to be hoped that this paper will not leave unacknowledged the services of the numerous Sisters who are working for the same noble cause.

Germany.—Questions of the greatest importance were freely discussed by the Imperial Chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann Hollweg, in the Reichstag's session of April 5.

German Aims Described

It was the most comprehensive speech of the war-period. He began by reviewing the military situation, the failure of the Dardanelles enterprise, the victory of the Central Powers in Serbia, Montenegro, and Albania, the frustration of the English relief force, the Russian advance now checked by the Turks, the unbroken Austrian and German fronts, and the gains at Verdun, showing that "the enemy's reports that Germany's military forces have been exhausted are erroneous." The hope of starving Germany into submission, he said, "by making war upon the women and children of the country and violating the trade of neutrals" was fatuous. "The American note of November 5, 1915, gave an exact description of English violations of international law. But as far as I know it has not been answered up to this day." He explained, too, the Government's attitude toward the different small nationalities and races, Belgian, Lithuanian, Polish and Flemish. Germany could never consent that Belgium be turned into a military and economic fortress of the foe and be made a vassal of France or England. He gave the assurance that the Belgians would be free to develop according to their natural gifts, their language, and their racial character; but a future war must be averted. Germany's withdrawal from the "new Belgium" would be conditioned upon sufficient guarantees; moreover, the Flemish inhabitants must be assured an opportunity of developing upon the basis of "their Netherlandish language and characteristics." Poland must be freed forever from the hand of "a reactionary Russia." The Chancellor asserted that if the principle of nationalities is to be maintained, "which the English Premier says he labors to uphold, then he may believe that Germany will never of her own free hand deliver to the Russians the territory between the Baltic and the Volhynian swamps which was freed by her and her allies, no matter whether peopled by Poles, Lithuanians, Balts or Livonians." The peace of the world, he held, must be assured by giving all the various nationalities the chance of free development along the lines of racial characteristics. The report that at the end of the war Germany would "rush against the American continent," he described as "the silliest of all imputations invented against us. We fight for our existence and our future, for Germany and for no foot of foreign soil." The object of Germany's enemies, he said, was to destroy a united, free Germany, to weaken it and make it a prey to the domination of its neighbors, "Europe's scapegoat."

Of equal importance were the positive statements of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, von Jagow, as reported by a correspondent of the Associated Press. The story that Germany was planning to invade the American continent to demand the secession of Canada he characterized as utterly senseless. He then proceeded to say:

No Anti-American Policy

> Equally ridiculous, though unfortunately this phase has a serious side, are rumors which I understand are current here and there in the United States, that Germany after the war will take revenge on the United States by pursuing an anti-American policy. It is even reported to me that some apprehensive souls in America foresee from victorious Germany an attempt to break down the Monroe Doctrine, plant its flag in South or Central America, or even a design to leap upon the United States and crush them in order to attain mastery of both continents.

All such rumors, "set afloat from time to time by enemies of Germany in the evident intention of stirring feeling," he pronounced too absurd for denial, and declared that Germany, in spite of her extensive commercial interests, has given the United States a free hand in the Mexican crisis. He claimed that at times the attitude of the Washington Government has appeared somewhat forced. "We even think," he said, "that there might have been a basis for the stories about an understanding of some sort between Washington and the Allies." Yet, whatever jingoes in both countries might say, there was no thought of "taking revenge" in the mind of any responsible German official. "The permanent interests of Germany nowhere run counter to those of the United States. On the contrary they everywhere require the United States and Germany to be friends. For this reason reports attributing to the German Government an intention of pursuing an anti-American policy after the war are absurd."

Great Britain.—New light has been thrown on the condition of British finances by a recent address of the editor of the Statist, Sir George Paish. In the first eight months of the war the expenditure was $2,985,000,000; in the last twelve months, $7,000,000,000; in the coming year the expenditure will reach the vast sum of $9,775,000,000. For the first twenty months of war the expenses were about $10,000,000,000; of this $1,650,000,000 was raised by taxation and $8,510,000,000 by loan. In the next fiscal year the revenue will probably amount to $1,650,000,000; there will be a deficit necessitating a loan of $8,125,000,000. Before the war the national income was $12,000,000,000, and the accumulated wealth was $85,000,000,000. Besides the wealth at home, $20,000,000,000 had been put into foreign investments. According to Paish the nation's income had risen since the war began from about $12,000,000,000 to some $15,000,000,000. Meanwhile the national debt is growing. Before the outbreak of hostilities it was $3,535,000,000; at the end of March, 1915, $6,640,000,000; at the end of March, 1916, $12,000,000,000. If the war continues another year the total debt will be about $20,000,000,000. In this connection it is interesting to note that, despite the call for economy in expenditure, the consumption of tobacco increased enormously during the year 1915. In 1914, 110,983,215 pounds were used; in 1915, 116,580,700 pounds, an increase of 5,597,485 pounds exclusive of the tobacco supplied "duty free" to the trenches, military hospitals, etc.

Finances

Ireland.—The Assizes have demonstrated that Ireland is probably the most crimeless country in the world. Almost everywhere the judges were presented with white gloves, the traditional symbol of a crimeless circuit. Only in one or two instances were the gloves withheld and that for cases of a trivial nature. "The criminal calendar of the country," says The Weekly Freeman, "is practically empty." This freedom from crime at a time of intense political excitement is an extraordinary fact in itself; yet it is no unusual phenomenon in Ireland. In view of this remarkable situation, The Weekly Freeman expresses the belief that the country is over-policed. Ireland swarms with "Inspectors-General," "County Inspectors," "District Inspectors," "Superintendents," etc., and policemen. In the "Royal Irish Constabulary" there are 11,000 men, and in the "Dublin Police" there are over 1,000, to keep an eye on crime in a crimeless country. The force could be easily reduced and thus decrease the burden of an over-taxed people.

A Crimeless Country

In a thoughtful article, "Ireland Waiting," written for New Ireland, Mr. J. Cleric Sheridan expresses the belief that at the end of the war a resolute Ireland with a reasonable and well-considered plan can have all she wants for the taking, but it should be as far as possible a plan formed and matured at an Irish national conference. He thus presents the four constituent parts of his plan: (1) The purpose and determination to have self-government. (2) Readiness to do or to concede everything reasonable to win northeast Ulster and so have a united Ireland. (3) If northeast Ulster refuses to be reconciled, determination to go on without her, but leaving an open door for her entry when she chooses. (4) Resolution to have fiscal independence as the essential part of self-government. The writer adds that there can be no claim for fiscal independence unless the nation is resolved to pay its own way, and he maintains that the revenues of Ireland are ample, if well used, for all the requirements of good and progressive government.

A Program

Mexico.—Religious conditions were never more chaotic than they are at present. Persecution is violent and persistent. No respect is shown to God, religion or the instruments of religion. A recent issue of Democrata contains a new and oppressive decree regulating "the conduct of Catholic priests" in the State of Hidalgo The document is like all the others issued by the bandit-chiefs, impudent, tyrannical and entirely destructive of all liberty of worship. The Sacraments are still mocked publicly, Sisters and priests are still sent into exile, church furniture, sacristies and even churches are undergoing destruction.

Religious Conditions

A short time since the following words were ceremoniously pronounced over a child, in Mexquiahala de Juarez: "I baptize thee in the name of the august Mexican trinity, Michael Hidalgo y Castillo, Joseph Mary Morelos, and the blessed apostle, Benito Juarez. . . ." Forty exiled nuns arrived in New York on Tuesday, April 4; they had been driven from Mexico by Carranza, as "dangerous to the State." They have made interesting affidavits which will be published as occasion demands. The Arizona Daily Star of March 28 relates that the priests expelled from Sonora are beginning to arrive at Tucson in a penniless condition. The paper says in part:

> Neither of the priests will talk of their experiences in Mexico, for they do not wish to say anything that will endanger the lives of hundreds of others of their co-religionists who have not yet reached the border. It is stated that the order of expulsion is sweeping and that all churches are being closed and the priests deported. The priest at the altar was ordered to leave, come to Tucson overland, and the church was turned into a public library. The church at Hermosillo is said to have been turned into a public school. . . .
>
> It is reported that the exodus is just starting, and that it will be several months before the edict can be enforced in Tepic, Sinaloa and other States further south.
>
> There are numerous priests at Nogales, but the arrivals Saturday and yesterday were the first in Tucson. Tucson Catholics, under the leadership of Bishop Granjon, are prepared to take care of all who arrive, and they will not be allowed to want on account of exile from the country where they have lived for so many years.

The last calendar of the Presbyterian church, Englewood, New Jersey, contains this item about this matter:

One of our workers, Dr. Robert McLean, is in the thick of things on the national border with Mexico. He says: "No one not on the spot can form an adequate idea of conditions in Mexico. The men are fighting like demons, and the women and children are practically homeless and suffering intensely. The man has not yet appeared who can bring order out of the war-torn chaos. I see priests, friars and nuns hurrying across the border. . . ."

Merida was recently en fête to celebrate the victory of Carranza. The Cathedral was thrown open for the first time in many months and impious harangues were delivered from the pulpit; statues were burned and the sacristy of the "Third Order," a noted church in the city, was demolished. The following extract from a letter written in Merida shows the anguish of soul suffered by the better class of people:

Yesterday, in the hall of the "Third Order," they finished burning the statues of the Saints, and they are now destroying the sacristy of the aforesaid church. This demon (Alvarado) is more than a tyrant, and is striving to starve us to death. The accursed "Regulatory Law" is building up a vicious monopoly. Is it possible that nothing can be done for us?

Recently Our Sunday Visitor published a letter written from Guadalajara by an American Protestant lady to her brother, who resides in Huntington, Indiana. Some citations follow:

But all else as to abuse, horrible mistreatment, persecution of priests and nuns, the looting of schools, monasteries, churches, cathedrals, archbishops' palaces, priests' domiciles, the destruction of buildings, outrages of a most dastardly character, he [the Editor of Our Sunday Visitor] will find to have been facts in every city since April 1, 1915, the date of the beginning of Obregon's victories for Carranza. . . . Take any history of Mexico and learn of the centuries-old magnificent Guadalajara Cathedral, improved, of course, from time to time. Well, it is now a comparatively dilapidated ruin that will require years to restore. High, splendid iron fence torn away, seats torn out, elegant tiled floors torn up and thrown away to enable digging to be done, in search of treasures! The same diabolical treatment was served the Archbishop's palace across the way. There are eighty-five churches in Guadalajara, and on one pretext or another, each one of them has been subjected to this kind of abuse. Some have been ordered abandoned and destroyed; others have been reduced in size. You will call to mind the location of Boyd and Smith's American grocery store, and right opposite a very large, costly church. To reach supposed treasures, that part of the church containing the altar, a much higher structure than any in Huntington, was ordered torn down, and the work has been done. . . . You will also remember the two old churches between which San Francisco Street passes . . . structures of ancient architecture, grand old buildings, toward whose preservation most men of whatever religion would gladly contribute . . . These buildings were also ordered destroyed, but have stood the storm. Women of the congregation, reinforced by thousands from all over the city, occupied streets in all directions, . . . the day the soldiers appeared to begin the destruction. The women stood firm, wouldn't give an inch. The result was that as the soldiers could not get within 500 feet of the churches, they withdrew . . . There are instances of this kind all over the city, but I do not know the names of parishes and churches. . . .

Such is the work of Carranza, protector of religious liberty. Meantime, disease and famine are doing deadly work. On March 28, there were serious food riots in Torreon. Nearly 1,000 women and children participated. There was general looting; soldiers were ordered to fire on the mob, but refused. Shortly after this incident became known in the United States, the wires thrilled with the message that the merciful Carranza would grant bonuses to the poor. Each bonus will probably be a bullet, but then something must be printed to offset a bad impression and to show "how well the Mexican bandits are managing a difficult situation."

The Fox Hunt

The pursuit of Villa has become a real fox hunt. According to actual count the fox has been surrounded nine times, killed twice, and wounded once after his first death. The situation of our troops, now cut off from the United States by a well-equipped army of Mexicans, is critical in the extreme. Speculations on the possible outcome give rise to unpleasant thoughts. There is at present much perplexity in the popular mind about the real object for which the American troops were sent into Mexico. In his letter to the American people, President Wilson said: "An adequate force will be sent at once in pursuit of Villa, with the single object of capturing him and putting a stop to his forays." The official orders sent to General Funston declare: "These troops will be withdrawn to American territory as soon as the de facto government of Mexico is able to relieve them of this work. In any event, the work of these troops will be regarded as finished as soon as Villa's band or bands are known to be broken up."

Riots

Spain.—Some time ago Reuter's Agency announced riots in Madrid. The statement proved afterwards to be unfounded. But there have been serious labor troubles at Barcelona and recently the agitation has shifted to what is known as the "Levant" or "Eastern Coast." A food and wage problem faces the people and the authorities alike. The inhabitants of the district are naturally orderly and law-abiding, but they have been misled by paid agitators who see no other way to spread their anarchistic doctrines than by driving the people to extremes in their demands for redress of their just grievances. The storm-center was La Union, famous for its lead and copper mines, and only three miles distant from the historic town of Cartagena. An excited but, it must be said, a hungry and poorly paid mob stormed the provision and grain stores, and attacked the soldiers, who at last were ordered to fire. Seven persons were killed and over thirty wounded. The riot smouldered for a few days. The Captain-General of the district was finally chosen as arbiter to settle the differences between the employers and their workmen and his decision was accepted. But the labor conditions are far from satisfactory and the food and wage problem is decidedly alarming.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

An Irish Centenary

ON Good Friday, April 12, one hundred years ago, Charles Gavan Duffy, journalist, statesman and patriot, was born in the town of Monaghan, Ireland. On February 9, 1903, he died in France, at the age of eighty-seven.

We, who live in a free land, may well honor the memory of one whose whole life was inspired by ceaseless devotion to the cause of liberty, and to the freedom of his oppressed countrymen. The active animosity of the Orangemen toward his coreligionists, which he saw as a child, greatly influenced him in choosing his subsequent career. Born in Ulster, and in penal days, he could not but array himself on the side of the oppressed, who, he said, "learned their wrongs early."

On the religious side, he knew that the success of Catholic Emancipation, the great political movement of the day in Ireland, meant the freedom of his race from the domination of Orange ascendency. On the national side, he felt all that love of country natural to one in whose veins flowed the blood of the O'Duffys of Monaghan, and of those chiefs of Oriel and Truagh, McMahon and McKenna, leaders of the "Old Irish," who had never acknowledged the invaders' claims to their territories. It was logical that Gavan Duffy should embark on a career through which his ideas for his countrymen's welfare could best be advanced.

His first experience after his school days was in the office of the Northern Herald of Monaghan. At the age of twenty he made his way to Dublin, and after an apprenticeship in journalism of three years, he went to Belfast to become the editor of the newly-founded Vindicator, and was henceforth "called on to exercise authority instead of obeying it." All his spare time was spent in supplementing by lectures at Belfast College the rather fragmentary schooling of his early youth.

Among the Presbyterians of Ulster he found a group of men who, in spite of carefully-fostered religious prejudices, had a common source of interest with their Catholic neighbors in their love of Ireland and of the Celtic tongue and tradition. Encouraged by this fact, Duffy endeavored from the beginning of his editorship, through writing and argument, to bring together all who wished to advance the prosperity and liberty of Ireland. His interest in politics led him to the only profession which would help him to further such an aim. He determined to become a barrister. In Dublin for his first term, he met some young men with whom he was destined to be associated in the production of the Nation, a paper the plan of which had long been in his mind. He became its proprietor and editor.

O'Connell, the Liberator, had already won emancipation for Catholics and was the idol of the people. Following his lead, the youthful staff of the Nation made that journal's avowed object Repeal of the Union. From the start the Nation was a success, and its sentiments found approval in the hearts of a vast majority of the Irish, whose condition was desperate but whose religion bade them hope. Education had been denied for centuries to Catholic Ireland. The people might not learn their history or raise themselves by knowledge from a condition of serfdom. They, who had been the light-bearers to Western Europe, were compelled to live in the gloom of enforced illiteracy. The printed page being withheld from them, tradition alone was their guide. Around the turf fires of the "immemorial, holy land," the legends, the sorrows, and the glories of the race were recounted from generation to generation.

In the glowing pages of the Nation the people's hope found expression.

Davis, in song and essay, made known his idea of an historic nationality. John Dillon perpetually emphasized the impossible condition under which the peasantry lived. Gavan Duffy advocated the necessity of education for the people; that they should have an accurate knowledge of their history, their literature, their arts; and that they should know the resources and possibilities of their nation. The almost complete wreck of civilization, so far as the Irish in Ireland were concerned, had made a constructive policy of prime necessity. This the editors of the Nation keenly realized. Their success in reviving national spirit, and the enormous gatherings which had rallied to O'Connell's Repeal Movement so alarmed the Government that, in 1844, O'Connell and a number of his followers, including Gavan Duffy, were tried for sedition by a packed jury in Dublin, and condemned to imprisonment. Three months later they were released, the judicial members of the House of Lords determining that they had not been legally convicted.

A difference of opinion as to methods began to separate O'Connell and the Young Ireland Party. O'Connell, who had been considered well-nigh infallible by the people, felt deeply the setback which his arrest and imprisonment gave the movement of which he was the head. His intellectual vigor was beginning to be impaired by age, and he naturally, but unfortunately, became greatly dependent on the unsound advice of his son. Finally, his disbelief in the more active methods of the younger generation of Irishmen made a break inevitable, so the old and the new schools drifted apart.

But the Liberator's influence remained long in the minds of the people, and loyalty to his memory prevented their giving to the younger leaders that wholehearted devotion which might have achieved freedom for Ireland, the common end all had in view. Gavan Duffy and his friends were thus deprived of the power which acknowledged national leadership would have given them.

The Young Ireland paper had suffered a staggering blow by the death and illness of some of its original contributors; but Gavan Duffy, who, as editor, had brought together the most diverse elements, and who was the confidant and adviser of all connected with the patriotic movement, remained undaunted. He found new and able contributors, and a second Young Ireland Party continued to represent national aspirations.

At this time a fearful calamity fell upon Ireland; and the famine, foreseen but unprovided for, came, bringing in its wake fever and pestilence. For a time political conflicts were eclipsed by this disaster, but not for long. Revolution was in the air. A republic had been proclaimed in France, and Italy was seething with rebellion. The moment seemed propitious for urging Irish claims to freedom. Conditions in Ireland were intolerable. Free speech was banned. In the face of this, protests were made, but then the treason-felony act was brought into operation, which suppressed freedom of speech and liberty of the press in controversies on the Irish question.

Gavan Duffy felt it was his duty to protest anew, and did so in a long well-considered article called "The Creed of the Nation." He, with others, was arrested, became again a political prisoner and was tried for his life; but the Government failed to obtain a conviction, and for the second time he escaped. His friend, Thomas Carlyle, wrote him that he was "a Providential Man saved by Heaven for doing a man's work yet."

Land settlement was then, as it was for thirty years after, the most pressing problem in Ireland, and the Nation urged a land reform which would give security of tenure to the peasants. Duffy used this land issue to form a union between the Catholics of Ireland and the Presbyterians of the North, who had substantially the same grievance; and he founded the League of the North and South. Upon this issue he entered the British Parliament. Dissensions came and ruined the League and the independent Irish party, which, under Gavan Duffy's leadership, had appeared for the first time in the British Parliament. It seemed to Gavan Duffy as though his life work had gone for naught. He resigned his seat in Parliament and resolved to make a career for himself in some land more hopeful than his country which still lay in the shadow of the famine.

Falling in with the views of his friend, Edward Whitty, he went to Australia, where at once a career opened out to him which led him from one conspicuous success to another until he became Prime Minister. He, who seemed to have failed in Ireland, proved in free Australia his fitness to hold the highest office of State. The Irishman, Catholic and Felon, that type which could neither rule nor be ruled, the English said, proved himself to be the ablest administrator Australia had ever had. Having shown what was possible to an Irishman when free to advance, having proved his thesis, he deliberately answered the call of Ireland. He left the new country where he had gained success and honor, he left his friends and the family he had established there, and, returning to Europe, devoted himself to a labor which he had always in his mind, the fostering of an Irish culture. He founded the Irish Literary Society in London, and he initiated the New Ireland Library containing a series of books valuable to Irish people. His own literary work is voluminous; but to know him, the times he lived in, and the men he knew, one must read "Four Years of Irish History," "Young Ireland," and "My Life in Two Hemispheres," those complete and vivid records in which are enshrined the memory of an epoch and the fame of those great and faithful spirits whose utterance is so justly called "The Voice of the Nation."

Thomas Hughes Kelly.

The Boys of Our City

THE boys of our city are in grave danger. Lurking in the highways and byways of the city are evils and temptations which are growing in proportions and threatening to undermine and destroy the morals and faith of our young men. These boys, especially those of the poor and so-called middle classes, must struggle for place and existence in the great work-a-day life. When their day's labor is over they naturally seek recreation and, being without sufficient means to pay the cost of diversion in the safer places of amusement, they seek relaxation in places which they can afford to patronize.

They leave their homes of an evening and drift to the nearest street corner. And what a breeder of petty crimes, filth and immorality these corners are. Here they are thrown into contact with those agents of the devil, bad companions, who are well placed by their crafty master to accomplish the ruin of the innocent. Beginning with mischief, egged on by their vicious leaders, the boys often end in crime. Thus is taken the first step in their downfall.

The pool-room, too, is a favorite gathering-place. The danger of these rooms cannot be exaggerated; for they are the very incubators of impurity and crime. These places are frequently the rendezvous of those soulless vipers who sustain themselves in sensual comfort by the illicit earnings of the fallen woman. They ply their trade largely in these pool-rooms and lure to destruction the victims coming into their clutches. Gambling, too, petty and otherwise, which is the bane of so many a boy's existence, flourishes here. In these places young men are taught how to recoup their losses and to satisfy their lust for the game by theft and embezzlement. Conversation is indecent and leads, Heaven knows where. Thus morals are ruined.

The concert hall, as we knew it, is no more; but a worthy successor to it has been found in the burlesque theater. These low-class houses offer each week plays reeking with immorality. Their chief attractions are coarse women in scanty garb, and coarse acting made up of suggestive situations and stories. More than half of the audience attending these iniquitous performances are boys under twenty-one years of age; a goodly number of these are not eighteen years old. Stand at the entrance of one of these houses after the play and you will be appalled at the number of youngsters still in knickerbockers pouring out of the gallery exits. For ten or fifteen cents these boys witness enough iniquity in a few hours to destroy an army of hardened souls, to say nothing of the weak soul of youth. The disaster wrought by these indecent plays cannot be fully appreciated. Add to all these dangers, improper surroundings at home, poor economic conditions, etc., and some idea of the boys' difficulties may be had. Besides the dangers which threaten to destroy the morals of the boy, there are other agencies which menace the salvation of his soul by luring him from his holy Faith.

The Y. M. C. A. is chief among these. Tempted by low dues and the athletic features, many of our boys enroll themselves as members in this Association. That associations of this kind are anti-Catholic in spirit is now beyond doubt. It may be that it is not the avowed intention of the Y. M. C. A. to undermine the faith of its Catholic members, but intentions cannot alter effects. The fact is that the atmosphere is not Catholic, and that unobtrusive proselyting is undertaken through social sessions and lecture courses. Furthermore, this is done very carefully so as not to offend, and here lies the danger, for when the boy is off his guard, the seed of unbelief takes ready root in his heart.

It may be argued that our boys should be well enough versed in their religion to counteract any influence that these agencies may exert. The sad fact is, though, that most of them are not well enough grounded in the principles of the Faith to recognize heresy when it is preached, and even if they were, who of them is skilful enough to play constantly with fire without being burnt?

Besides the Y. M. C. A., there are in our city two social organizations promoted by local Episcopalian congregations, which appeal directly to the young man of limited means. While accurate figures are not available, it is a well-known fact that a great number, if not a majority, of the members of these two societies are Catholics. Made attractive by pleasant surroundings and interesting social events, these clubs exert their insidious influence over the Catholic members. Non-Catholic environment induces easy toleration of the Protestant religion; out of this grows indifference and from that springs sympathy for the doctrines preached by non-Catholics. Moreover, informal dances and other functions which are so attractive to the young man bring him in close association with non-Catholic girls and this leads frequently to courtship and mixed marriages. We need not dwell upon the danger of the mixed marriage, for the Church through bitter experience knows well that the marriage of a man with a woman not of the Catholic Faith generally marks the departure of that man from the Church.

That these difficulties present a serious problem and that great evils are menacing the future welfare of a great number of our boys is apparent to him who will but open his mind to the seriousness of the situation. Something must be done to counteract these bad influences; earnest and prompt action must be taken to combat these forces for evil. But what shall be done to accomplish practical results? In Cincinnati several movements have been launched which promise to go a long way toward leading the boy from waywardness and removing the dangers threatening to rob him of his faith.

For the younger boy, whose age brings him within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court, there has been formed a volunteer probation officers' association. Two representatives from each parish have been invited to affiliate themselves with the association; the plan being to have the officers in each parish take care of the cases arising in their parish. The probation officer is more than a mere court officer, and when a case is placed in his hands it is his duty to take charge of the boy, not as a policeman, but as a helpmate to guide the boy's faltering footsteps until he acquires sufficient moral strength to blaze his own path of virtue through life.

There is also in Cincinnati an institution known as the "Boys' Home of Cincinnati," which was founded in the year 1885 by Miss Margaret McCabe. A short time ago the Home was taken over by the diocese and is now conducted by a board of directors under the supervision of the Archbishop. The Home receives boys from the ages of fourteen to twenty, and its object is to protect, educate and shelter newsboys, working boys and homeless boys generally. The scope of the institution can best be exemplified by quoting from the statement of the board of trustees:

> Every one must realize only too well the temptations that surround boys in a large city, and it is our aim to protect these waifs, to educate and assist them, in order that they may occupy positions of honor and trust in later life. They are our brethren in the Faith, poor, helpless little ones thrown upon the mercy of a cold world, oftentimes by unnatural parents, and if we fail to rescue them, perhaps they will wander upon the road that leads to destruction.

The Home cares for about fifty boys, who are accepted at the discretion of the board of trustees.

There is another splendid institution for homeless boys over seventeen years old. This is called the Fenwick Club. It was established by a group of zealous Catholic men to supply an abode for such boys. The Fenwick Club is not a charitable organization, but supplies room and board to worthy boys at the lowest possible rates, which range from about $4.00 to $7.00 per week, making it possible for worthy, industrious boys to get a good home amid wholesome Catholic surroundings. While there is nothing of the institutional air about the Club to make its inmates feel that they are in a boarding-school, yet there is a chaplain in charge of the building, who carefully watches over the boys and guides them aright. Entertainments are provided and the house made as cheerful and homelike as possible so that the boys are induced to spend their evenings at home instead of away in the resorts of vice. At the present time the Home can lodge only about fifty boys, but there will be no cessation of the efforts of those behind the movement, until adequate facilities to care for all who are worthy are provided. The undertaking is not easy, but we feel that the people of Cincinnati must sooner or later appreciate what the Fenwick Club means to the boys of Cincinnati. Then they will give it their unstinted aid and support.

Steps have also been taken to meet the problem presented by the Y. M. C. A., and the sectarian parish clubs mentioned above. About eight years ago a group of young men, headed by a Franciscan Father, organized the "Friar Gymnasium." Humble in its beginning the Friars gradually flourished, until today the club claims over three hundred members and boasts of a gymnasium, swimming pool and social rooms second to none in the city. The Friars is not a parish club, but is an independent organization open to all Catholic boys of the city. Its dues are moderate and within the means of every boy who works. It is the ambition of the Friars to inaugurate lecture courses and eventually evening classes so that there will be absolutely no reason for Catholic boys joining anti-Catholic associations.

All these movements are virtually in their infancy, but each is noble and commendable. Their scope, however, must become broader, and more must be done to wage a winning war for the boys. To accomplish this, though, great financial support is needed. Here, indeed, is a wonderful field for Catholic charity, for what more meritorious act could a person perform than to write his name in the hearts of the boys by assisting to save their immortal souls? For some reason, however, many Catholics who could give assistance have not yet opened their eyes to the dangers that surround our boys. The leaders of these various activities, however, imbued with the fervent desire to promote the Catholic cause will continue to struggle with the problem untiringly and patiently until, by the grace of God, they receive the necessary aid to put every boy out of danger.

Cincinnati. ALFRED T. GEISLER.

The Age and Stage of Shakespeare

THE drama of Shakespeare's time is a child of the Middle Ages and also of the Renaissance; it is eloquent of an old England and of a new. Everywhere, but notably in the works of Shakespeare himself, we find the essential ideas, the underlying criticism of life, medieval in the best sense; Shakespeare is Christian and Catholic, though sometimes only negatively or inferentially so. But the themes, the types of character, the fine analysis, the brilliant garb of Elizabethan drama, are sprung of the classic and pagan, or semi-pagan, revival. In another way, too, the drama speaks to us of the clashing forces of that fervid sixteenth century. Whether Catholic or pagan, medieval or classical, it found itself confronted with the bitter hostility of Puritanism.

England had come late into the stream of the Renaissance. Italy, France, the Rhinelands, had been before her. Towards the printed books and manuscripts, the scholarship, the refinements of those countries, educated and patriotic Englishmen looked with envy during the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward and Mary, and were eager to make good the national deficiencies by imitation of classic and modern models. It is not surprising that one of the most remarkable developments of the period was the school drama. At first cultivated chiefly for scholastic purposes, it gradually developed, especially in the universities, into a varied and elaborate entertainment. Sometimes ancient Latin or Greek plays were given,—"Seneca cannot be too heavy or Plautus too light," said Polonius of these efforts; sometimes modern plays appeared in Latin; sometimes there were vernacular pieces which usually strove hard to copy antique models. The artists and patrons of these plays regarded the theater of the rude populace with much contempt, nor did they relax this attitude even when a Ben Jonson and a Shakespeare lent luster to the opposite camp.

At the court of sovereigns who, like the Tudors, were familiar with classical lore, theatrical entertainments naturally borrowed much of their substance from the wits of the universities. But more and more did the glamor of material splendors eclipse the abstract charms of Seneca and Plautus, and the crowded brilliancy of the masque displace the tirades of tragedy and the repartee of comedy. "Their shoes were azure and gold, set with rubies and diamonds." Such an item, torn from the account of a Twelfth-Night masque given before James I, sufficiently helps the imagination to picture what the total gorgeousness of these court-pageants must have been.

Among the masses the taste for stage-plays was no less marked than among their cultured superiors. But the surroundings amid which it was gratified were as different as possible from anything academic or courtly. In the popular theaters the rude simplicity of medieval manner remained, with an added note of dishonor. The crude horrors and exuberant rhetoric of Senecan tragedy came indeed into circulation, but hardly did any classical refinement slip in among the traditions of the miracle, mystery and morality plays, with their abundant comicalities. The performers were legally outcasts, ranked with common vagabonds, liable to be whipped from parish to parish. Their booths were not tolerated within city-walls, sober burgesses and women who valued their reputation kept aloof from their doors. No female appeared on the stage; if a respectable woman, drawn by irresistible curiosity, ventured into the gallery, she wore a mask. Under the hot sun or the pelting rain, the open pit seems to have presented an extraordinary spectacle of foulness and disorder, noise and horseplay, eating and drinking, smoking, card-playing and quarreling. It was amid such unpropitious surroundings that Jacques philosophized, Wolsey bade farewell to his greatness, and Ferdinand wooed Miranda. Usually no doubt, the entertainment was more conformable to the surroundings.

These various contrasts are piquant enough. But the stage, in all its forms alike, knew one watchful and unrelenting foe. The ban of Puritanism fell equally upon the costly revelries of the court, the Senecan mouthings of the college, the tragi-comedies dear to the multitude. The Puritans inherited the old quarrel of the Church's asceticism with the abuses of the theater, but knew nothing of the Church's discrimination and tolerance. They were gradually swelling to that pitch of intolerance and power which at last succeeded in closing all theaters on British soil (1640) as well as in sending play-loving kings, bishops and aristocrats to the block or into exile.

When Shakespeare was but an infant, the comparatively moderate Ascham had denounced plays among "the inchantementes of Circe, brought out of Italie to marre men's maners in England." But this was nothing to the furious onslaughts of thirty or forty years later. "Do they not maintain bawdry, insinuate foolery, and renew the remembrance of heathen idolatry?" thundered Philip Stubbes.

> Truly, if you will learn falsehood, if you will learn cozenage, if you will learn to swear, tear and blaspheme both heaven and earth, if you will learn to murder, flay, pick, steal, rob, if you will learn to deride, scoff, mock and flout, if you will learn to become proud, haughty and arrogant, and finally, if you will learn to contemn God and all His laws, to care neither for heaven nor hell, and to commit all kinds of sin and mischief, you need go to no other school; for all these good examples may you see painted before your eyes in interludes and plays.

Inspired by such preachings, the "City Fathers" of London petitioned the Privy Council in 1597 for the entire suppression of stage-plays in and around the city, alleging as just and sufficient reason the evil character of the plays, of the actors and of the audiences.

Students of Elizabethan drama are aware how largely it justifies the Puritan denunciations. Violent brutality, coarse license, extravagant passions finding vent in language and actions equally unmeasured, these are its too common characteristics. But the wonder is that side by side with these things there grew up and flourished so much that is entirely different and seemingly of a higher world. The wonder is that in the atmosphere of an Elizabethan playhouse such figures should have shone forth as Portia, Imogen, Cordelia and Miranda. The wonder is that such a rabble as constituted the bulk of the audiences could have endured the graceful word-play of "As You Like It," the poetry of "The Tempest," the psychology and ethics of the great tragedies. This is no small problem, one of the many riddles wherewith Elizabethan and, above all, Shakespearean drama continue to puzzle us.

The best attempt at a solution is that put forward by Rümelin. There was, he insists, among the grossness of the multitude who listened, or did not listen, during the performance of a Shakespeare play a notable seasoning, a leaven of more capable and refined auditors. Thus an element of keen and competent criticism was found in the playwrights and actors, attached to opposition theaters or temporarily out of work. This class will not appear too insignificant in numbers, if we remember how each theater relied upon writers of its own, not on printed books, for its repertoire, and employed its own body of actors. Naturally sharp rivalry prevailed, and every nerve would be strained to compel the applause of such professional judges, for on that depended to a large extent the success of the production.

More numerous and important, however, were the scions of rank, young bloods, men about town, often petulant and turbulent, but often, too, well-educated, quick-witted, cultured. These occupied places on the stage itself, the long, narrow Elizabethan stage, projecting out among the audience; there they dominated the vulgar herd, and dominated also, to no small extent, the players themselves. Dekker, who knew them well, wrote in his "Gull's Hornbook":

> On the very rushes where the comedy is to dance, yes, and under the state of Cambyses himself, must our feathered ostrich, like a piece of ordnance, be planted valiantly because impudently, beating down the mews and hisses of the opposed rascality. . . . By spreading your body on the stage and by being a justice in the examining of plays, you shall put yourself into such true scenical authority, that your poet shall not dare to present his muse rudely before your eyes. . . . You shall disgrace him worse than by tossing him in a blanket, or giving him the bastinado in a tavern, if in the middle of his play you rise with a screwed and discontented face from your stool to be gone.

This is irony and satire; but one can gather from it the other side of the truth. These "justices" were not always ostriches or gulls or geese. They included the Southamptons and Pembrokes, great lords who would seem to have associated familiarly with mere players. They included the gifted Sidneys and Dorsets, and many a golden youth who had conned or even acted his Sophocles and his Terence in home or foreign university. Few but influential, they prided themselves on maintaining a high critical standard against vulgar misjudgments; they listened with apprehension to the long oratorical tirades and the ingenious word-snapping, followed out the psychological developments and the cunning plot-entanglements, in a word they applauded in the plays all that modern criticism values in them, and the judicious censure of such men naturally had great weight with the players.

For such an auditory, then, for a coarse mass touched with a fine leaven, were the Shakespeare plays written; and its character helps us to understand their strange blends and inequalities.

George O'Neill,
National University, Dublin.

A Roman Holiday

NEW YORK was the center of the country's interest on Saturday evening, March 25, for a great "prize fight" was on. This was important not alone for New York, but for every town in the country. It so happened that on that night I passed through the streets of two large cities between half-past nine and eleven o'clock, and noting the crowds collected in front of the newspaper bulletin, I asked the reason for the gathering and was told with amused disdain that Willard and Moran were battling for the championship of the world at Madison Square Garden. I had known that the event was scheduled, but had forgotten the date, and foolishly thought for the moment that the crowds before the bulletins were reading the news of some great battle that was to settle the destiny of nations.

The next morning the only New York newspaper that I could get carried no European war news on the front page. In three papers, Mexico, as the climax of interest, occupied the right-hand column, but the left-hand first column had the fight, and not any mere European battles. Only once before since hostilities began, I believe, has the war news been pushed off the front page of the papers. That was the afternoon when "The New White Hope" whipped Jack Johnson. It so happened that some rather important engagements involving the lives of a multitude of men had taken place on both lines of battle, east and west, in Europe the night before. This news was released for the afternoon editions, but who cared to know about the death of a multitude in Europe, so long as this "twenty-four round go" between Two Big Men was being "pulled off" in Havana? The readers of the afternoon papers were sure to be so much more interested in every detail of the twenty-four rounds than in any mere human sacrifices for duty and principle, that editors gave them what they wanted and pushed the war news over to the next page.

The New York contest was not quite so absorbing, because after all it was "not to a finish." Some 12,000 people, however, were ready to spend $150,000, or was it $200,000?—I suppose we shall not know until the ten per cent is paid to the State—to see at more or less close range this contest of strength and science. The representative men of the city were all present, the judiciary well represented, the other professions had their places, and above all "wealth and beauty" were at the ring-side. The nearer the seats to the ring the better dressed were the occupants thereof, especially the women. For days the fight had been a topic of conversation in all circles, and I fancy it would be no exaggeration to say that ten million men spent several hours on Sunday reading the very detailed account in the morning papers of the contest of the night before.

Now there are people who find fault with this and who declare that it signifies that the animal in man unfortunately comes to the surface whenever it is not repressed. There are some who seem to think that man having reached a high stage of refinement, gentleness and care for others, should be above all such exhibitions of brutality. Such an exhibition, however, is apparently a most natural thing in an age of luxury. In this regard it is rather curiously interesting to note just what happened at Rome in the first and second centuries after Christ. When Rome became the capital of the civilized world and its citizens grew wealthy, a number of events occurred that are strangely anticipatory of events around us at the present time. The Romans became very much interested in art and architecture and in a certain kind of literature. They fêted litterateurs and artists and themselves lived a life of luxurious indolence. Perfumes and precious stones and fine silks were brought from the East and life became a succession of physical pleasures. The wealthy Romans usually had a villa on the sea, spent the severer months of the winter in the south of Italy, near Naples, and though citizens of Rome, lived where life would be the easiest and pleasure the readiest.

In Rome itself the men had their clubs—they called them baths—and every man who could went to his club for some exercise, massage at the hands of an attendant, a hot bath, a cool plunge, and then he was ready for his principal meal. Some of the men spent many hours each day at the club, discussing politics and other things, and "killing" time as best they could. The women had their clubs and they lionized the literary men and artists, wrote some poetry themselves, though none of it has lived, and were very much occupied with what they would have called culture, if that word had been invented at the time.

A succession of such pleasures, however, became very tame after a while and so the Romans had to have more exciting events. These were had in the amphitheater where gladiators fought with one another, and trained hunters fought with animals. There were dangers and blood and the zest of battle, and so life had some excitement in it. At first the gladiators only killed each other by accident, somewhat as happens occasionally in a prize fight, especially between "heavy-weights." After a time, however, death became almost the rule, for the audience demanded it. Nothing else would satisfy them, though refinement in the care of the body was constantly increasing at Rome at this time.

In the meantime as these exhibitions grew in popularity, art, literature and the drama declined. Art became mere imitation, while literature gradually dwindled in significance and the drama disappeared. The amphitheater eclipsed the theater, so that at the time when Rome was wealthy and refined and leisurely, and people had summer homes outside the city and sojourned in the south in winter, the theater as an intellectual institution, ceased to exist. Rome had had a native drama of considerable significance about two centuries before Christ when the city was little better than a collection of huts. Once wealth and refinement and luxury came, then all theatrical performances that caused people to think, disappeared.

In the midst of this refinement physical interests were more and more cultivated. After a time the gladiatorial fights did not furnish enough thrills, and so the Emperors during the persecution satisfied the appetite of the Romans for blood by causing the Christians to be thrown to the lions. It was the wealthy, refined, educated, bathing Romans who flocked to see the Christians die, but keenly regretted that they made no resistance, for then it would have been more exciting. Seats in the boxes closest to the ring-side doubtless cost at least as much as in Madison Square Garden. The Imperial box, apparently for safety sake, was at a considerable distance, but according to a well-known tradition Nero possessed some sort of contrivance made of crystal by which the contestants were brought very close to him. So popular did these forms of amusement become that whenever a politician wanted to curry favor with the Roman populace, he supplied them with food on a gala day and then paid all the expenses at the amphitheater, so that at least the ordinary citizens might be admitted free of charge.

With all this before us, it is very clear that ironic references to the culture represented by our best people who go to prize fights and reflected by the newspapers, which pay so much attention to these fights, and by ten million men who spend hours of a Sunday reading about them, are entirely out of place. This development of events is the most natural thing in the world. And if interest in the drama and in things intellectual generally should continue to dwindle among us, as they did at Rome, we shall repeat other phases of Roman history. We have their frequent divorces, their small families, and even their great bathing establishments, for do not our athletic clubs correspond in a very striking way to the Roman baths?

The cult of the body finally led to the disappearance of the Romans. I wonder if our "Roman holiday" has that meaning. I am quite free to confess that I do not know, but I think that it is an interesting subject for speculation.

James J. Walsh, M.D.

Hilaire Belloc: a Little Appreciation

When I first met Belloc he remarked to the friend who introduced us that he was in low spirits. His low spirits were and are more uproarious and enlivening than anybody else's high spirits. He talked into the night and left behind in it a glowing track of good things. When I have said that, I mean things that are good, and certainly not merely bons mots, I have said all that can be said in the most serious aspect about the man who has made the greatest fight for good things of all the men of my time.

We met behind a little Soho paper shop and a little Soho restaurant; his arms and pockets were stuffed with French Nationalist and French atheist newspapers. He wore a straw hat shading his eyes, which are like a sailor's, and emphasizing his Napoleonic chin. He was talking about King John, who, he positively assured me, was not, as was often asserted, the best king that ever reigned in England. Still, there were allowances to make for him; I mean King John, not Belloc. "He had been Regent," said Belloc with forbearance, "and in all the Middle Ages there is no example of a successful Regent." I, for one, had not come provided with any successful Regents with whom to counter this generalization; and when I came to think of it, it was true. I have noticed the same thing about many other sweeping statements coming from the same source.

The little restaurant to which we went had already become a haunt for three or four of us who held strong but unfashionable views about the South African War which was then in its earliest prestige. Many of us were writing on the Speaker, edited by Mr. J. L. Hammond with an independence of idealism to which I shall always think that we owe much of the cleaner political criticism of today; and Belloc himself was writing in it studies of what proved to be the most baffling irony. To understand how his Latin mastery, especially of historic and foreign things, made him a leader, it is necessary to appreciate something of the peculiar position of that isolated group of "pro-Boers." We were a minority in a minority. Those who honestly disapproved of the Transvaal adventure were few in England; but even of those few a great number, probably the majority, opposed it for reasons not only different but almost contrary from ours. Many were pacifists, most were Cobdenites; the wisest were healthy but hazy Liberals who rightly felt the tradition of Gladstone to be a safer thing than the opportunism of the Liberal Imperialist. But we might, in one very real sense, be rightly described as pro-Boers. That is, we were much more insistent that the Boers were right in fighting than that the English were wrong in fighting. We disliked cosmopolitan peace almost as much as cosmopolitan war; and it was hard to say whether we despised more those who praised war for the gain of money, or those who blamed war for the loss of it. Not a few men then young were already predisposed to this attitude; Mr. F. Y. Eccles, a French scholar and critic of an authority perhaps too fine for fame, was in possession of the whole classical case against this sort of piratical imperialism; Mr. Hammond himself, with a careful magnanimity, always attacked imperialism as a false religion and not merely as a conscious fraud; and I myself had my own hobby of the romance of small things, including small commonwealths. But to all these Belloc entered like a man armed, and as a clang of iron. He brought with him news from the fronts of history; that French arts could again be rescued by French arms; that cynical imperialism not only should be fought, but could be fought and was being fought; that the street fighting which was for me a fairy-tale of the future was for him a fact of the past. There were many other uses of his genius, but I am speaking of this first effect of it upon our instinctive and sometimes groping ideals. What he brought into our dream was this Roman appetite for reality and for reason in action, and when he came through the doorway there entered with him the smell of danger.

There was in him another element of importance which clarified itself in this crisis. It was no small part of the irony in the man that different things strove against each other in him; and these not merely in the common human sense of good against evil, but one good thing against another. The unique attitude of the little group was summed up in him supremely in this; that he did and does humanly and heartily love England, not as a duty, but as a pleasure and almost as an indulgence; but that he hated as heartily what England was trying to become. Out of this appeared in his poetry a sort of fierce doubt or double-mindedness which cannot exist in vague or homogeneous Englishmen; something that occasionally amounted to a mixture of loving and loathing. It is marked, for instance, in the fine break in the middle of the happy song of camaraderie called "To the Balliol Men Still in South Africa."

I have said it before, and I say it again,
There was treason done and a false word spoken,
And England under the dregs of men,
And bribes about and a treaty broken.

It is supremely characteristic of the time that a weighty and respectable English weekly gravely offered to publish the poem if that central verse was omitted. This conflict of emotions has an even higher embodiment in that grand and mysterious poem called "The Leader," in which the ghost of the nobler militarism passes by to rebuke the lower,

And where had been the rout obscene
Was an army straight with pride,
A hundred thousand marching men,
Of squadrons twenty score,
And after them all the guns, the guns,
But She went on before.

Since that small riot of ours he may be said without exaggeration to have worked three revolutions; the first in all that was represented by his paper the Eyewitness, now the New Witness under a different editor, the repudiation of both Parliamentary parties for common and detailed corrupt practices; second, the alarum against the huge and silent approach of the servile State, using Socialists and anti-Socialists alike as its tools; and third, his recent campaign of public education in military affairs.

In all these he played the part that he had played for our little party of patriotic pro-Boers. He was a man of action in abstract things. There was supporting his audacity a great sobriety. It is in this sobriety, and perhaps in this only, that he is essentially French; that he belongs to the most individually prudent and the most collectively reckless of peoples. There is indeed a part of him that is romantic and, in a literal sense, erratic; but that is the English part. But the French people take care of the pence that the pounds may be careless of themselves. And Belloc is almost materialist in his details, that he may be what most Englishmen would call mystical, not to say monstrous, in his aim. In this he is quite in the tradition of the only country of successful revolutions. Precisely because France wishes to do wild things, the things must not be too wild. A wild Englishman like Blake or Shelley is content with dreaming them. How Latin is this combination between intellectual economy and energy can be seen by comparing Belloc with his great forerunner Cobbett, who made war on the same Whiggish wealth and secrecy and in defense of the same human dignity and domesticity. But Cobbett, being solely English, was extravagant in his language even about serious public things, and was wildly romantic even when he was merely right. But with Belloc the style is often restrained; it is the substance that is violent. There is many a paragraph of accusation he has written which might almost be called dull but for the dynamite of its meaning.

It is probable that I dealt too much with this phase of him, for it is the one in which he appears to me as something different and therefore dramatic. I have not spoken of those glorious and fantastic guide-books which are, as it were, the text-books of a whole science of erratics. In these he is borne beyond the world with those poets whom Keats conceived as supping at a celestial "Mermaid." But the "Mermaid" was English, and so was Keats. And though Hilaire Belloc may have a French name, I think that Peter Wanderwide was an Englishman!

I have said nothing of the most real thing about Belloc, his religion, because it is not within my purpose in this little appreciation, and nothing of the later attacks on him by the Newspaper Trust, because these are below my purpose. There are, of course, many other reasons for passing such matters over here, including the argument of space; but there is also a small reason of my own, which, if it is not exactly a secret, is at least a very natural ground of silence. It is that I entertain a very intimate confidence that in a very little while humanity will be saying, "Who was this So-and-So with whom Belloc seems to have debated?"

G. K. Chesterton.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Solecisms

To the Editor of America:

The very proper protest that Doctor Charles W. Heath makes in your last issue against your reviewer's rash correction of what was already right, emboldens me to offer a further protest against two solecisms that are fast becoming habitual. The first is the use of the word "archdiocese." Now, there is no such word. A bishop rules over a diocese, so does an archbishop; and his diocese no more becomes an "archdiocese" than his miter becomes an "arch-miter" or his hat an "arch-hat." This word, I believe, was first used in 1869 by Henry Edward Manning, a prelate who is responsible for more Catholic solecisms in the English language than any one in living memory. It was he who introduced the term against which my chief objection is directed. He used to refer to himself as "Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster," which, of course, he never was. Cardinal he was and Archbishop he was, but Cardinal-Archbishop he was not, because such a thing does not and never did exist. Cardinal-bishops are a definite rank in the Sacred College, so are Cardinal-priests and Cardinal-deacons; but because a Cardinal-priest happens at the same time to be an Archbishop, it does not make him, and it is a solecism to call him, a "Cardinal-Archbishop."

It is as easy to be right as wrong, and as easy to write "Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore," which is right, as it is to talk of "His Eminence the Cardinal-Archbishop of Baltimore," which is wrong.

Cardinal Henry Edward Manning was also responsible for the introduction into English of the term "Father" as applied to secular priests and this solecism is now so crystallized that it is hopeless to attempt to look for a return to the older and better way. It is a little odd that this has happened, for the "secular" priest, in ecclesiastical precedence, occupies a position superior to his "regular" brother, and I can remember venerable priests who insisted upon being called Mr. So-and-So, for this very reason. One might go on piling Pelion on Ossa, but may we venture to hope, Sir, that the "Cardinal-Archbishops" and the "archdioceses" will no longer mar the scholarly pages of America.

New York. A. P. F.

[The genial, if vigorous, "A. P. F." is wrong in his belief that the word "archdiocese" was first used by Cardinal Manning in the year 1869. The expression is found on page sixty-eight of the "United States Catholic Almanac" (now "The Catholic Directory") for 1837; it also occurs frequently in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Register" for 1846. Moreover it is hardly correct to say there is no such word as "archdiocese." Not only has this expression been current well-nigh ninety years at least, but it has, and has had for some time, the sanction of official usage. For instance, it occurs continually in the Papal decrees dividing or erecting dioceses. By way of example "A. P. F." may consult the decree on page eight of the Acta Apostolicæ Sedis for January 18, 1916, also the decree De Limitibus Archidioecesis Hydrunteriæ in the Acta for February 14, 1916. Some time since, "A. P. F.'s" objection against the word, "archdiocese," might have been urged with equal strength against the expression, "archbishop," to which he does not take exception. For the latter term was apparently first used by St. Athanasius in the fourth century, and it remained all but unknown in the West up to the ninth century. Just as "archbishop" gained vogue, so too, has "archdiocese." As regards Cardinal Archbishop: Can it be that "A. P. F." of the "rollicking" style wishes America to forget that the beloved Horace sings of usage:

Quem penes arbitrium est et jus et norma loquendi?

Moreover, America is not addicted to the hyphenated form, Cardinal-Archbishop. The limits of space forbid discussion of the responsibility of Cardinal Manning for the introduction of "Father" as applied to secular priests.—Ed. America.]

"Four Times Three Are Twelve"

To the Editor of America:

May I bother you to answer a question which is causing considerable annoyance among our teachers? I shall be very grateful for your decision. Which is accurate: "Four times three is twelve," or "Four times three are twelve"? "Four less three is one," "Four less two is two," or "Four less two are two"?

Villa Maria, Pa. S. M. C.

[Grammarians have been, and are still, so much at variance on this vexed question, and arithmeticians today, as in the past, are so much at variance in their practice in this matter, that it would be the height of rashness even to hazard anything like a certain decision on the rival claims of the singular and plural forms of the verb in expressions describing the operation of multiplication. Both expressions have the sanction of good usage and good authority. There is apparently a growing disinclination on the part of purists, formalists, and those who insist on grammatical correctness even at the sacrifice of idiom, to use anything but the plural, except where the multiplicand and minuend are the number "one." Their reluctance, however, is founded on personal prejudice rather than on any perfectly clear and decisive grammatical requirement. The usage one prefers depends largely on the theory adopted with regard to the subject of sentences like "Four times three is (are) twelve." Surprising as it may seem, Gould Brown, in his "Grammar of English Grammars," when discussing the matter, enumerates no less than seven different subjects that have been assigned by reputable grammarians to the verb in expressions that describe the operations of multiplication: (1) the multiplicand, used as an abstract noun implying unity; (2) the multiplier, i. e., the word "times"; (3) the entire expression, i. e., "four times three"; (4) the word "number," understood before the multiplicand; (5) the plural noun, "things" or "units," implied in the multiplicand, which is then regarded as a numeral adjective; (6) the product, taken substantively and implying plurality; (7) the word "things" or "units," implied in the product, which is regarded as a numeral adjective. Those who accept as correct the subject assigned in one or other of the explanations given under 1, 3, 4, will hold that the subject of the sentence is singular and that therefore the singular form of the verb is the proper one; those, on the other hand, who hold to one of the explanations given under 2, 5, 6, 7, will regard the subject as plural and employ the plural form of verb.

If the numeral alone, taken substantively, is held to be the subject, it may be regarded as a collective noun, in which case either a singular or a plural verb will be used according as the idea of a single whole or a number of individuals is more prominent in the mind of the speaker. Sixty years or more ago there was a rather general disposition to give greater prominence to the idea of a single whole, and as a consequence the singular form of verb was then more common; of late, however, there is a marked inclination to insist on the idea of plurality in the numeral which is used as the subject, and hence today the plural verb is more widely, if not exclusively, employed by careful speakers. But the matter is still an open question. Many people nowadays interpret the sentence to mean, "Four (units or things), taken three times, are twelve," but it would be pedantry to insist that this explanation is the only logical or correct interpretation.

Arguing from analogy, it would appear that the plural is the better form. Other languages use the plural, therefore English should use the plural. The argument from analogy, however, is never by itself absolutely conclusive; and there is the obvious answer that idiom, even if illogical, is to be preferred to rule. Thus the Latin says, "Bis bina quot essent" (Cicero); the French, "Deux fois deux font quatre"; the German, "Zweimal zwei machen vier"; the Italian, "Due via due fanno quattro"; and the Spanish, "Dos por dos son quatro." In all of the above cases the plural and not the singular is used, although the Italian sometimes employs the singular verb. As the principle involved is the same in every language, it would seem that in English the plural form of the verb is to be preferred. It would be a mistake, however, to pronounce the use of the singular incorrect.—Ed. America.]

The Need of a Mr. Sumner

To the Editor of America:

I was much interested in the letter, "A Friend of the Cause," which appeared in America for February 26. I agree with Mr. James V. Shields, when he says that Catholics do not appreciate the work done by Mr. Anthony Comstock, nor that which his successor, Mr. Sumner, is accomplishing. Other cities are in need of a Mr. Sumner to wake up a large Catholic population. Recently as I went through the Italian colony of Utica, I noticed the kind of book-stores that Mr. Shields speaks of, and I find it hard to understand how Catholics can allow these "foreign Italians" to insult them and their religion with the obscene books they are circulating. Why do we allow these book-sellers to revile the good women in the convents? We ought to clear these stores of such rubbish. Why don't we organize for this purpose?

Utica, N. Y. Arthur Durant.

The National Board of Censors

To the Editor of America:

Communications appearing in America and the utterances of Catholics, priests, editors and laymen, prove what a very large percentage of Catholics have been duped into the belief that there exists a National Board of Censors of Moving Pictures, by law established. Investigation by myself, following the appearance in America of a valuable communication from Mr. James V. Shields of Brooklyn, convinced me, over a year ago, that the self-appointed, self-styled "National Board of Censors" is a creature of the film interests, non-Christian in personnel, and apparently without extensive knowledge of the Christian code of morals. This "Board" has taken the lead in every fight made to prevent the establishment, by law, of Federal or State censors for moving pictures. Its approval is stamped upon practically all films that outrage the feelings of Catholics. Its own boast that it passes upon ninety-five per cent of all films exhibited, of which very many are frontal attacks on Christian decency and morality, is alone sufficient to condemn it. Every available unit of Christian power should be exercised to curb the existing wide-spread film attack on everything dear to the Catholic and Christian heart. Let us cease to look to the enemy to help us, and have enough of the fighting spirit of our glorious ancestors in the Faith to rush manfully to our standard and help ourselves. Let us no longer be duped by men whose effrontery is their most conspicuous quality.

New York. Marius Benoit Murray.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, Richard H. Tierney; Secretary, Joseph Husslein; Treasurer, John D. Wheeler.

Subscriptions, Postpaid:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
The America Press, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
cable address: cathreview

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

In this issue is inserted the Index of America's fourteenth volume.

Just Seven!

With this number America modestly observes its seventh birthday, for we were born on April 17, 1909. The realization that the care-free, irresponsible years of our infancy are over and that we have now reached the age of reason is a very sobering thought. For perhaps some readers will now expect from us numerous indications of that deeper wisdom and keener discernment observable in those who have attained to years of discretion. But they will perhaps discover, to their great disappointment, that America is just as blind and obstinate as ever, persistently refusing to be "neutral" in the partisan sense in which pro-Ally or pro-German subscribers understand the term, and that the paper continues to maintain a fearless, uncompromising attitude toward every movement and every interest, that menaces public morals, threatens American liberties, or hampers the spread of Catholicism in this country.

To bring out every week a constructive, interesting, and "infallible" Catholic journal is no light task, but with the help of representative Catholic writers at home and abroad, we shall try to make each new issue of the paper, please God, better than the last, so that as a molder of Catholic opinion, as a chronicler of Catholic enterprise and as a teacher of Catholic principles, our subsubscribers will find the seven-year-old America more readable and indispensable than ever.

France Is Not Mad

Children are a nation's best asset: on them depends a country's greatness. If they are numerous and well-trained, their nation may look forward to a bright future, conscious that its prestige will be upheld by devoted sons and daughters. If on the other hand, they are few in number or ill-trained in morals their country is hastening to decay.

In view of this, the subjoined news item from one of our daily papers is bewildering, to say the least:

AMERICANS TO CARE FOR FRENCH WAR ORPHANS

Paris, March 27.—Societies formed to care for war orphans were notified today by Miss Florence Schofield that American families have expressed willingness to care for 150,000 homeless children. Miss Schofield has just returned from the United States, where she sought homes for the little war sufferers. Professor Laird, rector of the University of Paris, will have charge of the work of parceling the children out to the various American committees.

Can it be that chivalrous France is selling her children for a mess of pottage, sending them forth from beneath her sunny skies to an alien people, strange in language and custom? Surely the soul of la belle France revolts at such a thought. Her children, 150,000 of them, cast from her bosom across the sea to be parceled out like animals! Never. That would be worse than the worst horror of war, and would cause the world to point the finger of scorn at a nation that would even contemplate such an action. War-torn, starving Belgium refused to part with her little orphans; France will do likewise. That she would expatriate her children, is simply incredible. To do so, would be to inflict an injury on herself worse than any made by cannon and shell. Besides the loss of prestige entailed by such an action, the blood of the country would be drained in an appalling manner. The expatriation of 150,000 of today's children would normally result in a loss of at least 200,000 in the next generation, 300,000 in the following generation and so on, so that in the fifth generation an army would be lost to the country. Then indeed France's enemy would conquer her, and that enemy would be France itself. The country would war against itself, tear out its own heart and throw it to ravening beasts. Surely France is not mad; the public prints belie her. She will clasp her children to her breast and teach them to love her sunny skies, her vine-clad hills and her honored flag.

Good Friday for Peace

At the beginning of Lent the Holy Father addressed to his Catholic children throughout the world another of his ardent appeals for peace. With paternal solicitude he urges on the Church to unite with him in earnest efforts to effect a reconciliation among the nations that are desolating Europe with fratricidal strife. Exhortations sent to the belligerents, in which he implored them to settle their differences by pacific consultation, have failed, and as a consequence the tears of the Father of Christendom continue to flow. Sadly he realizes that the combatants are drunk with blood, so that hearing they will not hear. His sons are deaf to their Father's counsels. Only God can move their hearts.

In distress, therefore, he bids the Faithful unite in a common endeavor to appease the anger of the Lord of Hosts, and asks them to send up to Heaven a cry for mercy loud enough to drown the clamorous shock of battle. It is in the women of the world especially that the Holy Father places his hopes, in the "mothers, wives daughters, sisters of the combatants, whose gentle souls, more truly than those of any others, feel the extent and the calamity of the present terrific war."

This incense of prayer, almsgiving, and mortification, he wishes to be continuous, but he singles out one day above all others on which it should ascend to the throne of God:

It would be greatly pleasing to Us that such families among all the combatant nations should unite in this undertaking on the day that is held sacred to the Divine sacrifice of Him who was God and Man, and who by His own suffering drew together in brotherhood all the sons of Adam; that they should, in these hours, made eternally memorable by His infinite love, beseech of Him, through the intercession of the suffering, but unconquered Mother, Queen of Martyrs, the grace to endure with fortitude and Christian resignation the anguish of loss brought about by the war, and that they should implore of His mercy the end of this long and terrible trial.

Catholics, not only in Europe but throughout the world, will not refuse to accede to the wishes of the Pope. With hearts sanctified by benefactions to the poor, and purged of wickedness by self-inflicted penance, they will unite their own sighs to the sighs of the Crucified Saviour. Gathered beneath His Cross they will hear His insistent cry for souls, and will catch the infinitely precious drops of the Sacred Blood from the bleeding Heart of the gentle Christ and offer them in sorrow to the outraged dignity of the God of Love. Then, perhaps, the blood of human hearts will cease to flow and peace will return to a war-swept world.

Dr. Flexner's "Modern School"

IF Dr. Abraham Flexner, the Assistant Secretary of Mr. John D. Rockefeller's General Education Board, has his way, the children of New York's public schools will be in danger of being made the subjects of still further pedagogical experiments. For he has lately outlined plans for a very "modern school," which that singularly powerful, though strictly private, organization he serves will doubtless have but little difficulty in testing on helpless boys and girls. Some of the plan's features are these:

Formal grammar, ancient languages, theoretical studies in modern languages, and the bulk of history and of pure mathematics in the way they are now presented are the subjects Dr. Flexner would remove from the curriculum as useless and cumbersome. Aside from reading, writing, spelling, and figuring, he writes, the curriculum would be built out of actual activities in science, industry, esthetics, civics. These studies would be forwarded with the use of "the accessible world" as a laboratory to train children "with an eye to the realities of life and existence." The features of this accessible world which a school in New York, for instance, would employ, would be the harbor, the Metropolitan Museum, the Public Library, the Natural History Museum, the Zoölogical Gardens, the city government, the Weather Bureau, the transportation systems, lectures, concerts, plays. . . . Modern education will include nothing simply because tradition recommends it or because its inutility has not been conclusively established. It proceeds in precisely the opposite way: it includes nothing for which an affirmative case cannot now be made out. . . . It is evident that, while in some directions the modern school would have a fairly clear path, in others it would have to feel its way, and in all its attitude would be distinctly tentative and experimental. . . . Modern teaching, like modern medicine, should be controlled by positive indications. The schools should teach Latin and algebra, if at all, just as the intelligent physician prescribes quinine, because it serves a purpose that he knows and can state.

So we may picture the defenseless children, having been already subjected perhaps to the Gary Plan and to the Montessori System, being made in due time the corpora vilia of Dr. Flexner's experiments. As soon as the first session of the modern school begins, the teacher will diagnose like an "intelligent physician" the mental equipment of all her pupils. Then maybe Carlotta will be found to have had quite enough "traditional" grammar, so a visit to the Metropolitan Museum will be prescribed; Isaac is found suffering from an overdose of "traditional" history, so he is given a day at the Zoo; Michael has had a surfeit of "traditional" German, hence he goes to inspect the Weather Bureau; and Gretchen's useless enthusiasm for pure mathematics is corrected by dispatching her to the Natural History Museum. When all the victims of our time-worn system of mental discipline have thus been started on the road to recovery, the rest of the subjects in the laboratory will probably be awakened to "the realities of life and existence" by being sent to the morning papers on a feverish quest for "the accessible world," for Dr. Flexner believes that children should have "the courage not to read obsolete and uncongenial classics." Is it merely because the pupils in New York's public schools are so numerous that they are considered the natural prey of experimenters in novel pedagogical theories, or is the Rockefeller Institute reaching out for new conquests?

The American Indian

THE American Indian has had a sad history. For generations past he has been the prey of unscrupulous men who have murdered him or debauched him or robbed him or made him the victim of sectarian hatred or political bias. From a mighty host his race has been reduced to a few handfuls scattered in isolated places over the vast area of the United States. This is all that is left of numerous tribes that once possessed the land, a few men, women and children set down under surveillance in restricted districts, living witnesses to a policy that has disgraced us before the world. And the end is not yet. The poor Indian must still be made a sign of contradiction by legislators who neither understand his nature nor respect his rights. To one he is a savage unworthy of the care bestowed upon him, to another he is a normal man longing for full liberty, and capable of discharging all the responsibilities of untrammeled citizenship. From these conflicting views have eventuated gross violations of natural rights on the one hand and dangerous privileges on the other.

In view of this, these words of the public-spirited Joseph H. Choate are worthy of attention:

> Specific reservations have properly been set apart for Indian tribes, but for almost half a century there has been a tendency to recognize and give responsibility to the individual. The Dawes Severalty Act, adopted in 1887, was the culmination of this theory. It provides for an allotment of lands to individual Indians, breaking up of tribal relations, and disintegration of communal ownership. The principal thought in this and subsequent legislation has been to place responsibility upon the individual, and at the same time protect him in his personal and property rights until the untutored child of nature is equipped to assume full responsibility of citizenship.
>
> The difficulty is that too much has been expected of the Indian. To some people it is hard to understand why you can't take an untutored, ignorant, full-blood Indian and make an educated citizen out of him in a fortnight. They expect the unreasonable and impossible. It is contrary to all human experience. Extremists have insisted that the process is too slow; that these wards should be released from Government supervision and suffer the results of their own improvidence, regardless of their qualifications for self-protection and regardless of the consequences to their property rights.

There is nothing new in this; it but expresses the policy that the Catholic Church has insisted on for years past. Nevertheless, now that Congress is once again debating the Indian's fate, the words are a timely warning to legislators who would throw the red man completely on his own resources. The Indian still possesses some earthly goods; he will not have them long, if guardianship fails him. History will repeat itself. Moreover, those who shout for "full liberty" for the red man that he may attain to the highest pitch of civilization, know not whereof they talk. Liberty is the full-blown flower of civilization; the latter comes first; the former follows only when man has subdued his passions, regulated his emotions, trained his intellect to discern right from wrong, cultivated his conscience, and sanctified his will so that it loves virtue and hates vice. In this consists civilization, and from this flows liberty. First civilization and then liberty, that is God's order and no legislature can change it.

A Catholic Business Man

MANY are the qualities that must combine to form the ideal Catholic business man. Seldom are they all found in their perfection in a single individual. Like the perfect knight of old, he should be a man without fear and without reproach. Faith should be the loadstone of his life. He should not in his own conceit exalt himself above others who may chance to be his inferiors in the commercial or industrial life, nor should he sway a finger's breadth from Christian principles to gain the favor and support of men of influence. Wealth should have for him no supreme attractiveness in itself, but should be welcomed as affording possibilities of greater service in the interests of Christ, as a trust for the poor, and in stewardship for God. He should ever place above all things the Divine approval expressed in the joyful greeting of his Lord: "Well done, good and faithful servant." In spite of wealth and power, his greatest commendation at life's close should be that he was ever numbered among "the poor in spirit."

Can this ideal be realized? It certainly can, or the Church would not propose it in her teaching. Its illustration is found in the unbiased tributes lately paid to a man whose loss to his city, to its public and private institutions, to its financial and industrial interests, was declared to be greater than had ever been caused by the death of any other man identified with the city's public welfare: Patrick T. Walsh, of Davenport, Iowa. From the hardships of extreme poverty he had worked his way, by merit and perseverance, to the pinnacle of success. His service in the constructive field was eagerly sought by every great railroad in the country. His contracts amounted to millions of dollars. Before it was decided that the Government itself should undertake the building of the Panama Canal, he had presented his bid for the enterprise. The recommendations in his favor, which at the time poured in from all sides, and from men of the greatest prominence, were so remarkable that by President Roosevelt's order they were bound and sent to him with the message that, "Any man living might be justly proud of this evidence of integrity."

As a stonecutter in early life, Mr. Walsh had fought for the eight-hour day, and though he won the fight as the representative at Washington of his fellow-workmen, he lost his own place. This misfortune, however, was the beginning of his success, nor did he in his turn forget the interests of the men who worked for him, but always retained their loyalty and respect. "He could have been as rich as Pierpont Morgan," said Monsignor Ryan, "but the amassing of wealth for wealth's sake had no meaning for him. His was too noble a mind for mere money-getting. He acquired money honorably, and as such acquisition was noble, he used noble means for noble ends." The poor, the schools, the Church and countless worthy causes were the recipients of his generosity. He was fond of the little crippled children, and he considered the children of the parish as his own. Such were a few of his noble traits upon which his fellow-citizens loved to dwell when he passed away at the height of his usefulness, mourned by the entire city as well as by his own cherished family. The reason for his greatness was all summed up in the simple words, "Religion made Patrick Walsh what he was." He was proud of his Church and the Church might well take a motherly pride in him.

LITERATURE

XXIV—Cervantes

Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away;
A single laugh demolished the right arm
Of his own country; seldom since that day
Has Spain had heroes. While Romance could charm,
The world gave ground before her bright array;
And therefore have his volumes done such harm,
That all their glory as a composition
Was dearly purchased by his land's perdition.

These are Lord Byron's oft-quoted views, unsustained, by the way, by anything in the history of the periods anterior to or later than the appearance of "Don Quixote." In 1605 the code of chivalry was well-nigh in abeyance; the fashion of the picaresque had already overcome its old rival, and romance itself had taken its last refuge in the religious life and letters of the time. Cervantes himself in his "Novelas Ejemplares" had shown his hand in characteristic touches in "Rinconete y Cortadillo" and "El Coloquio de los Perros," where the contrast between the actual state of the speakers and their pompous sentiments has all the salt of his greatest work. It was timely for Cervantes or some other of his race to produce an epoch-marking work that should portray conditions obtaining in Spain for the last three centuries during which, his British lordship to the contrary, the Spanish race has produced many great figures in life and letters.

More or less self-consciously Cervantes, according to Santayana, "would have told us that the moral of 'Don Quixote' was this: that the force of idealism is wasted when it does not recognize the reality of things." And we may look upon the work as a confession of its author's own failures in public and family life; it is the half-conscious jotting, for the most part, of a dreamer caught in the whirl of actual needs and demands of life; of a leader with the desire and capacities of conquest and the fact of defeat ever before him; of a literary man helpless in spite of all his ability before his immediate conditions and problems. It is his realization that his private circumstances were of a piece with those general in Spanish society; its laughter is his own laughter at himself for his long studies of "Amadis" and "Palmaryn," for the self-conscious labors he had expended on his "Galatea" and the learned and amorous princelings and shepherds of purely imaginative or Italian origin. To the end of his days he remained a romanticist at heart; we see this in the pages of his last work completed on the eve of his death, "Los Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda," which, in company with José Valdivielso, the author of the "Spiritual Romance," he declares the greatest of his works.

Today it is very hard to read these leisurely eclogues and endless discussions of the pastoral school, but at the time there seems to have been a public devoted to such literature, although indeed our old hero of Lepanto and Algiers got little save the praise of his fellow-craftsmen and the satisfaction of his own instinct in payment. His life was passed in poverty and obscurity, for all his love of romance; and only out of his sufferings have we obtained the grim humor and wisdom of the Knight of La Mancha and that voice from the very heart of Spain, Sancho Panza.

Bowles in his "Anotaciones" and Fray Martin Sarmiento have pointed out the thousands of passages in Don Quixote that should be marked in quotations: "They are very few indeed who possess the requisite means for understanding Cervantes," writes the latter; "for to do so, it is before all things necessary to read that which Cervantes gave himself so much trouble to read in order to write his Don Quixote. He frequently adopts their style and even avails himself of their verbal expressions, more especially those which may be found in the first four books of the 'Amadis de Gaul.' And as these books and those which in course of time sprang from them are now very rare, and very few people have read them, they must be very few who can read the Don Quixote with all the spirit Cervantes threw into it."

In spite of these considerations, together with the fact of Cervantes' very poor handwriting and the publication of Don Quixote without proper revision of the text, Spain and the rest of the civilized world have paid the last honors and entered with interest and gratification into the doings of Don Quixote and his squire, and shared their glories and sorrows, their journeys and combats and affairs in bower and field, in the courting of Dulcinea del Toboso, the knavery of the innkeepers, the madness of Cardenio and the ingratitude of the galley-slaves.

The character of Sancho Panza is as remarkable as that of his master; it was a work of the supreme art of Cervantes to reduce a man of the menial class to a practical belief in the purely ideal. The wealth of Sancho's proverbial philosophy is shown to be confusion beyond guidance, in fact Cervantes' satire is directed against the predominance of the proverb as well as the ascendency of the works of chivalry. Hence the interminable stringing of catch-phrases, not to display the author's familiarity with them but to match them against Don Quixote's more literary mania.

It has been shrewdly conjectured that the intimate relation of master and squire has been the inspiration of several later authors, notably of Dickens in his "Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club" where an humble servant follows an idealist master through a series of disconnected adventures. But Cervantes can claim even greater glories in English literature, for has not Walter Scott himself declared that: "But for the 'Novelas Ejemplares' of Miguel de Cervantes the Waverley Novels would never have been written"?

Cervantes was not at his happiest as a poet or dramatist; his plays have practically been lost, although the "Numancia" has had considerable praise. His lyric remains are for the most part contained in the fantastic poem, "Un Viaje del Parnaso," where

From keel to mainmast-top, O wonder rare,
A swarm of verses formed the whole array;
No single bit of prose did mingle there.

The flags and streamers were a sight to see,
That waved and fluttered with the moving air
Of varied rhymes a trifle loose and free.

On such a vessel Apollo plans to carry the Spanish poets to the heights of Parnassus, and Mercury resigns the command to Cervantes, giving him a list of the writers selected for the voyage, Quevedo, "the true son of Apollo and scourge of poet-asters," being allowed the greatest praise of all the Spanish singers. In a way it is Cervantes' literary testament, for it gives us his own intent in the list of his works and the general outlay of his mind upon Spanish literature up to his death.

I cut and fashioned by my wit the dress
With which fair "Galatea" sought the light
And left the region of forgetfulness:

I've comedies composed, whose style of play
To reason so conformed that on the stage
They showed fair mingling of the grave and gay.

I've given in "Don Quixote," to assuage
The melancholy and the coping breast,
Pastime for every mood in every age.

I've in my novels shown a way, the best
Whereby at last the language of Castile
May season fiction with becoming zest.

Thus spoke " the soul-Quixote and the body-Sancho Panza" at the end of his earthly career, and Spain and all the rest of the world have fully assented with louder and louder plaudits as the centuries have rolled along. Already three have passed and there is no visible lessening of his hold upon human thought. Death chose an eventful date, April twenty-third, 1616, to lay the great Spanish master low; within the same fortnight in England he stretched the master Shakespeare for the tomb; both masters closed an imperial age in letters and are yet without peers in the respective literatures which they may be said to have founded; there is but one Shakespeare as there is but one Cervantes.

THOMAS WALSH.

REVIEWS

History of Dogmas. Vol. III. The End of the Patristic Age (430-800). By J. TIXERONT. Translated from the Fifth French Edition by H. L. B. $2.00; Is Schism Lawful? By EDWARD MAGUIRE. $1.80; The New Pelagianism. By J. HERBERT WILLIAMS. $1.00. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The last instalment of the "History of Dogmas" keeps up the high standard of excellence reached in the two preceding volumes. Solidity of doctrine, a thorough knowledge of Patristic literature, a critical perception of the exact point and status of the difficult controversies under discussion and of their historical bearing, an intimate acquaintance with the sources and the faculty of presenting a well-balanced verdict are the author's most prominent gifts. The second volume of his "History" had closed with St. Augustine's battle against Pelagianism. Here, after a general sketch of Greek theology, we get an admirable review of the historical growth of Nestorianism, Eutychianism, and Monophysitism. The Monothelite and Semi-Pelagian heresies are fully treated, while special chapters deal with the image controversy and the theology of St. John Damascene. The struggles, the trials and the final victory of the Church in her endeavor to safeguard the deposit entrusted to her are everywhere splendidly portrayed.

The subtitle to Father Maguire's book calls it a study in "ecclesiology," with a special reference to the question of schism. The author begins with an examination of historical Christianity. He then asks if the Gospel announced 2,000 years ago was only "a glad tiding" and nothing more? Did its hearers constitute a mere school or various societies? And, " if they formed societies, did these take shape as isolated and autonomous units, or was there an all-round federation, a society of all societies, a church of all churches?" Having made clear this social, ecclesiological character of the new "tendency," the author studies it in its antecedents and completely refutes those critics who find no trace of "ecclesiasticism," no sign of the Church as an organized social unit in the personal teaching of Our Lord, of St. Paul or the Ante-Nicene Fathers. His conclusion to his own query: "Is Schism Lawful?" is naturally and necessarily an emphatic "No." For historical Christianity is a perceptive and doctrinal Revelation to all men, a deposit of Divine truths and precepts entrusted by Christ to His Apostles and their successors for the salvation of all, an inheritance and a faith to be kept unchanged.

"The New Pelagianism" is quite as shifty as the old. It is an atmosphere rather than a clean-cut set of dogmas. It is the supernatural gradually fading away into the natural, or rather the natural evicting the supernatural from its proper territory. It is the steadily growing conviction that grace is not a reality and not a necessity for the attainment of salvation. Hence the belief that salvation is easily within the reach of not too strenuously exerted natural powers; hence the gradual extinction of a firm belief in the existence of an eternal hell and the steady growth of a dangerous "quasi-Universalism" leading to the view that the great majority of men will be saved. Such seems to be the thought which has led Mr. Williams to write his book. That the danger described by the author exists is evident. His purpose to warn us against it is every way commendable. But the subject is one of the most difficult in the whole range of theology and needs careful discrimination, a very just appreciation of the controverted issues and extensive theological knowledge. In his laudable design to combat Naturalism and Universalism, Mr. Williams goes to the other extreme and becomes something of a rigorist. He clearly exposes the severe but no longer accepted views of St. Augustine with regard to the relatively small number of the saved. He does not set forth equally well the more consoling and now generally accepted views of St. Thomas and Suarez on the same subject. Mr. Williams' general purpose and intention deserve approval. But inaccuracies of statement, vagueness in the indication of authorities, and an unnecessary rigorism impair the authority of the work.

J. C. R.

Songs of the Son of Isai: a Metrical Arrangement of the Psalms of David. By HELEN HUGHES HIELSCHER. Boston: Sherman, French & Co. $1.50.

No attempt is here made to reproduce the original poems of the Psalter. The author has merely taken the Douai-Challoner translation of the Latin Vulgate and arranged it in poetic setting. A foreword modestly expresses the hope that these simple verses may waft to the reader a breath of the fragrance of the garden of roses in the Davidic Psalter. Much more than a breath will they waft. For the paraphrasing is done with reverence, dignity and accuracy, so far as accuracy was feasible. The substance of the thought is preserved, but the original flavor of its setting is, of course, lost. Such flavor could not withstand the ravages incidental upon the passing of the poem from Hebrew into Greek, from Greek into Latin, from Latin into the sixteenth-century English of Douai, thence into Challoner's middle-eighteenth-century English, and finally, after sundry revisions, into twentieth-century poetic diction. The marvel is that the original thought has been so substantially preserved. It is as if Shakespeare were to reach the French through the medium of a translation of a Slavic version of Schiller's "Hamlet." To illustrate this point, there follows a word-for-word and line-for-line translation of a portion of the beautiful lyric composed during the Babylonian exile of Juda (B. C. 586-536):

By Babel's streams, 'twas there we sat, yea, we wept,
While we remembered Sion;
On the poplars in the midst thereof,
We hung up our lyres.

For there our captors asked of us
Words of song;
Our spoilers, (words of) mirth:
"Sing us a song of the songs of Sion!"
How could we sing a song of Yahweh
In the land of the stranger?

And here is the author's paraphrase:

We sat by the rivers of Babylon
And our tears fell down like rain;
We wept, remembering Sion
And the far Judean plain.

We hung up our harps on the willows,
For our captors, pleasuring,
Asked for words of the songs of Sion,
And desired that we should sing.

How can we sing to strangers
Our words of praise to Thee? . . .

The Messianic interpretation of the last verses of the Psalm, indicated by He with a capital, is not correct. Apart from this mistake, the Psalm is beautifully paraphrased. In fact, this American metrical Psalter is superior to that of Bishop Bagshawe. As the author is a Catholic, she should have seen to it that the publishers noted the diocesan imprimatur. W. F. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "Where the Path Breaks" (Century, $1.30), Capt. Charles de Créspigny has written a delicately beautiful story. The situation, which is the result of one of the tragedies of the war, though quite moral, is not altogether pleasing to Catholic sensibilities, nor is the mysticism quite unobjectionable, but the principal character is very attractive, and his self-sacrifice, on which the plot is built, is of a very high order, and meets in the end with the happiness it richly deserves. The development is well out of the ordinary lines, is direct, simple and strong, and is remarkable for its avoidance of the moral aberrations which so many of the modern novelists think essential to a successful story.——Eleanor Marvin portrays a very likable girl in "Mary Allen" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25). From the day she starts from her country home to spend a year at a New York art school till success crowns her efforts in her chosen field, her career and her friendships make an interesting theme. The loneliness of the girl and her mother in the busy metropolis, the people that come into their lives there, and the arrival of "Jim" just at the proper moment, round out the action of a well-told story that should appeal to all girl readers.

"Mechanism of Discourses" (D. B. Hansen & Son, Chicago, $1.00), by the Rev. Mark Moeslein, C.P., is a helpful book for preachers. It gives an outline of the parts of a sermon, and shows by object lessons and discussions how to fit them together so as to obtain the best results. It is these object lessons and the precious bits of sound advice that accompany them that make up the real excellence of the book. The terminology is somewhat stiff at times and even when explained is not very suggestive. One meets with such words as mannerisms, preachment, sermonize, to which present usage attaches a depreciatory sense, and there are a few instances of downright solecisms. However, no one will lay down the book without feeling better equipped for the sacred duty of preaching. Especially worthy of attention is the treatment of the subjects of "Balanced Personality," "Taste," "Scholarliness," "True Popularity." and "Egoism in the Pulpit."——The latest portion of the English Dominicans' excellent translation of the "Summa Theologica" (Benziger, $2.00) to appear comprises "Questions XLIX-LXXXIX" which treat of habits in general and of the virtues and vices in particular. The volume will enable those unfamiliar with Latin to learn what was taught by St. Thomas Aquinas, the great Doctor of the Church, regarding the nature and effects of sin and the character and the value of the virtues.

Father Aurelius Stehle, O.S.B., has out a second, revised edition of his excellent "Manual of Episcopal Ceremonies Based on the 'Cæremoniale Episcoporum,' Decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, etc., and Approved Authors" (St. Vincent Archabbey Press, Beatty, Pa., $2.25). For the benefit of lay sacristans, to whom the bishop's visit is often a source of anxiety, the author gives clear directions about what is needed for episcopal functions of all kinds, and he offers priests and seminarians a complete guide to the ceremonies to be observed when a bishop is in the sanctuary, whether the occasion be an ordinary one or when special rubrics must be observed, as in Holy Week. Pastors will find particularly useful the chapters on the bishop's visitation and on Confirmation. The general plan of the book's first edition is retained, but minor changes have been made and recent decrees of the Congregation of Rites have been added. On a separate pamphlet are printed the ceremonies for the laying of a church's corner-stone.

"Stamboul Nights" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25) is the title of a good collection of short stories by H. G. Dwight. Being the son of a Protestant missionary, the author was brought up in the Levant and knows his Constantinople very well. Of the fourteen tales in the volume, "The Leopard of the Sea" is the best, but "Mortmain" and "The House of the Giraffe" are almost as good and the rest are well-told and interesting.——"Behold the Woman!" (Lippincott, $1.35) by T. Everett Harré is a novel which the publishers modestly call "one of the rare books that are landmarks in the history of literature," and predict that it may rival "Quo Vadis" and "Ben Hur." Little likelihood of that! The author, who is afflicted with an Asiatic style, undertakes to describe the life and times of Mary of Egypt, devoting about 350 pages to Mary the sinner and some fifty to Mary the penitent. His detailed accounts of pagan lewdness and his calumnies of the clergy make the book unfit to read. The author's cant about the need of telling "in all sincerity" "how evil people were" is like our theatrical managers' fondness for calling indecency "Art."

"The Ocean Sleuth" (Dutton, $1.35), by Maurice Drake, is a bracing bit of sea-adventure and romance, pleasantly told. Austin Voogdt happens to be on the scene of a wreck. Later reports have it that an absconding banker, together with his booty, has gone down with the ship. But, strange to say, the notes recovered from the wreck are forgeries, while the real notes are in circulation. Busying himself with the perplexing problem, he solves the mystery of the notes. Though the story's probabilities are sometimes strained, it holds together pretty well, and is solved naturally. The author's style is quite vivacious.——"Person! Mary, how dare you call yourself a person?" indignantly protested Gerald Mason when Mary Graeme," "The Heir of Duncarron" (Putnam, $1.35), entertained the suspicion that she was not worthy to be his wife. However, she finally recovered from being a person, and so they were married. This latest novel of Amy McLaren is gracefully written on familiar lines. The character of the old Scotch nurse is well-drawn and every page of the book is clean, which is high praise nowadays.

"High Tide: Songs of Joy and Vision from the Present-Day Poets of America and Great Britain" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25) and "Gregorian Poetry; 1913-1915" (Putnam, $1.50) are two anthologies of modern verse. Mrs. Waldo Richards, the compiler of the first volume, has made discriminating selections from the writings of more than a hundred poets, among them Thomas A. Daly, Louise Imogen Guiney, Joyce Kilmer, Alice Meynell, Father Tabb, Francis Thompson, Katharine Tynan and Thomas Walsh. W. M. Letts has two of her Irish poems in the volume and the following lines of Edwin Markham on "Victory in Defeat," well express an old truth:

> Defeat may serve as well as victory
> To shake the soul and let the glory out,
> When the great oak is straining in the wind,
> The boughs drink in new beauty, and the trunk
> Sends down a deeper root on the windward side.
> Only the soul that knows the mighty grief
> Can know the mighty rapture. Sorrows come
> To stretch out spaces in the heart of joy.

The other book, which seems to have been prepared by a certain "E. M.," is filled with verses written within the past two years by fourteen English poets, but there appears to be little that is particularly "imperishable" in the book except Rupert

Brooke's now-famous sonnet, beginning: "If I should die, think only this of me."

A remarkably interesting autobiography is that of "Geraldine Farrar" (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.00) "the best-known woman in America." She describes her successful career from the time when as a child of three, just after singing a ditty at a church concert, she stepped to the edge of the platform and asked, "Did I do it well, mamma?" up to the other day, when she became a popular "movie" queen. The gifted daughter of a Melrose grocer, this girl determined to be a great prima donna, and by hard work and sheer force of character achieved her ambition. Thirty thousand dollars advanced by a Boston woman paid for Miss Farrar's musical education. Her singing captivated Berlin and the Kaiser's court, and when a famous impresario bade her "come down and sing for him," she had her maid telephone: "Miss Farrar is at her home, and if Herr Conried wishes to call, she will be glad to see him." He came and eventually closed an astonishing contract with her. "Not that I really cared about such items of expense," the diva explains, "but I was determined to enter the Metropolitan en dignité, and I did."

The people of this country still have much to learn about Latin America. Even its earlier history will have to be rewritten before we shall be in a position to understand the conditions that prevail there. "Much sentimental ink," says John Fisk, "has been shed over the wickedness" displayed by the Spanish Conquistadores. Of this proof positive is furnished by Kate Stephens' "The Mastering of Mexico" (Macmillan, $1.50). Except for elisions made here and there, for the purpose of adapting the work to popular taste, the volume is little more than a translation of the "Conquista de la Neuva-España," by Bernel Diaz del Castillo; an "unsuspected historian," as Sir Arthur Helps calls him, and an eye-witness of the events he relates. The book will prove useful to those engaged in the teaching of American history in our high schools. Anyone particularly interested in the character of Cortes will find in the pages of the author's volume a good corrective for false notions about the greatest of the Conquistadores.

"English Grammar Simplified" (Funk and Wagnalls, $0.75), by James C. Fernald does not greatly differ from most manuals on this subject. Commendable for its choice of material, the book states decisively the rules of English grammar, purposely omitting the extended explanations and the discussion of disputed subjects, and is intended not only as a text-book, but for quick reference in the home and the office. For the latter purpose, the index has been made very complete and accurate. ——"A Second Reader" (Scribner's) by Hannah T. McManus and John T. Haaren, is a book which should delight the heart of every child entering the second school year. There is a varied selection of entertaining subjects to feed the imagination and a successful attempt to present them in a literary and simple manner.——Maude M. Frank's "High School Exercises in Grammar" (Longmans, $0.75) is a new and revised edition of a good text-book for first-year pupils. A clear presentation of precepts is found just before the lengthy exercises, and illustrative quotations abound.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn and Bacon, Boston:
Treasure Island. By Robert Louis Stevenson. Edited by William D. Lewis, A.M. With Illustrations by Florence M. Herrick. $0.45; The New Chardenal French Course. By C. A. Chardenal. Revised and Written by Maro S. Brooks. With Illustrations. $1.25.

D. Appleton & Co., New York:
Mary Rose of Mifflin. By Frances R. Sterrett. Illustrated. $1.25.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Pastoral Letters. Addresses and Other Writings of the Rt. Rev. James A. McFaul, D.D., LL.D. Bishop of Trenton. Edited by Rev. James J. Powers. Second Edition. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century. By Paul Thureau Dangin. Revised and Re-edited from a Translation by the late Wilfred Wilberforce. In two volumes. $11.00.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
Learning to Earn: a Plea and a Plan for Vocational Education. By John A. Lapp and Carl H. Mote. With Introduction by Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
We. A Confession of Faith for the American People during and after War. By Gerald Stanley Lee. $1.50.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Beggars on Horseback. By F. Tennyson Jesse. $1.25; Quinneys', a Comedy in Four Acts. By Horace Annesley Vachell. $1.00; Golden Glory. By F. Horace Rose. $1.25.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church. Sermons from the German. Adapted and Edited by Rev. Edward Jones. With an Introduction by the Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D. Volumes IV and V. $1.50 each.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Geraldine Farrar. By Herself, $2.00; The Greater Tragedy and Other Things. By Benjamin Apthorp Gould. $1.00; The Gift of Immortality. A Study in Responsibility. By Charles Lewis Slattery, D.D. $1.00; Instead of the Thorn. A Novel. By Clara Louise Burnham. $1.25; The Hills of Hingham. By Dallas Lore Sharp. $1.25.

Imp. de l'Action Sociale Limitee, Quebec:
Leçons de Psychologie et de Theodicee; Leçons de Morale; Leçons de Logique. Par l'Abbé Arthur Robert. $0.50 each.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
The Buffoon. By Louis U. Wilkinson. $1.50.

John Lane Co., New York:
Adventures in Common Sense. By Doctor Frank Crane. $1.00; The Fairy Bride. By Norreys Jephson O'Conor. $1.00; Singing Fires of Erin. By Eleanor Rogers Cox. Designs by John P. Campbell. $1.00.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
East and West through Fifteen Centuries. Being a General History from B. C. 44 to A. D. 1453. By Br. Genl. G. F. Young, C.B. With Illustrations and Maps. In Four Volumes. Volumes I and II $12.00.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Nights: Rome, Venice in the Æsthetic Eighties; London, Paris in the Fighting Nineties. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. $3.00.

Little, Brown & Co., New York:
How to Know Your Child. By Miriam Finn Scott. $1.25.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Songs and Satires. By Edgar Lee Masters. $1.50; The Rudder. By Mary S. Watts. $1.50; Abraham Lincoln. By Daniel E. Wheeler. Illustrated. $0.50; Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty. By Vachel Lindsay. $1.00.

The Manas Press, Rochester, N. Y.:
Verse. By Adelaide Crapsey. $1.00.

Oxford University Press, New York:
Records of Social and Economic History. Vol II. The Black Book of St. Augustine. Part I. By G. J. Turner and Rev. H. E. Saler, M. A. $5.25; The Assumption of the Virgin. A Miracle Play from the N-Town Cycle. By W. W. Greg, Litt.D. $1.25.

Rand, McNally & Company, Chicago:
About Miss Mattie Morninglory. By Lilian Bell. $1.35; My Friend Phil. By Isabel M. Peacocke. $1.25; "I Conquered." By Harold Titus. $1.25.

Elihu S. Riley, Annapolis, Maryland:
An American Satyr. By Elihu S. Riley. $0.25; Cloth $0.75.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Portion of a Champion. By Francis oSullivan tighe. $1.35; Antwerp to Gallipoli. By Arthur Ruhl. $1.50; Father Damien. By Robert Louis Stevenson. $0.50; Nan of Music Mountain. By Frank H. Spearman. $1.35.

Sherman, French & Co., Boston:
Gibby of Clamshell Alley. By Jasmine Stone Van Dresser. $1.35.

Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:
Heroes of all Time. Oliver Cromwell. By Estelle Ross. $0.75.

The Survey Committee of the Cleveland Foundation, Cleveland:
Department Store Occupations. By Iris Prouty O'Leary.

Typ. Laflamme & Proulx, Quebec:
Histore de la Philosophie. Par l'Abbé Arthur Robert. $0.75.

University of California Press, Berkeley:
Variations in Efficiency during the Day, Together with Practise Effects, Sex Differences and Correlations. By Arthur I. Gates. $1.50.

Volksvereinsverlag, M. Gladbach:
Heimatgrüsse an unsere Krieger im Jahre 1915. M. 4; Alban Stolz. Von Herman Herz. 1.20M.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
The Chief Points of Difference between the Catholic and Protestant Creeds. By Rev. F. Laun. $0.75.

R. & T. Washbourne, Ltd., London:
Catholicism in Medieval Wales. By J. E. De Hirsch-Davies, B.A. 3s/6d.

EDUCATION

II—The Boy and the Boarding School

THE Catholic parent does not, as a rule, demand that his son become a great statesman or a man of letters. He asks, first of all, that he shall pass to manhood strongly grounded in the principles and practices of the Faith and, secondly, that he be protected during the period of adolescence from those graver temptations that may mean his moral ruin. A Catholic boarding school is quite unequaled as a guardian of faith and virtue. The ideal home, it may be, surpasses the school in the power of supernatural character-development, but the "ideal home" is unfortunately becoming more and more rare in our busy modern life. Moreover, the Catholic boarding school has a source of supernatural strength incomparably more powerful than even a mother's love or a father's watchful care. The sun and center of the Catholic boarding school is Christ in the Sacrament of the Eucharist; the daily reception of the Bread of Life is the means employed to strengthen wayward boyhood in purity and faith. Daily Communion is preached in season and out of season; the good example of "real boys" so living as "to receive" daily is a powerful influence to those who are easily led in good or ill. Sturdy piety becomes the fashion; purity of life, an accepted standard, and evil influence is reduced to a minimum.

Moreover, daily Communion, the great ideal of Catholic life, becomes here a practical reality. Morning Mass has always been of rule; the morning reception of the Eucharist involves but little extra effort. Where one boy living at home will have the perseverance to continue the practice, ten will do so at school. Thus, in two excellent Catholic schools forty miles apart and enrolling more than 500 students, the average number of communicants in the day school is less than fifty; in the boarding school, more than 400.

Not that a Catholic boarding school is an Eden where sin and the serpent enter not. Even here, "it must needs be that scandals come," for we deal with boys and young men and not with a choir of angels. But no one who has dwelt for any time in such a place can doubt that in this distinctively religious atmosphere, faith and piety are of a high standard. The evil-minded are held in restraint by public opinion; and many grave sources of temptation are entirely absent.

Not a Substitute for the Home

"The boarding school can never take the place of the home." Of course it can't. And equally, of course, "the home cannot take the place of the school." It is not supposed to. The school supplements, not replaces, the training of the home. Any boy who has missed a mother's care or a sister's gentle tact in the refining atmosphere of home, can scarcely hope to have that omission supplied later in life. And the boy who comes to the age of fourteen, boorish, selfish or offensively loud, is very likely to retain these traits as a man. Habits are formed from seven to fourteen; ideals from fourteen to twenty-one, and the boarding school belongs to the second period rather than the first. School and home have their separate place in the formation of character. Boys are gregarious by instinct, whether those instincts lead them to associate with the "gang" on the corner or the "set" at the dancing academy. The normal boy simply will associate with his kind; if kept at home or in the company of elders, he is almost sure to develop into that unlovely monster of boyhood, the young prig. By watchful care and tact, he may be guarded in the choice of associates; in a Catholic boarding school these associations are far more likely to be thoroughly wholesome. In the democracy of school a natural instinct is so satisfied as to bring out most easily the best traits of manliness. We suspect that the Bourbons would have been wiser rulers and better men if, instead of their flock of wise instructors and special text-books in usum Delphini, their sacred persons had been thrust unceremoniously into the democracy of school, boarding school preferred. Modern royalty would seem to have learned this lesson, for the young princelings of England are educated today in her national public schools. Only the other day the world was impressed to hear that a posible heir to the crown of England had been worsted in an athletic event by a mere plebeian. And even the news of battle gave place for a moment to the significance of this friendly rivalry of peace.

The Democracy of School

"The democracy of school." There you have in a phrase the distinctive features of boarding-school life. It is in this democracy that bluff and brag, conceit and artificiality, selfishness and tactlessness are dealt with by an effectual and almost pitiless scorn. Brains and character and the athletic skill that comes of clean living, are the only titles to respect and admiration. Money cannot buy popularity, nor is poverty a bar to leadership. Here at least the healthy standard rules, "a man's a man for a' that." If a boy under this drastic training can be made to understand that pretense and vulgarity and selfishness are valueless as passports to leadership, he will carry into later life a lesson that could never have been learned save in the hard school of experience. If he has even the latent character to react to such environment, he will all his life be better for the training; if not, his stay in such a world will be brief and stormy. The malcontents in any boarding school are rarely those who have won by character the popularity of their fellows.

Scholarship

A true system of education has a twofold end: to develop character and to impart scholarship. The first is more important, the second is more exclusively the work of the school. Men have developed character without education, they rarely attain to learning, save under guidance and tuition. As aids to the attainment of scholarship, particularly for the young, we may consider these three as most important: intimate contact with men of scholarly ideals, the absence of distracting influences, and Vergil's labor improbus, unceasing, whole-hearted work. A little consideration will show that these are most readily found in the surroundings of boarding-school life.

Associations

A boy at school is, to a striking degree, a worshiper of talent; he is impressed by the display of learning; he is attracted by the evidence of broad and scholarly research; his eager spirit is fired to emulate what he finds so admirable. The contact between scholar and master cannot elsewhere be so easy and frequent as at a school where both live practically under the same roof. This association must, of course, be quite unforced; otherwise, it savors of patronizing, and a healthy boy is quick to resent and clever to defeat such unwelcome meddling. Mr. A. C. Benson tells of a young Oxford don by the name of Tupper who was over-eager to bring the undergraduates under what he supposed to be an elevating personal influence. He was rudely shocked one evening to hear through his open window, the remark of one undergraduate to another on the walk below: "Let's do a Tupper tonight, and get it over with for the year." And yet, many an "old boy" at commencement day recalls with grateful satisfaction his early association with his masters, the long talks, the kindly advice, the welcome that always awaited him in the intimacy of their studies and the ideals unconsciously absorbed for later life. And nowhere as in the boarding school, are such opportunities so readily afforded.

Absence of Distractions

"No man can serve two masters." Study and amusement fighting for the golden springtime of youth are deadly foes in an unequal struggle. The scholar of mature years may serve the one and use the other with wise discrimination, but not the intemperate soul of youth. "A boy's will is the wind's will." He will "hate the one and love the other"; he will vaunt the flippant boast that he is "getting an education in spite of the faculty"; and he will go forth into the world with a thin veneer of scholarship to make the judicious grieve. To this disinclination to serious mental work, the boarding school opposes an orderly succession of study, sport and amusement. No system can secure a perfect efficiency; it can only send away those who stubbornly refuse to profit by their opportunities. The first requisites of such a school is a kindly strictness and a wise restraint. How irksome are strictness and restraint to the ardent spirit of youth, none know better than those whose duty it is to enforce them. Many will never understand their purpose or see anything but petty tyranny and unwarranted interference with "natural rights." The school management which is too conscientious to put mere numbers before lasting results, must rest secure in the hope that in years to come those who have submitted perforce to the system will understand its wisdom. And yet after ten months of such freedom from distractions, the average student will look back in June with a sense of satisfaction over a fair measure of achievement, which would not otherwise have been his. And with the knowledge of these results, the school must rest content.

"Labor Improbus"

If there is one point on which those who have acquired a measure of success in life are in accord, it is the necessary connection between success and work. Work may not always bring success, but success is not possible without work. The business man, the professional man and the statesman agree in this, that the summits of life are gained by the long and stony path of unremitting toil. The statement is a commonplace in "Advice to Young Men" and a platitude of the commencement orator. Yet few young men under twenty realize its application to their lives. The habit of concentrated mental work is the most enduring result of a man's early training. The Latin and the Greek, the history and the science so laboriously acquired too often fade from the mind by the early thirties, but habits of industry, the joy of combating and conquering intellectual difficulties, is an enduring gain and the source of power and leadership. It is far from common in any class of students and in any school. But this may be said in all moderation of statement: that those who have the will to work have almost unlimited opportunities at boarding school to get the best out of these years of their life; while those who would otherwise idle their time away in welcome dissipation will acquire something of a vigorous mental spirit. The inevitable hindrances to study, both social and domestic are almost entirely absent, while opportunities and excuses to shirk are noticeably fewer than they are at home.

If this paper should seem a partisan presentation of the case for the boarding school, the writer can only repeat that it sets forth his honest convictions based on an experience with both systems. To sum it up: the average boy will progress farther at boarding school in piety, character and scholarship than he will elsewhere, not because of better teaching or better educational equipment, but because of the single fact that such a manner of life best meets the average problem of the average boy from fourteen to twenty-one.

Campion College. Claude J. Pernin, s.j.

SOCIOLOGY

On the East Side

JUST a block from the Bowery, where the city's life is mixed and free, you will find the Barat Settlement House. Not very pretentious, it is true, nor elaborately furnished, but real settlement work is done there, nobly and generously. And after all, that is what counts. The one thing necessary in a settlement house, at least as far as the children of Italian parents are concerned, is to make them know and love and practise their religion. This end is attained in Chrystie Street, a neighborhood in days not so long ago known as "Crime Block." The police-blotter in the nearby station-house gives the best explanation for the name. Many settlement houses succeed in supplying the physical needs of the children. The Barat Settlement does this, but it also looks after their souls and makes them realize that their Faith is the greatest of treasures, the pearl beyond price, the dearest thing to hold, the saddest thing to lose.

How the Work is Done

You might think you were in the poor quarter of Naples, if you strolled down Chrystie Street some afternoon, and mingled in the crowds that surge along past number 223, where true settlement work is done. But you are not; you are in old New York, amid conditions that may jar your notions of the social question and make you wonder less why the illiterate, underpaid workmen eagerly listen to the soap-box Socialist orator, painting the picture of what might be if society were only revolutionized. You know he is an idle dreamer, but the poor man in the street, coming home from long hours of hard work, thinks the picture wonderfully beautiful and firmly believes in the Socialist's Utopia. It is the children of this poor man that the workers in the Barat Settlement have to meet, in order to bring sunshine into young lives where there is much gloom and suffering. Two rooms in a rear tenement on the lower East Side rarely admit much sunshine. So the little ones gather at the Settlement, some at early morning, others when school is over, to learn that there is something more in life than low wages and dark tenements.

The Settlement is governed by a board of directors composed of the Children of Mary of the three Convents of the Sacred Heart in New York City. The ordinary management of the house is entrusted to a resident matron, and a resident worker and a janitress are there during the day, but it is the Children of Mary who devote their time to the various works of the Settlement. The open-hearted confidence of the little ones, their intelligent grasp of the fundamentals of Catholic doctrine, their love for the life-giving Sacraments, speak loudly and eloquently of the solid work accomplished by the devoted daughters of the great Heart of Christ, who give of their best when they devote themselves to the work of bringing the little ones nearer to the Lover of Children.

Phases of the Work

Christian Doctrine, the science, as Pope Pius X told the Roman clergy a month after he assumed the tiara, that is the great antidote to modern pseudo-science, is one of the chief works carried on in crowded Cherry Street. There are fourteen classes in all, from the prayer class to the perseverance class, the children coming voluntarily after the closing bell rings in the public school. For these little ones live east of the Bowery, a good distance from the school attached to the Mission of Loretto. A feature of catechetical instruction that appeals very strongly to the lively young minds is the stereopticon lecture. Pictures appropriate to the different seasons of the ecclesiastical year are thrown upon the screen, and the story of the God-Man living among the children of men is retold in simple language.

The kindergarten is an important division of the Barat Settlement and proves an untold blessing to the overworked mothers of this congested tenement district. The opening hour is nine o'clock and the closing hour three. That is supposed to be the daily order, but the fact is eight o'clock often finds the place crowded to its limit, and long past four in the afternoon you will find the youngsters playing there, waiting for their mothers to take them safely home. And oh, what homes they have! It is Ruskin, I believe, who tells us that home is the place of peace, the shelter not only from all injury, but from all terror, doubt and division. Ruskin, probably, wrote that in the quiet of his study, looking out of his big window at some smiling patch of meadow-land bathed in summer sunlight. He never lived on New York's East Side, a block or two from the Bowery, where "home" spells something quite different.

Part of the Settlement's schedule comprises domestic science, and over fifty children make up the classes of cooking and sewing. They are taught up-to-date cooking methods, and due attention is given to food values. In the sewing classes the younger children begin on canvas work, their older sisters on small patches of cotton, learning running, hemming, overseam, back-stitch, etc. Little by little as they progress they are taught to make their own clothes, which, when properly finished, they are permitted to keep. Friday afternoon is sewing day at the Settlement, and the attendance is always large, for many of the children feel that, in the near future, the needle will be for them a means of livelihood.

Sodality Activity

The older girls, some of whom spend busy days in shop or factory, meet every Sunday morning at eleven, as members of the St. Agnes Sodality. They have their little acts of devotion and works of zeal, and their Communion Sunday each month when they approach the Holy Table in a body. Their weekly dues are one cent, the sum being used for an entertainment which the girls plan themselves. To miss a meeting is a rare event, and the spirit of piety in these sodalists is striking. If you would know the Sodality spirit, not on paper, but in real life, spend a few minutes listening to these children speaking of the interests dearest to their pure young hearts, the interests of their Immaculate Queen. Or if perchance you know of any group of sodalists in college or convent school, grown apathetic in sodality duties, send a few of them down to New York's East Side, and they will learn how the Queen of Heaven can hold her court on earth, yes, and not in a very beautiful part of earth at that.

There is a boys' club, too, down in the Barat Settlement, that meets three evenings a week, from seven till nine-thirty. The Junior Holy Name Society, as their club is called, gives the youngsters a chance to spend an enjoyable and interesting evening, and saves their money and their souls from falling into the maw of the "movies," that are as numerous as they are cheap, in every sense of the term, in this part of Manhattan. The Junior Holy Name combines the social with the spiritual, for it is really a sodality as well as a club. Games and debates, story-telling and instruction fill up the evening and keep the boys off the streets. Now to keep them off the streets sounds rather meaningless in print, and gives the impression of little accomplished in the way of boy-saving. You will grasp the force of the expression if you spend a few hours after sundown in these streets on and around the Bowery, when the night-life of this section is in full swing.

Methods and Figures

The little boys, ranging from seven to twelve years, have their own meeting hours, play their games, enjoy the graphophone or the stories told them by the devoted matron of the Barat Settlement. The big boys, who form the senior division of the club, hold meetings distinct from the youngsters, presided over by one of the teachers from the Loretto Mission School. As their school days are numbered, for most of them have to begin work early in life and contribute to the support of their families, they are warned against the grave dangers that confront the working lad in the present economic conditions that are common to all big American cities. They are given popular talks on social problems, and on their library table is placed sound literature that exposes modern social fallacies.

Cooking and sewing classes, catechetical instruction and illustrated lectures, games, amusements and mothers' meetings make up the activities of settlement work. The report of the Barat Settlement for the year just closing gives the following figures: Day nursery, average daily attendance, infants and toddlers, 50; kindergarten and after-school children, 58; boys' catechism classes, 124; girls' catechism classes, 129; Holy Name Society, 29; St. Agnes Sodality, 34; sewing society, 63; cooking class, 8. This report does not include the vacation months of July and August. During that time the house and yard are thrown open to the children, who are under the supervision of two paid workers. A shelter tent is in the yard, and the children have their games, their sand-pile and their swings.

Wanted: an Endowment

In these jottings you have only a pen-picture of the work going on in Chrystie Street. But no pen-picture can adequately portray it; to appreciate the good that is done you have to see with your own eyes what is going on. You might imagine, too, as you saw the Barat system in action that there was a substantial endowment back of all the energy that is pulsing through the house. The surprising fact is that there is no endowment at all. The annual sum of $6,000 is required to keep up the work, and the funds are raised mainly by subscriptions with an occasional bazaar when funds are low.

The Children of Mary who labor for the Barat Settlement are prominent Catholics of New York who believe in keeping their Catholicism alive and active. The work they are doing in Chrystie Street proves it. In a circular that was sent out some time ago were these words: "Will you help the Barat Settlement and Day Nursery to continue its work by sending one dollar for the enclosed tickets, as this amount will provide food for one child for ten days?" When you think over that sentence and then see the good being done on Chrystie Street, you can all but hear an echo of that piteous cry that rang out from Divine lips many centuries ago, on a hillside in old Judea: "Suffer the little children to come to me." The answer to that cry is sounded in deeds of love by true Catholic womanhood in Chrystie Street.

Gerald C. Treacy, s.j.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A special edition of the Wilmington Morning News announced on April 3 the loss sustained by the entire city in the death of Monsignor John A. Lyons, Vicar-General of the diocese of Wilmington, Delaware, and pastor of St. Peter's Cathedral. Catholics and Protestants mourned the loss of a man who was profoundly respected by all. Forty-six years of priestly service consecrated to the Church as a devoted pastor was the noble record of his life. During that time he had become a mighty power for good within his own community, and the zealous loyalty with which he exercised his high calling won for him an influence far beyond the circle of his own Faithful. "He was a model priest," and in those few words is summed up the secret of his great success. He desired no honors, but wished to labor unto weariness and death for the flock committed to his care. "A prelate of firm and unswerving convictions," the secular press editorially said of him, "and free to express them in the pulpit and out of it, when he thought necessary, Monsignor Lyons exerted wide influence, which was not limited to Roman Catholic circles. He was a man of high ideals, which he did not fail to inculcate by his life and preaching." His charities were many and seldom were priest and people so intimately and affectionately united. His last words to his parishioners were likewise the keynote of his own life: "Live for God; live for eternity!" It is a motto that might well be carved in stone for his lasting memorial.

The idols are falling. In his recently published autobiography, Charles Francis Adams expresses as follows his opinion of Harvard College in the fifties and of Harvard University today:

> But as for giving direction to, in the sense of shaping, the individual minds of young men in their most plastic stage, so far as I know nothing of the kind was even dreamed of; it never entered into the professorial mind. This was what I needed, and all I needed—an intelligent, inspiring direction; and I never got it, nor a suggestion of it. I was left absolutely without guidance. I might blunder through, and, doubtless, somehow would blunder through, just as I did; but if I didn't work my problem out for myself, it would remain unsolved.
>
> And that was the Harvard system. It remains in essence the Harvard system still. An old, outgrown, pedagogic relation of the large class recitation room. The only variation has been through Eliot's effort to replace it by the yet more pernicious system of premature specialization. This is a confusion of the college and university functions, and constitutes a direct menace to all true higher education. The function of the college is an all-round development, as a basis for university specializations. Eliot never grasped that fundamental fact; and so he undertook to turn Harvard College into a German university, specializing the student at 18. He thus made still worse what was in my time bad enough. He instituted a system of one-sided contact in place of a system based on no contact at all. It is devoutly to be hoped that some day a glimmer of true light will effect an entrance into the professional educator's head.

Catholic educators, of course, have always insisted on the high importance of close relations between teachers and pupils and have sternly opposed, like Mr. Adams, all specializing until the student has laid, during his college course, a broad and solid groundwork of general culture.

The extreme need of Catholic schools in Texas has recently been brought to the notice of Catholics. "The easiest way for the Texas situation to be taken care of," Our Sunday Visitor suggested, "would be for some good-sized parish 'up north' to adopt one of the schools." By way of example Our Sunday Visitor has adopted six of these schools, making itself responsible for their regular support. It then recommends a list of other schools for adoption, the annual expenses of which vary from $150 to $500. The schools in question have been built to give assistance to priests laboring among the Mexicans who constitute from three-fourths to nine-tenths of the Texan population. "There is no large congregation where a parish sodality would not gladly undertake the sweet burden of supporting one of these schools," the editor adds. "In every city and town Catholics are acquainted with the activities among Protestant organizations for the furtherance of missionary work, and there is no cause for which our Catholic ladies would so cheerfully band themselves together." To support a hundred such schools, as he rightly says, should offer no difficulty where the cost is so comparatively small and the good to be accomplished so very great. Several of these schools have already been adopted by parishes or individual Catholics. Thus in the latest issue of Our Sunday Visitor a priest writes: "I am willing personally to defray the expenses of supporting one of the schools you have mentioned. Please let me know what school is most in need of support and I will send a check next week." Other generous contributions toward this purpose are likewise noted. A picture of the school and its children is sent by the priest in charge and daily prayers are said for the intentions of the donors. The schools themselves are usually built at a cost below $1,000 and employ from one to five teachers.

The latest edition of "The Official Catholic Directory," published by P. J. Kenedy & Sons, has just been announced. It places the number of Catholics in the United States, as carefully compiled from the records of the various diocesan chancery offices, at 16,564,109. To this figure, says Joseph H. Meier, who has devoted more than ten years to the study of the subject, at least ten per cent must be added in order "to arrive at the real Catholic population figure of the United States." Such an addition would increase the total number of Catholics to over 18,000,000. We may consider this a rather fair estimate, in spite of the carping remarks recently made in many non-Catholic publications upon the question of Catholic population statistics. Should this year's gain of 254,799 seem to be comparatively small, Mr. Meier offers the explanation that it has not been possible for all the dioceses to take a new census during the past year. Many of the reports therefore remain unchanged. Twenty-six banner States are enumerated with a Catholic population of over 100,000, and four that exceed the million mark: New York with 2,899,223, Pennsylvania with 1,802,977, Illinois with 1,479,291 and Massachusetts with 1,400,834. The following are some other items of statistical interest to which the publishers call attention:

> Including the Catholics of the Island possessions of the United States it is found, according to the 1916 edition of "The Official Catholic Directory" that there are 24,922,062 Catholics under the United States flag. In the United States proper there are 16,564,109; in the Philippines there are 7,285,458. The additional 1,072,495 are in Alaska, the Canal Zone, in Guam, in American Samoa, in the Hawaiian Islands and in Porto Rico. The 1916 Directory shows, therefore, that there are almost twenty-five million Catholics under the protection of the stars and stripes.
>
> There are 19,572 Catholic Clergymen in the United States. Of these 14,318 are Secular Clergy while 5,254 are Regular Clergy, that is, members of Religious Orders. Death laid a heavy hand on American Prelates and Priests during the year 1915 and not in a score of years have so many changes taken place. One Archbishop and ten Bishops passed away and according to the necrology section of the present edition 321 priests went to their eternal reward.
>
> The publication also lists 10,058 Catholic churches with resident priests; 5,105 mission churches; eighty-five seminaries with 6,201 students studying for the priesthood; 112 homes for aged; 210 colleges for boys; 685 academies for girls and 5,588 parochial schools. In these parochial schools there are enrolled 1,497,949 children. Furthermore, there are 283 orphan asylums with 48,089 orphans.

An attempt was likewise made to secure figures showing the number of converts made during the past year. In the sixty-nine dioceses in which such records were kept they numbered 19,009. But from many of the most important centers no statistics could be obtained. "No convert figures were reported from New York, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, St. Paul, San Francisco, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Hartford, Newark and twenty-two other dioceses." It is certain, therefore, that the number of converts is vastly greater than the above figure indicates, although much more might doubtless be done in this direction by the zealous American Catholics.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 2
WHOLE No. 367

APRIL 22, 1916

PRICE, 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

Home News: Papal Letter to the American Jews. The War: Bulletin, April 11, p. m.-April 18, a. m.—The Fight for Verdun—The German Note. France: Slandered Priests. Germany: The Emperor at Mass—Rumano-German Treaty. Great Britain: Conscription and the Married Men. Ireland: Interest in the Gaelic Language. Mexico: Attitude toward Americans.....25-28

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Paschal Message — XLV–The Young Man and Fruit-Growing — Shakespeare's Religion — The Drama League of America—The Thrift of Thought—Wilfrid Philip Ward: Victorian.29-37

COMMUNICATIONS

Another Myth — Evangelizing South America — Shaw on Ireland.....37

EDITORIALS

Human Vivisection — The Baptists' "Queen of Whistlers"—His Most Eloquent Sermon—Labor and the Flag — The Beam and the Mote — The Messenger's Golden Jubilee.....38-40

LITERATURE

The Man of the Mask.

REVIEWS: Strength of Will—Crises in the History of the Papacy — Nights — American Banking — Credits and Collections—Investments and Speculation — The Portion of a Champion — Nan of Music Mountain—The Hound of Heaven—Cardinal Newman's Dream of Gerontius — Father Damien—The Revolution in Virginia.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Catholic Mind—"The Fairy Bride"—"Quinneys' "—"My Friend Phil" —"I Conquered" — "Instead of the Thorn" — "The New Psalter of the Roman Breviary"—Mr. Roosevelt on Reading — "Cam Clarke" — "Babette"—"The Belfry"—"A Prayer in Time of War".....41-45

EDUCATION

I–Dangers of Secular Universities.....45, 46

SOCIOLOGY

The Training of Social Workers.....46, 47

NOTE AND COMMENT

National Convention of the Knights of Columbus — Mrs. Agnes Boone Otis — At Verdun — Death of the Rev. Francis Kuppens, S.J.—Socialist Views of Marriage—Publications for the Blind—Mr. Asquith and the Pope—Casualties of the Crown Prince—Growth of Divorce...47, 48

CHRONICLE

Home News.—The American Jewish Committee has received a remarkable letter written in the name of his Holiness by the Cardinal Secretary of State. The Committee had addressed the Pope, citing instances in which the Jews "have been marked for special persecution and have been subjected to oppressive measures not borne by their compatriots of other creeds." The petitioners wrote:

Papal Letter to the American Jews

With all due veneration we now approach the Supreme Pontiff for succor in this the bitter hour of our need, knowing the exemplary humanity for which your Holiness is justly distinguished. . . . We recall with admiration and gratitude that on many occasions in the past some of the revered predecessors of your Holiness have, under like conditions, extended protection to those of the Jewish faith in the interest of right and justice. Appreciating the transcendent importance which the entire civilized world attaches to any utterance from so exalted a source of morality and wisdom as that which your Holiness represents, we confidently express the hope that timely action be taken by the Vatican to the end that the suffering under which millions of our brethren in faith are weighed down may be terminated by an act of that humanity to which your Holiness is so passionately devoted, and that the cruel intolerance and the unjust prejudice which have been aroused against them may forever vanish before this glorious exercise of your supreme moral and spiritual power.

We beg your Holiness to believe us to be your most respectful petitioners: Louis Marshall, Jacob H. Schiff, Oscar S. Strauss, Mayer Sulzberger, Cyrus Adler, J. L. Magnes, Julian W. Mack, Julius Rosenwald, Isaac Bernheim, Harry Cutler, Jacob Hollander, Samuel Dorf, Cyrus Sulzberger, A. Leo Weil, Isador Sobel.

To this communication the Cardinal Secretary of State made the following reply:

The Supreme Pontiff has with interest taken notice of your letter bearing date of December 30, 1915, which you have been pleased to address him in the name of the 3,000,000 Jewish citizens of the United States of America, in order to communicate to him generally the treatment to which your coreligionists complain that they have been exposed in various regions, and at the same time you have requested him to interpose the weight of his supreme moral and spiritual power, in order that these sufferings may be terminated by an act of that humanity to which the Holy Father is so passionately devoted.

The Supreme Pontiff is unable to express himself concerning the special facts referred to in the memorandum submitted with your letter. But in principle, as the Head of the Catholic Church, which, faithful to its Divine doctrine and to its most glorious traditions, considers all men as brethren, and teaches them to love one another, he will not cease to inculcate the observance among individuals, as among nations, of the principles of natural right, and to reprove every violation of them. This right should be observed and respected in relation to the Children of Israel, as it should be to all men, for it would not conform to justice, and to religion itself, to derogate therefrom solely because of a difference of religious faith.

Moreover, in his paternal heart, pained by the spectacle of the existing horrible war, the Supreme Pontiff feels in this moment more deeply than ever the necessity that all men should recollect that they are brothers, and that their salvation lies in the return to the law of love which is the law of the Gospels. He also desires to interest to this end all who, especially by reason of the sacred attributes of their pastoral ministrations, are able to bring efficient aid to this important result.

In the meantime, his Holiness rejoices in the unity which in civil matters exists in the United States of America among the members of different faiths and which contributes so powerfully to the peaceful prosperity of your great country. He prays to God that peace may at length appear for the happiness of that humanity of which you truly say the Holy Father is the guardian.

This beautiful letter breathing the Christ-like spirit of peace and love, has been received with great satisfaction by those to whom it is addressed. Herman Bernstein thus comments on it in The American Hebrew:

Among all the Papal Bulls ever issued with regard to the Jews throughout the history of the Vatican, there is no statement that equals this direct, unmistakeable plea for equality for the Jews and against prejudice on religious grounds. The Bull issued by Innocent IV, declaring the Jews innocent of the charge of using Christian blood for ritual purposes, while a remarkable document, was, after all, merely a statement of fact, whereas the present statement by Pope Benedict XV is a plea against religious prejudice and persecution.

It should be noted, however, that the communication of his Holiness, is not a papal Bull, but a letter from the Cardinal Secretary of State.

The War.—Although there has been considerable activity, especially on the part of the artillery, in Belgium and France, and along the Italian and Greek borders, no important change has taken place in any of these theaters of the war. The British and French have landed troops on the Greek island of Cephalonia, west of Greece, but they have disclaimed any intention of occupying the island, their single purpose being to establish a naval station at Argostoli. Along the Dvina, south of Dvinsk and near Lake Narotch, there have been numerous engagements between the Germans and Russians, but the general situation has undergone no serious modification. In Galicia the Russians have had more success, for they have forced the Austrians to fall back to Jaslowice, on the Strypa. The Turks have been making great efforts to check the advance of the Russians in Armenia, and especially toward Trebizond, but they have been defeated near Baiburt, and their offensive has failed. In Mesopotamia the British report an advance toward Kut-el-Amara along the right bank of the Tigris. The distance gained varies from one and one-half miles to three miles. Portugal has entered into active hostilities by occupying Kionga on the southern frontier of German East Africa.

Bulletin, April 11, p. m.-April 18, a. m.

Last week began with violent fighting in the region of Verdun. After securing their recent gains west of the Meuse, the Germans bombarded with heavy guns the French positions on the slopes and summits of Hills 287, 304, Mort Homme and 295, then according to their custom they launched a series of infantry assaults. The French everywhere held their ground. Later the Germans shifted their offensive to the other side of the river and concentrated their attack on the ridge west of Douaumont. The French remained on the defensive, and the battle, which has been described as one of the most violent and bloody that have taken place in this district, gradually extended until both artillery and infantry were engaged on the entire front from Malancourt Wood to the village of Vaux. The fighting, however, gave no permanent advantage to either side, except that the Germans succeeded in getting a foothold on the western slope of the Côte du Poivre, and made some progress in the Caillette Wood. After a day the German offensive slackened, and the rest of the week was marked by diminished artillery fire and intermittent efforts on the part of the Germans to penetrate the French line, especially east of Mort Homme Hill. Most of these attacks were made in the sector south of the Corbeaux and Cumières Woods, but up to the present they have resulted in no further progress by the Germans.

The Fight for Verdun

The note sent by Berlin to Washington in answer to the three communications addressed by the United States to the German Government on the subject of the recent sinking of five steamships has been given to the public. It admits that two of these ships, the Englishman and the Eagle Point, were sunk by German submarines, but only after they had attempted to escape and not until sufficient time had been given those on board to get away safely. The circumstances attending the loss of the Manchester Engineer and the Berwindale, it is claimed, are still in doubt, although the German Government concedes the possibility of the latter having been torpedoed by a German submarine. With regard to the Sussex, the note declares that it must be assumed that the injury to this vessel "is attributable to another cause than an attack by a German submarine." This assumption rests on the noticeable difference between the sketch made by the German submarine commander of the ship he attacked on March 24, between Folkestone and Dieppe, which seemed to him to be a war vessel, and the picture of the Sussex published by the Daily Graphic. The note suggests that the Sussex probably struck a floating mine. Berlin asks to be made acquainted with any evidence that the United States has secured, and professes willingness to have the facts established "through mixed commissions of investigations in accordance with the Hague agreement." The note is far from satisfactory to the Administration at Washington.

The German Note

France.—Almost every copy of La Croix of Paris complains of the unjust and heartless accusations made against the Catholic clergy. According to Le Petit Troyen, La Dépêche de Toulouse, La Lanterne and Le Radical, etc., priests are shirking their duty at the front. M. Paul Adam, a member of the French Academy, recently made a savage attack in La Dépêche de Toulouse on the soldier-priests and those ecclesiastics still engaged in parish-work at home. The censor allowed the slander to pass. Some time after, another Toulouse paper, the Express du Midi, tried to publish a list of ecclesiastics either decorated for gallantry or killed in action. The censor blue-penciled the list. This flagrant injustice impelled the well-known Academician, M. Maurice Barrès, to write a series of articles in the Écho de Paris in defense of the outraged priests. The articles were so convincing that M. Paul Adam publicly withdrew his charges and apologized. The Minister of War, moreover, formally reprimanded the Toulouse censor for having allowed the publication of the slander.

Slandered Priests

Germany.—On April 13 the German Emperor attended a High Mass celebrated by the Archbishop of Cologne, Cardinal Felix von Hartmann. The latter had recently returned from his pastoral tour of the west front, and the Mass was celebrated at the main army headquarters. After a sermon to the soldiers the Cardinal directly addressed the Emperor, thanking him for his presence and expressing his assurance that the prayers "for a glorious victory and an early peace" of so many soldiers gathered about their sovereign would not go unheard. He then vouched for the loyalty of Catholics:

The Emperor at Mass

> Should God demand still further heavy sacrifices from us, I act as the interpreter for the Catholic soldiers of the army in offering to your Majesty a vow of unswerving loyalty in all the battles, in all the sorrows, in all the sacrifices of the war. May God, all powerful and all merciful, before whose eyes we are assembled, protect and guard your Majesty and our dear Fatherland.

As the result of a collection taken up among the Prussian Catholics for the German wounded, the Cardinal presented the Emperor with 360,000 marks. It is edifying to note in this connection that a dispatch, bearing the same date, tells of a pilgrimage made to Mariazell under the direction of the Prince Archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Piffl, in which sixteen members of the Austrian imperial family took part. The object was to ask Our Lady's intercession for a speedy peace.

Of far-reaching importance is the news of a commercial treaty between Rumania and Germany, which has now been confirmed. It provides for free exportation of domestic products, with the exception of war munitions, between the two nations. Rumania is believed to have promised Germany all the produce which she herself does not use. Russia has thus lost an enormous market which would have been open to the American farmer had he been free to export his wheat to Germany. The grain exports of Rumania are valued at between $100,000,000 and $125,000,000 and had hitherto been sent to the Western, as distinguished from the Central Powers. American farmers have been forced to forego one of their greatest opportunities, since the treaty, it is thought, will govern the relations of Rumania and Germany for many years. A Bucharest dispatch says.

Rumano-German Treaty

> The Rumanian newspapers point out that the Central Powers have proved that their economic position is firm and unshakeable, and that they are still able to take care of their old markets. Rumanian commerce and industry have been greatly relieved by the new treaty, since the lack of many necessary articles was sorely felt.

Since Rumania would by such a course lay herself open to retaliatory steps by the Entente Powers should they prove victorious, the conclusion is drawn that "Rumania has plainly intimated to the world its belief that Germany, if it is not victorious, certainly will not be defeated." The treaty is said to include pourparlers with Bulgaria and Turkey for a commercial agreement. News from German sources states that it reaches even deeper and at least precludes any possibility of a war between Rumania and Germany.

Great Britain.—The conscription of married men is continuing to be a debated question. A decision has not been reached, but it is generally "understood" that a majority of the Cabinet Ministers are opposed to compulsion. This is the decision of the special committee appointed to investigate the matter for the Cabinet, and is based, according to report, on a thorough study of the Military Service Act and of the results of Lord Derby's recruiting system. To avoid conscription of married men, three plans have been formulated. The first provides conscription for all youths as they reach the age of eighteen; the second urges drafting a larger number of single men from the reserved trades; and the third would retain the time-expired soldiers. It is claimed that these three recommendations, if adopted, will secure a larger number of men than the plan of conscripting all married men of military age.

Conscription and the Married Men

Ireland.—One of the Irish papers prints this interesting synopsis of a speech delivered by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Hackett, the new Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, in answer to addresses from various branches of the Gaelic League:

Interest in the Gaelic Language

> Was it not unworthy of some to think lightly of the tongue that entered into the nation's life? Unfortunately he could not speak it himself, but as bishop he should give it every help possible and strive to encourage as far as he could the learning of Irish in the schools over which he should have any authority. He made the statement not merely from a sentimental standpoint. He did so because his conclusion rested upon a higher motive, a spiritual one. Going through the country on missionary work, he often felt ashamed of himself, and he often felt that he could do more in certain districts if he had been able to speak to the people and instruct them in the tongue in which they had learned the mysteries of their religion in days gone by.

The Oireachtas will be held this year in Waterford, and its promoters are delighted to see that the national language has such a zealous friend and advocate in the new Bishop.

The awakening interest in Irish as a spoken language is everywhere evident. The Leader takes the opportunity, therefore, to recall the views of Father Fitzgerald, O.F.M., set forth a few years ago in his popular booklet, "Stepping Stones to Gaeldom." While the author of this book recognizes the good works done by the Gaelic League, yet he would like to see its tactics radically changed. The principal work of the League is now done in the winter months, and mainly from books. The time given to the work should be longer. Irish must come back as the spoken language of the people. Father Fitzgerald thus puts the case:

We must bring the language out of the catacombs and devote at least three times more attention to speaking it than we do to acquiring it out of books. Lectures, debates, and conversations in Irish should begin in real earnest when the classes are discontinued, all who can should visit one of the Irish Training Colleges, or an Irish-speaking district, and thus the stored-up wealth of words will be minted into the current coin of conversation. May we soon have many schools modeled after St. Enda's of Rathfarnham.

Our ancestors got compulsory English, and so we haven't the slightest scruple in bringing in Irish by legislation, and although some of the patients may make wry faces they will be soon rejuvenated by this elixir of nationhood. The spread of the language and of Irish history will lead to further conquests, and to an organized system of utilizing native speakers thus to enrich the rest of Ireland with the stored-up treasure of the Irish-speaking districts.

Without this, Father Fitzgerald concludes, the results of the revival of the national language in the University would be incomplete.

Mexico.—During the week the Mexicans gave unmistakable evidence of their disapproval of the American invasion. On April 12, unarmed American soldiers who had entered Parral to purchase supplies were fired upon. Our soldiers retreated toward their camp, and, as the fire continued, American troops moved out from that place and attacked the Mexicans. For some time no details of the incident were known to the public; but on April 15 Secretary Baker made the following announcement:

Attitude Toward Americans

Telegram from General Funston quotes a telegram from General Pershing to the effect that he has just received information of an unprovoked attack upon American soldiers who had entered Parral to buy supplies. His information is that two American soldiers and forty Mexicans were killed, but no further details had been reported at the time.

General Pershing also reports that he has given full information to General Herrera as to the position, direction, and general destination of our troops pursuing Villa. He has sent by aeroplane for full particulars.

The official report left much unexplained, and it appears that although our soldiers are in an unenviable position, Carranza is defiant, arrogant, and unreasonable; he will not permit the use of the wires for code messages and still refuses to allow the use of railroads for the transportation of necessary food. On April 13, immediately after the Parral incident, he repeated his demand that our troops be withdrawn from Mexican soil. Both in this country and in Mexico the statement was made that Carranza's wish would be granted, but on April 15, Secretary Baker announced that:

The status of the expedition into Mexico is as it was at the beginning, in cordial cooperation with the de facto Government of Mexico. That cooperation continues and the expedition continues. There has been no change either in the purpose or the orders. No change in the orders has been made and none is in contemplation. I had the hope that the incident at Parral was exaggerated. I still entertain that hope and I hope that it will turn out to be local and accidental.

Despite this, however, Carranza was informed from Washington that the United States would negotiate for a settlement of the difficulty along these lines:

The United States Government is willing to agree to fix a limit on the distance the American troops now in pursuit of Villa shall proceed into Mexico, and to make that limit not much further south than the troops already have proceeded. The United States Government is willing to give assurances that the American troops will be withdrawn within "a reasonable time," or as soon as it is definitely established that Villa has reached a point where he can be dealt with better by the Carranza forces.

The Parral trouble was aggravated by the fact that, after the fighting, Mexicans wantonly destroyed several million dollars' worth of American property in Chihuahua. Meantime Congress was silent, officially ignorant of conditions. On April 15, Congressman Rodenberg of Illinois stirred the House by this resolution:

Today's papers make the astounding announcement that as late as yesterday the State Department issued a permit to the de facto Government of Mexico to pass 1,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition from Douglas, Ariz., across the line to Agua Prieta, during the next few days, and that the ammunition is now en route to the border. I regard the granting of this permit as little short of criminal. Carranza has given abundant evidence of his treacherous character, and unless all signs fail this very ammunition which our bewildered and befuddled Administration is permitting him to import will be used to kill our soldiers in Mexico. The ammunition used by Villa in "shooting up" Columbus was secured from the United States under a permit of the Administration at a time when Villa was basking in the sunshine of Mr. Wilson's favor. It is high time that Congress should pass legislation to prevent a repetition of this fearful mistake, inasmuch as the Administration by its action of yesterday seems determined to continue in its stupid and blundering policy in Mexico.

The resolution was not acted on. On April 12, El Democrata, a Carranzista paper published in Chihuahua City, printed an absurd announcement that a new republic is to be formed from Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Nevada, California, and Colorado. After the establishment, this republic, which has for its object the freedom of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, is to be annexed to Mexico. According to El Democrata, all jails in the aforesaid places are to be opened and the negroes and Indians "subjugated by Yankee gold" are to be set free so as to join an army of conquest. In the original plan Georgia and a number of the other Southern States were also to be torn from the Union and set up as a black republic. The author of the plan, Vergara, declares he intends to abolish race hatred, divide the land among the poor and destroy all jails. He pays this compliment to Americans: "Yankee pride has reached its utmost limits. Not content with daily lynchings of men, it now dedicates itself to lynching a whole people, a whole race, a whole continent. It is against this that we should struggle."

This is a fair example of the methods used to impress the peons with the strength and courage of the Carranzistas. Moreover, in the Magdalena district of Sonora, circulars have been distributed calling upon Mexicans to drive out the American invaders.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Paschal Message

THE Feast of Easter is the solemn anniversary of the greatest day in the history of the human race, preeminently "the day that the Lord hath made," the day of days, a day certainly on which to rejoice and be glad. Other days were steps in the development of God's bounty to man, but of none of them does the Church say, in the words of the Psalmist, "This is the day that the Lord hath made." This title is reserved for Easter alone, for the Resurrection is the crowning mercy of all God's mercies. Without it, the Passion would have left room for doubt. But the Resurrection following the Passion gives perfect surety and perfect confidence. It is the source of Christian joy, it is the ground of Christian hope, it is the foundation of Christian faith.

Easter is a day of joy. Over every other event in the life of the Saviour, the Cross cast its shadow, but Easter stands out in the unclouded sunshine of the beatific, risen life. Christ dies no more. He has conquered death. His Passion is over. Through endless ages He is assured of flawless life. Therefore it is that the Church, His Spouse, cannot but rejoice. What if her lot be the portion of suffering; He whom she loves is in glory.

But Christ's happiness is not for Himself alone. It overflows from the Sacred Heart into the hearts of His brethren. He has snatched us from hell, He has won for us a kingdom. We are no longer children of wrath. Our peace has been made. We can now look up to God's throne and ask for His love. Though our sins be as scarlet, we have no cause for despair. We have been restored, we have been given our ancient, yea a higher place in the affection of God. Adam was an adopted son; we are the brethren of Jesus Christ. Adam was the heir to heaven; we are co-heirs with the Eternal Word. Adam was the image and likeness of God; we are members of the mystical Body of the Saviour. Our motives are more appealing, our helps more abundant than before the Fall. In one way we have gained more than we lost.

The Resurrection is also the ground of our hope. After nineteen centuries, it still lights Christians through the dark way of life, it softens the terror of dying, it fills the tomb with flowers. It is not hard to go down into the silent grave, when we know that not even the body will lie there forever, but that soon, sooner perhaps than we expect, like Christ, we shall rise again. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," says Job, "and in the last day I shall rise out of the earth. And I shall be clothed with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see my God. Whom I myself shall see, and my eyes behold, and not another: this my hope is laid up in my bosom." Job's hope is the hope of every Christian. "Behold," says St. Paul, "I tell you a mystery. We shall all indeed rise again. . . . Thanks be to God, who has given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Each Easter the Church is reassured by the Apostle that its hope is well founded. "If the dead rise not again, neither is Christ risen again. . . . But now Christ is risen from the dead. . . . And as in Adam all die, so also in Christ all shall be made alive." Let unbelievers say what they will, we are not the most miserable of men. We look for a mansion in Our Father's house, we know we shall see God face to face.

As our hope, so also our faith is built upon Christ's Resurrection. We are not like children, tossed about by every wind of doctrine; our belief is as strong as the rock, it is a reasonable faith, founded on a sign that cannot be gainsaid, that has not been contradicted. No one denies that if Christ be risen from the dead, our faith is not vain. Now Christ has risen from the dead, and by His Resurrection He has given us a supremely convincing and indubitable sign that He is the Way, the Truth and the Life, that the Father has approved of His words and works, in short that He Himself is Divine. Other signs might perhaps have been doubted, but the Resurrection excludes the possibility of doubt.

Over His manger the Angels sang of Him, "Glory to God in the highest; out of the cloud on Mt. Thabor the mysterious Voice proclaimed Him for what He is, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased"; St. Peter, inspired not by flesh and blood but by the Father in Heaven, declared, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God"; sickness and death, the winds and the waves, the very demons did His bidding and acknowledged Him their Lord and Master; the elements of nature, light and darkness, the earth, the rocks, the graves with their dead, even the veil of the Temple admitted the truth of His Godhead; He Himself said He was God, that He came down from heaven, that He existed from eternity, that He was consubstantial with the Father, and in evidence of the truth of His words, He spoke in prophecy, worked miracles, and lived an absolutely perfect life.

But His own people were obdurate, they would not see, they refused to believe, they still asked for a sign. They challenged Him for further credentials. "What sign dost thou show unto us, seeing thou dost these things?" Jesus accepted their challenge. "Destroy this temple," He said, "and in three days I will raise it up." They asked for a sign. He told them to look for the Resurrection. St. John says explicitly that He spoke of the temple of His body. Nor were the Jews in doubt as to His meaning. They accepted Christ's gage, they realized that the Resurrection was to be the final test of His Divinity and the final proof of His mission.

Easter Sunday dawned, and in spite of their precautions Christ rose from the dead as He had promised. For forty days He dwelt on earth, and He who had been undeniably dead, gave visible and palpable proof that He had undeniably come to life. So clear was the evidence of His Resurrection that St. Peter threw it into the very teeth of His enemies, and they, not being able to dis-prove it, could only arrest the witnesses and bid them be silent. Later St. Paul saw Christ, and the apparition changed him from a bitter persecutor into the most enthusiastic preacher of the Resurrection. Nor did he ask for credence merely on the strength of his word, he told the Corinthians that on one occasion alone 500 persons had seen the risen Christ. Many of them, he added, were still alive. Therefore they could be questioned about the miracle. Indeed no fact in ancient history is better authenticated than the Resurrection. For the Apostles saw Christ frequently and in many places, and conversed and ate with Him after He rose from the dead, and they testified to the fact in the very face of death. The Evangelists all record it with most circumstantial detail. Two of them, St. Matthew and St. John, were certainly eye-witnesses; St. Mark was probably such; St. Luke, if he was not one of the disciples to whom Christ appeared on the road to Emmaus, undoubtedly heard of the Resurrection from Our Lady. Christians who learned of the wonder from the Apostles died by thousands to testify their belief in it. The tidings of the Resurrection made countless converts from paganism to Catholicism. And since the civilized world became Christian, hundreds and hundreds of millions have lived and are living by their faith in it. Only by stultifying all belief in human testimony can the Resurrection be denied to be a fact.

Had Christ not risen, the Apostles would have been dispersed, the fishers would have gone back to their nets, the Scribes and Pharisees would have pointed the finger of scorn at the ultimate failure of Jesus, and the Church would have remained unborn with a dead pretender in a lifeless tomb. But thanks be to God, Christ has risen as He said. He has made good His claims. He has confirmed our faith. He has founded the Church, which is to endure forever as the Kingdom of God.

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

XLV—The Young Man and Fruit-Growing

THE young man who takes up fruit-growing as a profession should possess energy, patience and good judgment, in addition to a real love for trees and plants. The work is hard. Fruit-tree and small-fruit plantings require good care in order to produce profitable crops. Spraying, pruning, cultivating and fertilizing, must all be done at the proper time, no matter what the weather; and it requires a live man who is not afraid of cold and wet to meet the emergencies that arise on a fruit-farm.

Oftentimes one has to wait for years before the results of patient planning and long toil are obtained. A Northern Spy apple-orchard, for instance, will not bear a profitable crop till some eight or ten years after the date of planting. Peaches, the earliest-bearing fruit-trees, will not give a return till three years after planting. Even strawberries, the quickest of all fruits to give returns, require one season to get a start in the ground, before fruiting. In addition to this, the patience of the fruit-grower is often put to a severe test when with a fine crop ready to pick, he finds that the big markets are over-supplied and that, because of imperfect methods of distribution, the whole yield must perish on his hands. Then, too, hard-freezing weather at the time when the buds are tenderest, insect-pests and fatal fungous diseases, hail-storms, cyclones and heavy winds are apt to undo the work of months. Fruit-growing, therefore, is not a profession for the young man who cannot meet losses courageously, and look forward patiently to a future harvest.

Sound judgment comes into play in every phase of the business. A good site for the orchard or small-fruit planting must be selected. Varieties of fruit must be chosen that are adapted to the soil and climate of the section. Account must be taken, too, of the market to be exploited. For instance, it would be folly to plant Baldwin apple-trees in some parts of the South, although this apple is the leading market variety in New York. Or, again, an early-summer apple that cannot be shipped long distances might do very well at Ridgewood or Montvale, N. J., within a short ride of New York City, and the fruit bring a splendid profit, while at the same time, a similar orchard some 500 miles from market would be a complete failure. A man cannot be too visionary and survive in the fruit-growing profession, unless backed by ample capital; and yet, the very nature of the business requires that he should not be afraid to venture where there are more than ordinary business risks. Plans must be carefully laid and good judgment used in arranging the succession and diversity of crops so that a severe loss on one crop, or one season, may be met and overcome by a good, substantial profit on some other crop. If the peaches, for instance, spoil on the trees for want of a market, a profit of $200 an acre on the apples and strawberries will more than cover the loss.

A thorough knowledge of fruit-growing can best be obtained by a course in horticulture at some good university; this training should be supplemented by practical experience on an up-to-date fruit-farm. Where such a course is out of the question, study of books on fruit-growing, and of bulletins issued by the Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural experiment stations should be made. Horticultural societies hold their sessions usually during the winter months and a fund of information and practical advice may be obtained by attending these conferences. The knowledge gained may be put to a practical test on the farm by making small plantings at first and increasing the acreage as one acquires a more intimate knowledge of the work.

There is a good profit in the fruit-business properly conducted. Many orchardists have grown rich in a few years out of the returns from their trees. In the first place, the demand for high-quality fruit, both preserved and fresh, is growing at an even greater rate than the increase in our population would seem to warrant. This is due, no doubt, both to the modern conviction that a larger fruit-diet is very healthful, and to the coming of numerous immigrants to this country from the fruit-loving peoples of Southern Europe. Then, too, thousands of large orchard-trees are being neglected through the ignorance or shiftlessness of their owners, and every year many other trees are planted that are not cared for or that are not adapted to the soil and climate, and consequently will never produce fruit of much value. The natural conclusion from these facts is that there will be even greater profits during the coming years in well-kept fruit-plantings.

To the real lover of nature and of plant-life, fruit-growing is a most delightful occupation. The open country in which he works and the health and vigor imparted to the body; the mystery of bud and leaf and twig; the nature and properties of soils; the life-habits of destructive pests and the methods of controlling and exterminating the pests; the adaptability of varieties to different selections; the discoveries of Abbot Mendel concerning the laws of heredity and their application to budded and grafted fruit-trees; the study of markets and methods of distribution; the progressive education of men and women regarding the value of a more selected and extensive fruit-diet; the joy and wonder of taking the root of a natural crab-apple tree and grafting on it a branch from a select variety like Red McIntosh or the luscious Spy or Delicious, only to see this waxed and apparently lifeless thing start its tender shoot in spring time and increase in size with each succeeding season until it becomes a grown-up tree laden with enticing apples: these are the sights, the problems, the tasks and the experiments that make the fruit-grower's profession such a pleasant and interesting one, worthy of consideration on the part of competent young men.

Martin King, Jr.

Shakespeare's Religion

FIFTY-TWO years ago, in the month of April, 1864, the tercentenary of Shakespeare's birth was kept with all due solemnity in his native town of Stratford-on-Avon. Seeing that so many of the dramatist's countrymen regarded him as the product and almost the embodiment of the genius of English Protestantism, it was perhaps not unnatural that an effort should have been made to give a religious color to the celebration. "Shakespeare," said Archbishop R. C. Trench, who preached on the Sunday morning in Stratford parish church, "was born of the spirit of the Reformation." And later in the day Bishop Charles Wordsworth, reminding his hearers that within that very building Shakespeare had stood godfather to the infant son of his friend Walker, expatiated upon the enlightened insight with which the poet, in response to the recitation of the Apostles' Creed, must have pronounced the words of the baptismal service: "All this I steadfastly believe." By a man of his keen perceptions, the preacher argued, the act must have been viewed in its full significance as an equivalent profession of faith in the doctrines of the Church of England.

Undoubtedly the question of Shakespeare's religion is a difficult one, and I am tempted to protest against the assumption often made that he is necessarily to be classified as Catholic or Puritan or Anglican or Freethinker. Personally I believe that all four standpoints appealed to him in his different moods, but of those specified I am also of opinion that Protestantism and Puritanism had the least hold upon his affections and that the most enduring religious influence of his life was Catholic. All the known facts, so far as I can interpret them, seem to point to some such analysis of his career as the following: First, that in his youth he had learned from his parents and associates to venerate the old Faith which in Queen Mary's time possessed exceptionally stanch adherents in Stratford. Secondly, that quitting his old home, he led for more than twenty years a wild and irregular life in London amid an atmosphere strongly impregnated with doubt and atheistic speculation. Thirdly, that like so many of his contemporaries he eventually adopted an attitude of indifferentism toward all religious questions, during which period he conformed just so far to the State religion as was needful to save himself from unpleasant consequences. Lastly, that he retained throughout a pronounced sympathy for Catholic belief and practice, a state of feeling which would render it far from impossible that before the end came he may have received the ministrations of some fugitive Catholic priest and have been reconciled to the Church of his forefathers.

With regard to the first of these four points we have to remember that, even down to the end of Elizabeth's reign, the old religion possessed many sympathizers in this part of Warwickshire. Not without reason did the Gunpowder Plot conspirators in 1605 make Clopton House near Stratford their rendezvous. Among those suspected of recusancy in 1592 and again delated, though "heretofore presented," as still continuing to absent themselves from church, we find a "Mr. John Shakespeare." This might no doubt have been John Shakespeare, the shoemaker, who lived at Stratford at the same time, but he is not commonly designated "Mr." Moreover, the poet's father had undoubtedly married an Arden, and though Mary his wife was only a distant cousin of the Edward Arden executed for his religion in 1583, still the traditions of the family were strongly Catholic. Mrs. C. C. Stopes, whose original investigations entitle her to speak with exceptional authority on Shakespeare's entourage, is also of opinion that Dr. Hall, who married the poet's favorite daughter Susanna, belonged to a Catholic family and for that reason had studied medicine abroad. She sees in any case no ground for attributing to him the pronounced Puritan opinions with which he is sometimes credited. In the practice of his profession he certainly attended many Papists, and even in one case a "Romish priest," for he mentions the fact in his record of cures. Moreover although the point is too complicated for discussion here, the authenticity of the "spiritual testament" of Mr. John Shakespeare found in the house occupied by his daughter has never been disproved. If authentic, the document must certainly establish the fact that the poet's father remained stanch in his Catholicism to the end of his life.

Though thus imbued with Catholic traditions, Shakespeare on coming to London, if not before, pursued courses which could hardly be otherwise than subversive of faith and of moral principles. No one with any practical knowledge of life can seriously put an innocent construction on sundry passages in the sonnets, however much we may admire them as expressions of the poet's genius. Of all the wild theories that have been propounded concerning them none has apparently gone so far as to suggest that they bore any reference to the lady whom he had married several years before. Moreover it is probably significant that his first printed work "Venus and Adonis" was published by a Stratford man, Richard Field, to whom possibly enough Shakespeare betook himself when first he came to town. Now Field, after an apprenticeship of six years, had succeeded to the business of Thomas Vautrollier, whose daughter he married, and a strongly anti-Catholic, if not anti-Christian, tendency is noticeable in the books, English, French, Latin and Italian, printed at this press. To take one example, Vautrollier in 1584 brought out certain writings of Giordano Bruno for which he had to fly the country. It was possibly through Field that Shakespeare came to take up his quarters with the Huguenot, Mountjoy, in Silver Street, but Dr. Wallace of Nebraska University who recently unearthed this important incident in Shakespeare's life has also disclosed the fact that Mountjoy's debaucheries and irregularities became later on so notorious that he was denounced and cut off from their communion by his own coreligionists. Associates of this kind, not to speak of such men as Marlowe, Ben Jonson, Robert Greene, and others, are hardly consistent with the retention of any deep practical sense of religion, and in the speculations of Hamlet and the farewell of Prospero in the "Tempest," the latest of the plays, there is a prevailing note of agnosticism which it seems to me vain to controvert.

Much has been made of Shakespeare's alleged familiarity with the Bible, but no safe inference can be drawn from it either as regards the first-hand nature of his knowledge or as to the version which he used. In all the Shakespeare plays the only direct quotation of a text of Scripture is strangely enough made in French, (II Peter, ii:22, cited by the Dauphin in "Henry V," Act 3, sc. 7) and here both the Genevan and Catholic versions coincided. Dr. Brinsley Nicholson after a careful examination came to the conclusion that Shakespeare made more use of the Latin Vulgate than of any other version! What is more significant is that there is practically no evidence to show that the poet was familiar with the "Book of Common Prayer." His use of the phrase "picking and stealing," which has sometimes been quoted to prove this, establishes nothing, for this collocation of words was proverbial even in the time of Gower. On the other hand, in a multitude of passages, he gives proof of his acquaintance with Catholic doctrine and practice. Even the "evening Mass" difficulty in "Romeo and Juliet" is no indication of ignorance, but must rather be held as attesting a quite remarkable knowledge of the local customs of Verona.

When, therefore, we recall the deep sympathy shown by the dramatist for the Catholic ideals of many of his characters, and when we further note that the passages commonly appealed to in proof of his Protestantism are now generally acknowledged to be of alien authorship, there seems good reason to admit the possibility and even the likelihood of the local tradition recorded by the Anglican clergyman, Richard Davis, that "he died a Papist." That some priest should secretly have ventured to bring the last consolations of religion to the dying poet is not inconsistent either with any known fact in his previous history or with the arrangements carried out by his friends as to the disposal of his remains.

Herbert Thurston, S.J.

The Drama League of America

In two recent instances, Christians in general and Catholics in particular have had forced upon them as an object lesson how the theory of "art for art's sake" can be pushed to a startling extreme. The latter of these instances was afforded by the Russian ballet, in which, under the standard of art, so flagrant an assault was made upon public decency that the intervention of the police had to be invoked. Were it not aside from our present purpose an interesting study could be made of the mental and moral attitude of those who, while characterizing certain features in this ballet as "a mad riot of base passion," used these words not at all in the sense of reprobation which, ordinarily, they would be supposed to convey.

The other instance, in which the same plea of "art for art's sake" was perverted to serve still baser ends, was the exploitation of the play, "Marie-Odile," which only a week or so ago ended its first season "upon the road." From the time this play was produced in Washington, in January, 1915, the protest then made by Monsignor Russell against its outrageous attack upon the sanctities of religion has been reechoed throughout the country. Everywhere Catholics have been up in arms against the play and, in Boston, a Catholic Mayor had the courage to bar it entirely from that city. It is a fact, not without significance, that Mayor Curley in this action had the sympathy and support of several Protestant divines.

While the outrage perpetrated by the production of "Marie-Odile" is still agitating the minds of Catholics, it may be pertinent to call attention to the action of the Drama League of America with regard to this play. The Bulletins of the League are issued by a Play-going Committee whose names are not given; the purpose of this Committee, as stated in the Bulletin, being "to encourage dramatists to produce and managers to present artistic drama by pledging support during the first ten days of any new production upon which the Committee reports." In the words of a prominent member of the League, "the sole object is to get you to the theater to support the play bulletined." As an example of the instructive parallel which could be made at great length in illustration of the Drama League's stand on "Marie-Odile," this may be cited:

"Marie-Odile."

The Drama League "Bulletin":

It is a poetic fancy, dealing not in the facts of life, either physical or spiritual, but in the idealization of one virtue—that of innocence.

Right Rev. Mgr. Russell:

This play is no less sacrilegious than offensively immoral, and all the more immoral because masquerading under a veil of innocence.

Report made by a Committee of the Knights of Columbus of Cincinnati, Ohio, January 3, 1915:

It is vile, insulting, offensive, sacrilegious and, in places, a blasphemy.

Material for similar parallels could be easily found regarding other plays, bad or indifferent, which the Drama League, in its career, has favorably bulletined; for instance, "Hindle Wakes," "As A Man Thinks," "Maria Rosa," "The Yellow Ticket," "The Hawk," and "The Unchastened Woman." Shaw, too, is greatly in favor. If a Protestant writer, speaking of "Fanny's First Play," says: "We like the butter to be a little rancid and the humor seems flat unless it contains just a little tang of doubt as to fundamental truth of virtue and honor," the Drama League opposes to this pronouncement the Bulletin's statement on this very play: "The fact that a Bulletin is issued on a play indicates that because of its artistic merit or the timely or vital nature of its appeal, the Committee deems it worthy of support."

Moreover, we find bulletined favorably after the same fashion, "The Philanderer," "Pygmalion," "Major Barbara" and "Androcles and the Lion." Daniel A. Lord, S.J., in an article contributed to the Catholic World for February, 1915, on the last-mentioned play, pens a sentence which should go straight to the heart of every Christian, not to say Catholic, man and woman. He writes: "To see Christian martyrs, in very truth our blood brothers in the Faith, serving as comedians in a farce, strikes no reechoing chord of humor in a soul tinctured ever so slightly with the creed of Christ."

When the Princess Theater ceased to be an avowed producer of abominations, it was hoped that New York would be spared any further attempts to transplant to our American stage exotic and vile forms of foreign theatrical art. Unfortunately, the organization known as the Washington Square Players threatens to take up the odious mission which the Princess Theater abandoned. The following is the February Bookman's story of one of the dramas lately produced by these players:

In "The Honorable Lover," by Roberto Bracco, the hero, named Alberto, is enjoying an illicit love-affair with Manina, who is the wife of his best friend, Frederico. Alberto himself is married to Rosetta, who regards him as a model husband. Everything is going well until Manina makes up her mind that she ought to divorce her husband in order that she may be able to marry her lover. But this is the one thing that her lover does not want. Alberto, therefore, exercises all his tact to bring about a reconciliation between Manina and her husband; and he ultimately succeeds in making permanent the status quo.

Who can read this story, told though it is with some reserve, without feelings of shame and disgust? If the Drama League, making an exception to its policy of not condemning plays, had only voiced the indignation of decent play-goers that such foul products of diseased imaginations should be exploited in an American theater, the League's action would be readily understood. Incredible as it may seem, however, "The Honorable Lover" is called by some enthusiasts "artistic drama." It is true that in referring to four plays, of which this delectable production is one, the Bulletin makes this qualification: "On account of their moral cynicism and absence of serious dramatic value, these plays are not recommended for young people." The Catholic members of the Drama League who must stifle their scruples over "The Honorable Lover," as well as over Schnitzler's "Literature," can get very little comfort from the presumption that "moral cynicism," when artistically flavored, is palatable to older folk.

It is conceivable that Catholics can conscientiously retain membership in the Drama League, because they hope that eventually they may be able to influence its policy, but the course of the organization, even as slightly outlined here, would hardly seem to justify such expectations. The Drama League is not a combination of merely passively-inclined people with similar tastes and sympathies. It is an admirably equipped organization, conducting an active, aggressive propaganda, furnishing its members information about plays in an attractive form, securing the endorsement of many prominent leaders of thought, and, in a word, holding out advantages of prestige and resources which may silence in many instances conscience and conviction, despite the extremely radical and very dangerous tendencies of the organization.

When the Catholic members of the Drama League realize the nature of the influences which really control the policy of that body, they will find, no doubt, a continuance of their membership impossible; and all play-goers who are Christians, when they see what shameless productions are endorsed by the Drama League under the plea of "art for art's sake," should deny that organization their support, for its influence is making decidedly for the further demoralization of the stage.

Alfred Young.

The Thrift of Thought

I AM sufficiently ignorant to be in no danger from the trivial tyranny of derivations. Even those stray ones which unaccountably stuck to me at school are unlikely to mislead. I do not admit that tragedy means playing the goat. We do not use oysters to ostracize people in modern society, but, if anything, for the opposite purpose. But there are some words of which the derivative sense, though hackneyed, is still really relevant; and one of them is the Greek word "economy." Indeed, there is no necessity to go to the Greek word for the deeper meaning. The plain English word "thrift" contains in itself the contradiction to its own misuse. The word "thrift" is just now—and this is particularly true, of course, among the English—very much thrown about; and is, of course, especially thrown at the poor. Yet before we have the right to say to the poor, "Be thrifty," we should have the power to say to them, "Thrive!"

It is a commonplace, of course, that Shakespeare actually uses the word in its positive sense of prosperity, "where thrift may follow fawning." And the accidental word contains the case against our capitalist society. With us this positive thrift does follow fawning, and does not follow anything else. It does not, with us, follow independence, the opposite of fawning, as it does in the peasant countries. The poor Englishman, the poor American, the poor North-German, may grow rich as the servant of somebody, either by obeying or betraying him. He cannot grow rich as the master of something, even so much as a scrap of earth. He has no real motive to save anything except his job, that is, the favor of the jobber. He naturally takes his pleasure in a hand-to-mouth style, for he does not know when he will suddenly cease to be "a hand" and become only a mouth. You may put this truth gravely by saying that when a man lends money to himself it must be a productive loan. Or you may put it more playfully in the manner of Mr. Guppy's friends, and say: "But what's the good of living cheap when you've got no money? You might as well live dear." Or you can, as I say, take to pieces the word "economy." It all amounts to the truth that if you want the poor wage-earner to practise housekeeping, you must give him a house. He cannot live in a money-box.

But when we praise the independence of those European peasantries which are now the one wall across Christendom against Socialism and the Servile State, and when we disparage in comparison the "fawning," the snobbery and slavery of our industrialism, we are often too narrowly understood. It is imagined that we have no human ideal beyond the hard or stern type which in some individuals or some environments accompanies that independence. Here, however, there is a confusion of thought. We certainly decline to keep most men in misery for fear some of them should be misers. We have denounced the "philanthropist" when he refused the poor property on the ground that they would waste it. We may surely denounce him as much if he refuses them property on the ground that they will not waste it. He has grown inconsistent rather than we—we, the believers in the independence and virility of peasantries. But the State will be no more reckless in distributing farms because some farmers will be stingy, than the farmer is in scattering seed because some of it falls on stony ground. Spiritually, the French, the Russian, and the Italian peasants differ from one another, and an English or American farmer would differ from them all: to say nothing of the million individual differences among the saints, poets, tribunes, and patriotic leaders who have been by origin peasants. In short, economic independence only allows a man to be a miser as it allows him to be a mystic: that is, it allows him to be a man, and whatever he chooses.

Now what may be called the mystical education of peasants is a matter for religion and not for any political or economic arrangements. But in itself it is a thing as telescopic and interminable as the wildest progressive could desire. Well-distributed property has never prevented peasants from being enthusiasts for new religions; it only prevents their being what is called in Ireland, I believe, "soupers," converts by bribery or the terrorism of hunger. I quite agree that this moral and artistic side of the peasant-problem is as interesting as it is infinite; and it is this which I am for the moment considering. Now, what interests me in the matter is this: that the rules of thought are essentially the rules of thrift. I mean that the best way of taking stock of one's philosophic and artistic estate is analogous to the best way of so dealing with a real estate, especially a small one; it permits of the same terminology and is troubled with the same errors. When we expect a peasant to make the best of a field, we do not mean he should put up with it, like a prison. That is not making the best of it, but only accepting the worst. We mean that his thrift thrives; that his land, so to speak, enlarges inward; that, like a cup in a fairy tale, it holds more and more without overflowing. And the same intensive cultivation can be encouraged in the thought, and even in the fancy. Almost the first thing that attracted me to the medieval mind was precisely what seems to have repelled some five generations from it; I mean the question of how many angels could dance on the point of a needle. For, after all, the whole point of a needle is its point. It is the mathematical mystery of its infinite smallness that makes it practically sharp, so that it can trace out the largest tapestries. And there have been needles, and peasants' needles at that, which have actually produced their angels from their points, which have made vast angels visible with purple and peacock plumage and glories of sanguine and gold. Anyhow, I prefer the mystic's query of how many such rich angels can stand on a needle to the manufacturer's boast of how many poor devils must drudge to make one.

There may be something mystical, there is certainly something mysterious, in a form of economy which is practised by the most luxurious. We have all noticed four or five club-men smoking cigars that cost a shilling apiece and carefully passing from one to the other a flaming match which costs some inconceivable fraction of a farthing, displaying the dexterity of Houdin and something of the courage of Scævola in their efforts to preserve alight that tiny piece of stick. But I fear they do not truly realize themselves as priests of an immemorial fire-worship, though sometimes the very match is called a vesta, to remind them that they are invoking virgin Rome and the goddess of the guarded flame. They have lost the trick of that fiery thrift which delivers a tradition from hand to hand like a match. Could we hope that the club-men saw any holy meaning in the match we should expect them to treat it, even after it was extinguished, with less levity; and if the rest of the rite were at all proportioned to their solemnity in this particular, the ashes of the cigars themselves ought to be preserved in ancestral urns. The thing is, I fear, an accident; but the intensive cultivator of the mind, were he in the place of the club-man, would find in such an accident a hint. And it is precisely here that the club-man can make so much less of the match than the mystic can make of the needle. For the mightiest pleasures of the imagination are all made out of hints. And there are as many hints in a small house as a large one. Generally speaking, the rich cannot take hints. That kind of man, in that kind of club, must have everything from his club to his cigar very big and solid before he can see it. He cannot do the ex pede Herculem, or reconstruct Leviathan from a bone. Even his wildness is due to his tameness, to his lack of imagination. Fashionable people generally have to make a thing a fact before they can even indulge it as a fancy. They insist on dizzy speed and distance in motoring, to find something which the high philosopher can find by sliding down the banisters. They are really extravagant in expenditure because they cannot be extravagant in thought.

The neo-pagan poets of my boyhood used, in their poems, to praise as demigods such despots as Nero, who burnt cities, marshaled gladiators, or generally "painted the town red." But I think that the very fact that such things could be put into poems proves that they need not have been put into practice. Apart from somewhat graver objections which I entertain to such experiments, I will maintain that those who did them were dull people, and did them because they were dull people. So American millionaires, the dullest and least freakish people on earth, give the freak dinners. That is, the rich man's dinner consists of one joke, where a poor man's dinner consists of a hundred. All art is a kind of gigantic gesture, but an hour in a free man's life consists of a hundred such symbolic gestures which he would not be at the pains to perpetuate, any more than he would turn every figure of speech into a figure of marble. For instance, I have always sympathized with one of those heathen tyrants above mentioned, Tarquin, I think, when he indicated his political ideals by striking with his scepter at some tall poppies and beheading them at a blow. But that he should afterwards put himself to the trouble of laboriously decapitating real people, in priggish fulfilment of his program, this seems to me an anti-climax, and one of those sequels that so seldom sustain the first level of a work of art. I have often relished the full artistic enjoyment of Tarquin on a country walk, appearing in all his kingly terrors to a thistle: and all the good he got out of his scepter can be got out of a walking-stick. And if Nero did set Rome on fire for mere artistry, it was because he had never really sat, as one might imagine Alfred sitting, seeing all the red cities to be seen in a peasant's fire. G. K. Chesterton.

Wilfrid Philip Ward: Victorian

It must be said of Wilfrid Ward, who died on April 9, after a lingering illness, that he was distinctly a survival from Victorian times. He might even be described as a relic, a relic of a cleaner and more healthy age than our own. Unlike most relics, which gain in reverence among the multitude with the increase of their age, Wilfrid Ward in his anecdotage received from the younger generation little of that reverence due his learning and unique position. He was regarded by many as an antique, to be sure, a venerable antique, but distinctly decrepit in his method of approach to modern conditions. Such a verdict savors so much of unfairness, that in justice to this man, who occupied so original a position in the English intellectual world, an approach from a different and less critical angle is necessary, an approach that will interpret Mr. Ward in the light of his really vital achievements.

The difficulty in an appreciation is the man's personality. He was, especially in later years, a man full of humors, but with little sense of humor. He was egocentric. He misunderstood the work and motives of other men continually. He was conscientiously interested in the truth, but the truth to be perfectly true, if you will forgive the phrase, must come from Wilfrid Ward, or some one whom he had stamped officially as valuable, like Newman or, in part, Arthur James Balfour. He was solidly, very solidly English; that is, insular but dignified; solid, but narrow-minded; doubtful and ashamed of expressed emotion, but quietly full of enthusiasms; humorous in the Saxon manner over the failings of other people and peoples, but seeing his own people in too sacerdotal a light for humorous terminology; contemptuous of others' opinions, but always gentlemanly in his public criticisms of their views; without tact in his dealings with others, but at heart sincere and kindly.

To understand completely the unique position that Mr. Ward occupied in England, it is necessary to appreciate the great impetus given his career solely by the fact that he was the son of William George Ward, "most generous of Ultramontanes," as Tennyson sang. Also, amusingly, the son was the father of the father's reputation. Wilfrid Ward benefited greatly by being the son of a man whom he himself resurrected from the comparative obscurity into which he had fallen. "Ultramontane" Ward's position in the Oxford Movement was not immense; it was sensational and sensational by accident. His posthumous fame was created artificially by Wilfrid Ward's filial tribute in writing a series of works on the "Movement" in which the elder Ward was protagonist. The elder Ward's connections with the Movement had always been violent and picturesque, and though the public had never heard of him, and the circles of University and Church had forgotten him, he achieved posthumous, and by no means entirely undeserved fame, by his son's patient and ready penwork.

Through his parentage Wilfrid Ward gathered unto himself most of the traditions of the Oxford Movement, and then tied himself yet more securely to Catholic traditions by marrying the daughter of James Hope-Scott. It was James Hope-Scott's conversion to the Church which shook Gladstone far more than Manning's, his ghostly adviser, and Newman's, his prophet. To Gladstone these latter might merely be clerics with Church ambitions, but Hope-Scott's ambitions were, like Gladstone's, political, and he sacrificed them forever. This caused Gladstone to ponder. It is indeed a pity that Wilfrid Ward never wrote a life of his father-in-law, a man in whom intellect and all that was best in England were mixed.

But this marital connection of Wilfrid Ward's not merely united him with the best element in the Oxford Movement, it also bound him closely with the old Catholic element in English life; for Mrs. Wilfrid Ward is the niece of the Duke of Norfolk. Thus by the mere accident of birth, and shall we say by the mere accident of marriage, Mr. Ward became a bridge between the whole convert movement and its first bitterness and final reconciliation with the older members of the Church in England.

But what must have made the whole game of playing bridge, without following the example of London Bridge and falling down, intensely amusing, was the fact that Mr. Ward was the confidant and pet, I know no other word to express his exact position, of the opposing camps, and the great men in those camps, in English Catholic life. As a boy he was under the protection and guidance of such men as Newman, and it is to be supposed that it was their influence that led the father to send the son to the Gregorian University at Rome.

Wilfrid Ward felt, I think quite strongly, that as his father occupied the position of the only great Catholic layman of true intellectual distinction in England, so he was "called," and felt distinctly, it was his vocation to duplicate his father's position and his father's work under modern conditions. There is no country in the world that needs the intellectual Catholic layman more than England; and she has in her delightfully insular way produced the necessary types on demand. Ward was demanded, and arrived fresh from theological studies in Rome.

The confidences poured into his ears by the great clerics and laymen of his time would make amusing reading and cast an illuminating light on the play of personality against personality in the Oxford Movement and Catholic Revival in England, if all could be told. There is one perfect little story showing so perfectly Ward's position as a suspension bridge between the opposing schools and personalities that one must repeat it. Ward was one day talking to Manning, and mentioned the fact that he had recently gone to Birmingham to see Newman. "Ah! Wil—frid, ah! Wil—frid," said his Grace, "so you have been to Birmingham. Do you know, Wil—frid, what has been the cause of Doctor, Doctor Newman's failure, Wil—frid? Temper, Wil—frid, temper, temper, TEMPER!" giving way to one of those delightfully candid outbursts with which Manning used to favor Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, if we may believe his curious essay on Manning.

Mr. Ward's learning plus his position gave him the opportunity of attaining a great intellectual position, not only in Catholic England but also non-Catholic England. There were in England ten years ago three men of great philosophical attainments: John Morley, the Agnostic; Arthur James Balfour, the Theist, and Wilfrid Ward, the Catholic. The mantle of the Metaphysical Society had descended on them.

The influence that Ward had on the philosophical development of Arthur Balfour is one of those curious intellectual adventures that delight the soul of man in his ironic moods. Morley, the Agnostic, has always had a strong appreciation of Catholicism, amounting at times to a partial reverence. It has remained for Balfour cordially to hate the Church. One can imagine him, if he had inherited the Latin blood and practicality and forsaken his languid attitude, becoming a violent anti-clerical. Yet his anti-Catholic prejudices were held in check by the powerful influence that Ward exerted on his mind. Ward's admiration for Balfour was intense; his portrait figures as the frontispiece to his latest volume of essays, while constant appreciations of his work figured prominently in the Dublin Review.

The influence that Ward had on Balfour's philosophy was only equaled by Balfour's influence on Ward's political views. Ward remained to the end an inveterate Tory. His dislike of Gladstone and his distrust of Liberalism since Gladstone's time was a source of amusement to many of his friends. It appeared in the most unexpected places in all his work. His distrust of Liberalism and revolution was as profound as Newman's. He belonged to that class of English Catholics who, by their political and economic views, run the risk of totally alienating the Church from the laboring and middle classes by their attempts to label Tory on its gonfalon. You catch the difference in the older Catholic tradition as compared with the younger and more vital Catholic activity in England today, if you compare Ward, for instance, with Belloc or Maurice Bearing or Cecil Chesterton.

Wilfrid Ward's highest literary achievement was his life of Cardinal Wiseman. The little circle that hailed with satisfaction his "Wish to Believe," written at the age of twenty-eight, was too small to make Ward a public figure. But his Wiseman achieved that. His life of Newman has never impressed me as a vital piece of work. There is too much of the element of the magnum opus and the official biography about it; again, too much of the suggestion of the disciple and the master. It is a sterling piece of work; but it is sterling silver: the Wiseman is nearer gold. His collection of essays, especially those more personal ones in which he deals with Tennyson and Aubrey de Vere and other moderate celebrities, are among the vital memoir and critical literature of our time. His philosophical discourses before the Metaphysical Society are somewhat turgid for popular consumption.

The complete trust put by Rome in the Ultramontanes' work, and especially in the labors of "Ultramontane" Ward, was transferred to Wilfrid Ward, who was Wardian, but never Ultramontane. He was allowed a liberty in his philosophical and theological expression that showed the complete confidence reposed in him by the Holy See. The true tragedy of his life was the gradual distrust of his opinions by authority in his later years. It was the Modernist controversy that was the cause of this suspicion. Many of his close friends fell; and though Ward remained completely orthodox in his views, it was but natural that a mild suspicion should fall on one who had such close relations with the theological excommunicate. Ward inherited from his father the old armor dented by Huxley's spear. Nobody suspected for many years that under that famous old armor Wilfrid Ward was anything but an Ultramontane himself. But he was interested in other lines of thought and was far from wishing with his father for a Papal Bull with his Times every morning for breakfast. He became a Newmanite, and naturally took interest in Tyrrell's false development of Newman: he hoped, one feels sure, even to the very end that there was a possibility of a via media between Tyrrell's heresies and the extreme orthodox point of view.

But this suspicion of which I have spoken was in another sense a complete justification of his intellectual honesty. He deliberately sacrificed the complete confidence of Rome and Catholic England in defense of opinions which he considered true. A touch of bitterness entered his later work after these controversial days had passed. You find the cup of bitterness almost overflowing in that rather crude statement concerning the method of handling Loisy and Tyrrell in almost the last bit of writing from his pen, his introduction to the edition in Everyman's Library of Newman's "Idea of a University."

Perhaps Wilfrid Ward ultimately will be remembered for his reviving of the Dublin Review, of which he became editor in 1906. Since its foundation by Wiseman the Dublin has had an adventurous career, attaining a high standard at one moment and then falling into a period of intellectual decay. When Ward assumed the editorship the periodical was in a moribund state. For six or seven years he maintained it at a level fit to compete with any previous period in its history. Then the inevitable decline set in. The usual cry for a new editor commenced, the demand for the head of the editor of the Dublin is recurrent in English Catholic circles, and it seemed as though Ward would suffer the fate of his predecessors. But at virtually the end of his life there came a striking tribute to his honesty of purpose and achievements: the minor mistakes and erratics of an editor, for editors, in the opinion of readers and contributors, are erring souls, were forgotten and forgiven. A testimonial by Mr. Ward's relatives and friends was presented to the publishers of the review, signed by many names of note in English intellectual Catholicism, and as a result Ward remained editor of the periodical he had recreated till the day of his death.

Thus at the end of a life that was dignified by conscientious scholarship and a really fine nobility of endeavor came complete justification and victory over the gathering hostile forces of a younger and more militant generation. Louis H. Wetmore.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Another Myth

To the Editor of America:

Every winter I am a tropical tramp, knocking about through the Windward and Leeward Islands, until the cold weather disappears. Recently, while at St. Kitts, I met an intelligent negro who asked me whither I intended to go next. My answer was, "to Martinique." "Oh," said he, "if you visit St. Pierre you will see the dungeon where the priests imprisoned the poor martyr who refused to accept their faith, and who was ready to die rather than worship 'sticks and stones.' A clergyman from Georgia told us all about it. He was one of the survivors of the 32,000 that were sent to eternity by the eruption of Mt. Pelée." At Antigua I picked up the same story. No doubt it is current throughout all the English islands.

While dining with some priests from St. Pierre and Morne Rouge, I told them the St. Kitts story. They pronounced it ridiculous and stated the facts to be as follows: The man who is the subject of the tale was José Caparis, one of the survivors of the catastrophe of 1902. He was a beach-comber, who did odd jobs along the water-front. His fondness for rum kept him in continual trouble with the police. The night before the tragedy he was arrested and was so noisy that he was put in a lower cell so as not to keep the other prisoners awake. Four days later he was discovered, still alive, and was moved to Morne Rouge where his horrible burns were cared for by the lamented Père Marcé, who gave up his life helping the injured. Caparis was always a Catholic, though not a credit to the Faith. The reverend gentleman from Georgia must have been very short of matter when he invented his story about Caparis and canonized him as a martyr. Is it not strange that intelligent people believe such things and never investigate them?

St. Pierre, Martinique. Paul Boyton.

Evangelizing South America

To the Editor of America:

I have just returned from listening to a Lenten sermon in which the performance of corporal works of mercy was advised for seasonable practice. As an act of charity, therefore, will you use the enclosed nickel to mail a copy of that admirable pamphlet, "South America's Catholicism," recently printed in the Catholic Mind series, to Homer C. Stuntz who, in the current reports of the opening of the Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, held at the Hippodrome, on April 9, is designated "Bishop in charge of the missionary work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, there" (South America).

Bishop Stuntz began his defamation of Latin America several years ago, and this Catholic Mind number briefly, but effectively, exposes his methods. The report of his Hippodrome oration shows that age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of his calumnies. It will do him good to receive some valuable information about himself. He is quoted as telling his Hippodrome audience that:

> Although missionaries have been preaching in South America for twenty years, money to carry on the work, church schools, and large church memberships were still lacking, and conditions of religious worship were as bad as they were in Europe in the Middle Ages.

Bishop Stuntz can be relied on always for an appeal for the Bible—and a collection. And isn't his reference to the Middle Ages delightful, and quite in keeping with the information he distributes about South America?

Hoboken, N. J. J. F. B.

Shaw on Ireland

To the Editor of America:

George Bernard Shaw, in his article "Irish Nonsense about Ireland," in the issue of the New York Times for Sunday, April 9, refers to Ireland as "only a cabbage garden and a barren one at that." By the same token, then, Mr. Shaw might characterize Greece as a mountainous land whose inhabitants ran races bare-legged, and indeed wore very little clothing at any time. He could dispose of the Israelites of old as a lot of moon-struck nomads who wandered from place to place, making endless trouble for themselves and everybody else, instead of comfortably settling down and conforming to the customs, religious and otherwise, of the people among whom they happened to dwell. In the same way Mr. Shaw might describe the Belgians as a lot of senseless creatures who rudely refused to allow their Teutonic neighbors "to cut across lots" when hunting.

Mr. Shaw has a keen eye for facts, which he states in an apparently simple manner. "No sensible mind tries to contradict a fact. It must stand. But an isolated fact, or even a series of facts does not necessarily constitute the essential truth of a matter." We begin to doubt if the brilliant Mr. Shaw will ever really behold the vision and see the truth. "The Irish question" is a truth, positive in itself, and not a mere negation of things English. When will the scoffer learn that the dominant passion of the Irish, at home and abroad, is not hatred of England, but love for Ireland? That "little green isle of the west" which God fondly fashioned and placed upon the bosom of the old sea will shine on, an emblem of hope to lovers of freedom, after George Bernard Shaw has been forgotten.

Brooklyn. M. G. Manahan.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Human Vivisection

IN the discussions regarding the vivisection of animals in the interests of physical science, the Church has always held the golden mean. Holding that the lower animals have been created by God to minister to the reasonable needs of man, she has not forbidden such experiments as tend directly to the increase of medical knowledge and, by consequence, to the alleviation of human suffering. On the other hand, she has resolutely set her face against wanton and useless cruelty to brutes, not because this cruelty is a violation of any right inherent in the brute, but because it is a violation of man's duty to himself.

A further motive which has guided the Church in seeking to keep vivisection within due limits was and is her clear perception of the step which would next be taken by those who neither believe in the existence of the rational soul of man, nor rightly conceive the dignity of human nature. With these persons, vivisection as applied to the brute creation would lead to the vivisection of "useless" human beings. In this country the medical profession has not hitherto dared, openly at least, to claim the right of operating upon human beings, solely for experimental purposes. Invalids, whether sick in mind or broken in body, have had a reasonable and well-founded assurance that their persons would be held sacred, that the knife would not be used, nor drugs administered, except for the sole purpose of restoring them to health, and this assurance has been shared by their parents and natural guardians.

This confidence bids fair to be rudely shaken. Recent practices by certain surgeons have borne out the fears of the Church, and have caused her to protest vigorously against unwarranted methods of experimentation upon the bodies of criminals and defectives. It has been recently reported that, in the interests of "science," a conscienceless physician, with the approval of the director of a State Insane Asylum, took it on himself to bore through the skulls of six patients for the purpose of extracting certain ingredients of the brain. It was considered quite unnecessary to obtain the consent of the relatives of the unfortunate victims, since the subjects of the experiment were after all, the charges of the State. Being poor, helpless, and without friends to act on their behalf, they were handed over for experimentation, to a surgeon who had an interesting hypothesis.

Doubtless this pseudo-scientist had often drilled the brains of cats and dogs, and if, like many other pseudo-scientists, he saw no essential difference between man and brute, there was no reason why he should withhold his hand from human beings, especially since these human beings were outworn, useless, dying public charges. Of course, where the rich are concerned this experimentation will be impossible; but it seems that only God can protect the poor from the hands of unscrupulous physicians, pagan philanthropists, and lying sociologists. Where will these infringements upon elemental human rights stop? And when will Catholics cease sending their children to schools and universities that teach the essential identity of man and brute? When will they stop patronizing immoral but fashionable physicians whose ethics are of the barnyard? When will they give up contributing to philanthropic and sociological bodies which regard the poor not as Christ's most dear children, but as sources of revenue and subjects of experimentation?

The Baptists' "Queen of Whistlers"

IN the advertising columns of the Los Angeles Daily Times for April 1, appears the following announcement:

TEMPLE BAPTIST CHURCH
Fifth and Olive Sts.
REV. J. WHITCOMB BROUGHER, D.D., PASTOR.
11 a. m.—"WHY DOESN'T SMITH GO TO CHURCH?"
Soprano and Tenor Duet, Helen Newcomb and Ralph Laughlin. Anthem by Great Choir. SPECIAL!—MARGARET MCKEE, Queen of Whistlers, in two numbers.
COMMUNION SERVICE.
7.30 p. m.—REGULAR MONTHLY MUSICAL SERVICE.
SPECIAL!—MOVING PICTURES OF YOSEMITE VALLEY,
BY DAVID A. CURRY.
"THE FOLLIES OF FASHION, OR KEEPING UP WITH LIZZIE,"
With Lessons from Dress-up Week.
Anthems by Quartette and Great Choir. Contralto Solo, Alice Lohr McDaniel. Gospel Solo, George H. Bemus.
SPECIAL!—RAY HASTINGS PLAYS BONTINI'S SPECTACULAR "STORM" ON THE BIG ORGAN.

Catholic readers of the foregoing notice were perhaps somewhat perplexed regarding the exact nature of the program offered by the Los Angeles Baptists for the first Sunday of April. Here and there, to be sure, a word or expression suggests a religious service, but on the other hand, the announcement strikingly resembles a "movie" or a vaudeville advertisement. Though "Rev."

"Pastor," "church," "anthem," "choir" and "communion," are terms that have been associated time out of mind with Divine worship or with the needs of the soul, yet it must be owned that such entertaining "specials" as "Bontini's Spectacular 'Storm,'" "Lessons from Dress-up Week," "Keeping up with Lizzie," "Moving Pictures of Yosemite Valley," and particularly a living, visible, audible "Queen of Whistlers," are reminiscent of theatrical bill-boards and music halls.

Whether the gifted Miss McKee's generous contributions to the entertainment of the worshipers served as prologue and epilogue to the "Communion service," is not clear. But if she bears unchallenged the title of "Queen" of her ravishing art, let us hope that every devout Baptist in Los Angeles conquered that day the temptation to prolong his nap till noon, and piously went instead to the Baptist Temple Church on purpose to hear and applaud the wonderful Queen Margaret.

It would be interesting to learn just what explanation Dr. Brougher gave as to "Why Smith Doesn't Go to Church." Unhappily a report of the sermon is not at hand, but the preacher, being presumably a man of keen discernment, doubtless pointed out that the reason why Smith stays away from such churches as the Baptist Temple of Los Angeles, is because he still retains a few old-fashioned convictions regarding what is seemly and reverential in Divine worship, and because he has, besides, an incurable aversion to mingling his devotions with his amusements. Moreover, Smith probably prefers the theater to the meeting-house as a place of entertainment. Perhaps he would go to church now and then if he could hope to hear there more of Christ's message than is offered by the singer of a "Gospel Solo" and by a "Queen of Whistlers."

His Most Eloquent Sermon

"I GIVE my soul to God; my body to the earth," read the last will and testament of Monsignor John A. Lyons, the late Vicar-General of the Wilmington Diocese. "I forbid, with all my strength, any sermon to be preached at my obsequies or at any time. And I direct my body to be buried in an unadorned and inexpensive coffin." His deeds were to be registered with God. His body was to be returned in humility to the dust from which it came. For his soul alone he pleaded with earnest insistence. It would be in need of all the charity that Christian friends could be entreated to bestow upon it: "I do, however, most sincerely acknowledge my great need of, and do most earnestly implore, the prayers of the Faithful for myself and my beloved dead. Do have pity upon my soul!"

Here was a true appraisal of the relative value of the things of the body and the things of the soul. By word and example Mgr. Lyons had taught his people to live holily. They admired and loved him, and their spirit of faith and piety attested the fruitfulness of his labors. But perhaps the most eloquent sermon he preached to them was that contained in his last message. That was of a piece with all his life. He had shunned honors and sought to serve God in simplicity and wholeness of devotion. He had not buried his talents or hidden his light under a bushel, for few men in his own city were better known or more widely loved than he, but his light was directed to God and not to himself. The voice of the orator who was invited from afar to preach at the funeral services may have been silenced, but there rang in the souls of those present at the obsequies the last words the dead prelate spoke to them from the pulpit: "Live for God, live for eternity." Often the false evaluation of the goods of the body and the goods of the soul are not shamed by death itself. Costly coffins and meager offerings of Masses, wealth of display and dearth of prayers, only too often constitute the charity shown to the beloved dead. The lesson taught by Mgr. Lyons was needed: it will bear fruit.

Labor and the Flag

WHEN the Board of Education of New York City made its investigation into the alleged insult to the American Flag of which one Mr. Maurer was reported to have been guilty, in a speech delivered before the Labor Forum of New York City, it came to light that although the words, "To hell with the Stars and Stripes," had actually been used by the speaker, yet they were merely quoted. As a consequence the prosecution of which the Mayor had spoken did not take place. The incident, however, is instructive, for these highly insulting words were received with vociferous applause by a large audience; and the same reception was given to the speaker's further remark that the Flag represented nothing for which either he or labor should fight. The one cause in which he would counsel the representatives of labor to shed their blood was the cause of their own class.

It is perhaps inevitable that such unpatriotic ideas should find utterance among the heterogeneous peoples who make up the United States. This is a disadvantage arising from the indiscriminate admission into the country of persecuted aliens. But it would be a calumny to say that Mr. Maurer's views are those of the laboring class. If the country had need of brave men for defense, none would rally to the Flag with greater eagerness than the laborers. For the American working man realizes that country comes before self and family and class, and that the Stars and Stripes mean a great deal more to all Americans than the Socialist would have us believe.

Before the European conflict broke out, it was confidently predicted that entire classes of people in the countries now at war would refuse to fight for their country's honor. But when the call to arms sounded, the most radical Socialist marched off to battle beside the most "violent" Catholic. The former suddenly discovered that he loved his country more than he had realized. A similar spectacle would be witnessed in our land, if a like call should come. Patriotism is one of those elemental virtues that are practically ineradicable. It may smoulder in the ashes of the heart, but it cannot be entirely extinguished. A glance at Europe is enough to prove how easily it may be fanned into a consuming fire. The world is far more apt to suffer from exaggerated and excessive patriotism than from its dearth. Mr. Maurer's expressions, therefore, may safely be rated as mere words, nothing else.

The Beam and the Mote

OFFICIALLY, the Panama Protestant Missionary Conference is dead, but its spirit still lives. Whether this spirit is the spirit of Antichrist, or simply a spirit bred of ignorance and folly, is uncertain. But it is not the spirit of Christ. Of this there can be no doubt. For His spirit does not ally itself with pharisaic self-righteousness. It bears about it no taint of commercialism, or of a cheap and discredited jingoism. Those whom it rules are not in the habit of contrasting the spotless ermine of their own undoubted sanctity, with the dark degradation wherewith their fellows are clothed. Nor do they, for the sake of a heightened contrast, resort to lying.

For the last few weeks, non-Catholic clergymen of a certain type have been basing perfervid and somewhat scandalous discourses upon the iniquities of South America, as discovered and exploited by this unique Missionary Congress. We have been told that there is not in all South America "a single influence to check vice," that "the priests and prelates of the Romish Church are ignorant, careless, or immoral," that "infidelity, mainly due to ignorance of the Bible, is spreading over the entire country," and that "morality, as understood in the United States, is practically unknown." The only remedy against these evils is "the introduction of Protestant and American ideals."

Without pausing to consider the efficacy of this remedy, which has been in use at home for some years, it may be profitable to extend, somewhat further, the suggested contrast between South America and the United States. Speaking, on April 12, before a House Committee, appointed to discuss a resolution prescribing uniform divorce laws throughout the United States, the Rev. Lloyd Tompkins, of Holy Trinity Church, (Episcopal), Philadelphia, said:

> Our condition has become almost bestial. The rich divorce each other far more frequently than the poor. Divorced men frequently marry divorced women; I have known many cases of the kind here in Philadelphia. It is nothing less than swinish. More than two million divorces have been granted in the United States during the last fifty years. Only one nation, Japan, has exceeded this number.

If the non-Catholic clergymen, now rolling pious eyes in holy horror over the condition of pagan, priest-ridden South America, are sincere in their expressed desire to further the Kingdom of Christ, it would be well for them to begin at home. Three topics in particular might profitably engage their zealous labors in the pulpit: divorce, the perversion of marriage, and the oppression of the poor. Nor would an occasional sermon on the Divinity of Our Lord be out of place. Could these worthy clergymen, so much exercised over the vices of their South American neighbors, screw their courage to the sticking-point of confessing boldly that Christ is God, they might likewise be found brave enough to denounce the crimes against God, man and nature, that are fast dragging America below the level of decent paganism.

The "Messenger's" Golden Jubilee

IN the month of April, 1866, just fifty years ago, the first number of the American Messenger of the Sacred Heart appeared. The magazine's founder was Father Benedict Sestini, S.J., who was then Director of the Georgetown College Observatory. The Ave Maria had already been publishing each week papers from the French Messenger, but no sooner did Father Sestini start his little monthly than the Ave Maria's editor with characteristic generosity not only stopped printing the League articles, but cordially recommended to his readers the new Jesuit periodical. Under successive editors the Messenger's scope was gradually enlarged. It became "a magazine of the literature of Catholic devotion," and increased in size from a yearly volume of 576 pages in 1885 to one of 1,444 in 1901. In 1902 was born of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart a magazine of general Catholic literature called the Messenger which AMERICA proudly honors as its mother. Meanwhile the Messenger of the Sacred Heart continued to be published as the organ of the League and of the Apostleship of Prayer, and the number of its subscribers kept increasing by leaps and bounds. In 1907 they amounted to 28,000, at the end of 1915 to 295,000, and it is expected that 330,000 copies of the issue for the coming June will be required to meet all demands.

The everlasting good that the Messenger of the Sacred Heart has been privileged to effect during its fifty years of existence is of course quite incalculable. The bright little magazine has made innumerable readers know and love Our Blessed Lord better, it has been an effective promoter of frequent Communion, and, as the organ of the Apostleship of Prayer, has directed and unified the daily aspirations of millions of Leaguers. AMERICA cordially echoes the jubilee congratulations sent to our valued contemporary by the Holy Father:

"May the Messenger of the Sacred Heart be spread more and more widely and may it bring forth daily more abundant fruits of piety and faith, and weld more closely that bond of union with the Vicar of Christ which the Faithful of America profess."

LITERATURE

The Man of the Mask

ON the afternoon of September 18, 1698, there arrived at the gate of the Bastille prison in Paris a party of armed horsemen. They were the attendants of the new Governor, who had come from his former post in the Iles Sainte-Marguerite. With them they brought from Provence a prisoner whose name and identity were unknown, who was guarded with extraordinary vigilance, and whose features were covered with a black mask. The prisoner had been, so men said who were in a position to know, under the special charge of the Governor, first at the fortress of Pignerol, near Turin, then later at the Iles Sainte-Marguerite, and now at last, under the same secrecy that had shrouded his identity for so many years, he was removed to the Bastille. While the prisoner was at Pignerol many surmises were made as to his identity. Some said he was the Duc de Beaufort, who had disappeared in 1669. Others maintained that he was the son of Oliver Cromwell, and that he was kept in confinement lest he should prove troublesome to Charles II in England. But, as Mgr. Barnes points out in his excellent book, "The Man of the Mask" (Smith, Elder & Co., London), these were the wildest guesses at the prisoner's identity.

Five years later this prisoner of mystery died and was buried in the Bastille on November 20, 1703, under the name of Marchioly, and it was not until eight years had passed that legends as to his identity began to float around. The first recorded guess came from the sister-in-law of Louis XIV, Mme. Palatine, who wrote that he was an English nobleman who was mixed up in the Jacobite plot of the Duke of Berwick against William III. Then in 1747 a book of Court scandals made him the natural son of Louis XIV and Louise de la Vallière.

But these were not the only surmises as to the identity of the prisoner. According to one version he was the true Louis XIV, while a usurper, the son of Anne of Austria and Mazarin, sat on the throne of France. Another story makes him Ercole Antonio Mattioli, Minister of the Duke of Mantua; he is by turn the Duke of Monmouth, Fouquet, Minister of Finance under Mazarin, and even an ecclesiastic of the Armenian Church, one Avedick, while a writer in 1872 believes him to be Eustache Dauger, valet to Fouquet, and the late Andrew Lang recognized in the prisoner James de la Cloche, a natural son of Charles II, an opinion that Mgr. Barnes shared until further research caused him to propose another theory: viz., that the mysterious prisoner of the Bastille was none other than the "Abbé" Pregnani, an Italian Jesuit, and that the reason for his incarceration was his possession of a great secret relating to Charles II and the King of France, confided to him by Colbert de Croissy under a misapprehension.

The great secret of Charles II, a secret that he shared with perhaps only one or two persons, was his desire to become a Catholic, and to reconcile England to the Holy See. Under a mask of utter frivolity and libertinism, this king cherished above everything else in life an unquenchable desire to make public profession of the Catholic religion, and the circumstances of his life and position made it impossible. On the other hand, Louis XIV of France had his secret too, which was to make an alliance with England against the Dutch. So the plan was that Protestant England should become Catholic and ally itself with Catholic France for the subjugation of Protestant Holland.

But Charles had already made negotiations with Rome through Sir Richard Bellings, an Irish esquire, who was private secretary to Henrietta Maria, herself a Catholic. Charles declared himself ready to accept the profession of faith of Pius V, and was ready to break with all Protestants and other religious bodies not in communion with the Roman Church. His plans for bringing England back to Catholic communion included the confirmation of the Archbishops and Bishops of the Anglican Church in their Sees on condition of their agreeing to consecration by an Apostolic Legate sent from Rome for that and for no other purpose. The Archbishop of Canterbury was to be raised to the rank of Patriarch of the three realms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but no appeal to Rome was to be allowed, save in certain cases reserved to the Apostolic See, and these reserved cases were to be decided within the Kingdom by a legate who was to be English-born. With regard to the status of the clergy, all bishops and clergy who accepted Catholic ordination were to retain their benefices and their wives, though celibacy was to become the rule for future ordinands. Holy Communion was to be given in both kinds, and Mass celebrated in Latin, though it was specially mentioned that English hymns should be allowed. The Benedictines and other orders were to be restored, and the Jesuits allowed to teach in schools. The negotiations, however, fell through. And now the Abbé Pregnani appears on the scene.

Colbert de Croissy, French ambassador to England, knew that Louis desired to draw Charles into an alliance with him, and this is probably all he knew. For prudent reasons, Charles asked the King of France to send a priest to instruct him, and an Italian priest, the Abbé Pregnani, was sent to England under the guise of an astrologer. A home was found for him at the French Embassy, whence he could have easy access to the king at Whitehall. Here the complications begin. For Colbert de Croissy was under a misapprehension as to the Abbé's real mission, and confided to him important secrets of French politics, and it is possible, as Mgr. Barnes points out, that the Abbé in turn confided these secrets to the King of England.

As an astrologer the Abbé was singularly unsuccessful. Colbert had written to France saying that he proposed telling him everything, being still under the misapprehension that the priest was on a mission to further the alliance. But the news must have caused consternation at the French Court, and on June 25, 1668, the Abbé Pregnani was recalled, and on July 5 he left England. Then something peculiar happened. The Abbé disappeared entirely from the knowledge of men, and on July 19, M. de Saint-Mars, who was then Governor of Pignerol, received orders to prepare to take charge of a State prisoner, who was none other than the prisoner of mystery, the man in the iron mask. The prisoner was brought to Pignerol by the king's lieutenant, he was accused of no crime, but he was not to be allowed to tell a living soul of the business on which he had been engaged before he was sent to Pignerol.

Such is Mgr. Barnes's solution of the identity of the mysterious prisoner. His crime, such as it was, consisted in the knowledge of important secrets of the King of France. Charles II was entirely in the dark as to the fate of the priest, and the fact that the Abbé had been seized and placed in solitary confinement by his ally, would, as the author of this book points out, have prevented the possibility of the alliance being made; so there were double reasons for absolute secrecy.

There are objections to this hypothesis, which Mgr. Barnes considers in a separate chapter. But there is one objection that is not given. Members of Religious Orders cannot disappear so easily as a private individual, for example. If the Abbé Pregnani was a Jesuit, it is certain that his movements must have been known to his superiors, and if he vanished utterly after the date he left England his superiors must have made some inquiries as to his whereabouts. Moreover, it is clear that Charles was in correspondence with the General of the Jesuits in Rome, and as the Abbé is stated to have been an Italian, his movements to Paris and thence to London must have come under the eye of his superiors, who would scarcely have allowed even the Most Christian King to spirit one of their number away. But in spite of this objection, the hypothesis of Mgr. Barnes seems to be the most satisfactory solution of the prisoner's identity that has been put forward; for the mask and the secrecy of his confinement demand an adequate reason, and there is adequate reason in the Abbé Pregnani's possession of the secrets of two kings, at a time when the consciences of kings were none too delicate. So perhaps the Man in the Iron Mask was a Jesuit.

Henry C. Watts.

REVIEWS

Strength of Will. By E. Boyd Barrett, S.J. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.25.

There is a marked tendency in many pedagogical treatises to look upon the training of the will as something external. The strengthening of the will, it is assumed, and the consequent formation of character are tasks that can be successfully accomplished by the teacher who has been trained in the methods of modern psychology; little or no effort is demanded or expected of the child. Morality, in a word, is regarded as a kind of veneer that can be manufactured and applied to the pupil's will by the ingenious and skilful teacher. The book under review is a good corrective for this dangerous tendency. There is a healthy insistence throughout on the fact, obvious enough to the sane-minded yet no less obviously in danger of being lost sight of today, that the training of the will ultimately devolves upon oneself; that, as the author observes: "All rests in our own hands. Success or failure depends on ourselves. If we take the matter into our own hands we can train our wills. No one else can do this. All depends on self, for the will must be self-trained."

Religious, and in general those who have accustomed themselves to exercises of spiritual introspection, will perhaps find in this book little that is new. They will probably detect a striking resemblance between the exercises suggested by the author for improving the will, and the Ignatian exercise on the general and particular examination of conscience. In fact the author's book may be styled an illustration and extension of the great Jesuit's prescription, the novelty consisting in the fact that the exercises here indicated center round some indifferent act or acts to be performed successively each day for a definite period. The effect, provided the instructions and suggestions are faithfully carried out, will be, it is claimed, a bracing and toning up of the will in its other manifold activities. To students of psychology the section recording observations on will-phenomena, based on a good number of varied experiments, will doubtless prove interesting; the results detailed are such as can be easily tested by those who would experiment for themselves. The closing chapters, or rather the epilogue and the appendix, deal with the future of will-psychology and the possibility of character-study being reduced to a science. The author is fully conscious of the almost innumerable limitations of the methods adopted by the workers in this field; and his treatment of the subject is, in consequence, wisely conservative.

J. A. C.

Crises in the History of the Papacy. By Joseph McCabe. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

From time to time we are treated to new books, either original matter or translations, from the pen of Mr. Joseph McCabe, the one-time Franciscan who with his habit has put off all belief in Revelation. Though frankly anti-Christian, Mr. McCabe is too wise to indulge in the malicious misrepresentations and diatribes that used to form the stock in trade of his class but are now left to ignorant fanatics like the promoters of the Menace. For he writes to catch the more thoughtful and learned, and consequently we find in the present volume, as in his other books, a careful manipulation of facts, judicious suppression of uncomfortable details, sly innuendos, and here and there an occasional audacious misstatement or exaggeration. He writes in a rather moderate dispassionate tone, with an affectation of critical scholarship and impartiality calculated not only to disarm the critic but to convince the uncritical.

In the book under review the author singles out twenty of the most illustrious Pontiffs whose reigns have served as important milestones in the age-long history of the Church. By a study of their aims and accomplishments, he undertakes to prove that the Papacy in spite of all that can be said in its favor is a gigantic mistake, a blind alley up which has gone a deal of evil with some good, a groping in the dark, from which the wise man must turn away, if he is to find real truth and progress. Consequently in Mr. McCabe's hands, the history of the Papacy resolves itself into a series of blunders, disasters and failures. Even achievements that have been regarded by stalwart adversaries of the Papacy as great and virtuous, to Mr. McCabe seem crimes and catastrophes. But the author does not appear to realize that in dressing up as he does the facts of history, he is playing into the hands of his enemies by laying the basis of an apologetic that will appeal to the most careless reader. Assuredly an institution that for nineteen centuries has been chiefly remarkable for its costly blunders, could not be manifesting today on a vast scale so many signs of superb vitality unless there were something Divine about its origin and government. So cleverly has the author used, misused and manipulated the materials he had at hand that a detailed unmasking of his errors would fill several other volumes the size of his own. In keeping with the literary methods of Mr. McCabe are the advertising devices of his publishers. For "Crises in the History of Papacy" is announced as a work not "tainted by a controversial aim" and the same leaflet bears a picture of the author wearing the friar's habit he discarded years ago. Was the illustration meant to beguile unsuspicious readers into believing that Mr. McCabe, during his papistical days, learned many dark secrets about the Popes that he is now making public?

J. F. X. M.

Nights: Rome, Venice in the Aesthetic Eighties; London, Paris in the Fighting Nineties. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. With Sixteen Illustrations. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $3.00.

This is a gifted Catholic writer's reminiscences of well-known artists and authors. The Roman and Venetian "Nights" of the "esthetic eighties" are the setting for anecdotes about Vedder, Donoghue, Duveneck and McFarlane, while the London "Nights" of a decade later introduce Henley, Beardsley, Harland, May, Whistler, "Bob" Stevenson, and George Moore, Aristide Bruant being the chief figure in the Paris "Nights." Mrs. Pennell would name that second period, not the "decadent nineties" but the "fighting nineties." She writes:

> As I recall those stimulating days, the prevailing attitude of the artist in his studio, the author at his desk, the critic at his task, was that of Henley's Man in the Street:
>
> Hands in your pockets, eyes on the pavement,
> Where in the world is the fun of it all?
> But a row—but a rush—but a face for your fist,
> Then a crash through the dark—and a fall.

The author and her husband, the artist, occupied a lofty apartment on Buckingham Street, London, and there would gather on Thursday evenings, with Henley or with Whistler as a center, a group of clever men who would talk and bicker far into the night, while Mrs. Pennell secretly worried about the article on cooking she had to write next day for Saturday's Pall-Mall. If the perfection of her forthcoming paper on desserts or entrées was sometimes impaired by these inroads on her time, Mrs. Pennell was collecting meanwhile the material for these interesting reminiscences. Her descriptions and appraisals of Henley and Harland are particularly vivid and just, and the amusing autobiographical passages that abound in the volume are written with the author's usual literary grace. The book is finely illustrated.

W. D.

American Banking. By H. Parker Willis, Ph.D.; Credits and Collections. By Edward M. Skinner, R. S. White, and H. E. Kramer; Investments and Speculation. By Louis Guenther. Chicago: La Salle Extension University. $2.00 each.

La Salle Extension University has benefited the commercial world by issuing a series of text-books entitled "Business Administration," covering the various departments of business life. The course affords the reader a detailed and carefully prepared account of the methods, ventures and risks of modern business. As one of the authors well observes in his preface, business is the only profession which men and women enter without previously preparing themselves. A man cannot become a doctor, a lawyer, an architect, even a stonemason or a hodcarrier without preparation, but he can always go into business no matter how inadequate his preparation for the science of business.

"American Banking" gives an accurate and helpful explanation of all the departments of banking, and clearly describes the many divisions of the banking field. Mr. Willis begins with a good account of modern banking functions and of the classes of banks that are found in our national banking system, and explains in simple terms the meaning of bank loans, notes and deposits, exchange, the history and object of clearing houses, the Government's supervision of banking, and the Federal Reserve system. The book is full of instruction for all and those reading it will not wonder that a banker of long experience as the head of an active and progressive national bank once remarked that he had spent three years in seeking an error of one penny in his accounts, though to most people unacquainted with the necessity of rigid accuracy and system in banking this labor would seem a great waste of time. "Credits and Collections" is a treatise on the importance of the credit man in the commercial world of today. It is said to be the first book covering the entire scope of this field, and the book appears to verify the assertion. It affords practical and useful information regarding the labors of the credit man and his companion-in-arms, the collector, and gives a detailed analysis of the duties of these men. The treatment is clear and interesting and shows on the part of the authors broad and shrewd knowledge of human nature. "Investments and Speculation" is a complete manual for the ordinary business man regarding the manifold forms of investment. The varied departments and functions of stocks and bonds are explained in simple language, and to the tyro in this field ample information is offered regarding the science of speculation, for the book gives a clear explanation of loans and mortgages, the various forms of bonds, stock-market terms and phrases, and concludes with an excellent chapter on business barometers in which the general principles controlling the price movements of securities are outlined. The volumes of the series are bound in limp leather, and form an attractive little library on business administration.

O. T.

The Portion of a Champion. By Francis o Sullivan tighe; Nan of Music Mountain. By Frank H. Spearman. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.35 each.

Here is a brace of good books by Catholic authors. The first is an Irish historical romance of the fifth century, wherein the taming of a high-strung, impetuous youth into a calm leader of men, and the wooing of a charming, spirited maid are woven into the narrative of the harrying which Dathi, High King of Eirinn, made of Roman Gaul even to the Alps in the time of the Emperor Honorius. The author has caught the spirit of the old Irish epics, the Cattle Raid of Cooley, the Cuchulain cycle, etc., a spirit that is akin to Homer's, and has written his tale with an insight into early Irish culture that is very refreshing to those who have listened a lifetime to the exploitation of every source of folk-lore, fancy and heroism, but have listened in vain for an echo of that most witching of all, the ancient lore and legend of Eirinn. The author is a good story-teller, a good scene-painter, an accurate delineator of the spirit of the times he essays to portray. Whatever defects the more exacting critic may discern in the book, they are those that can easily be corrected.

Mr. Spearman's new novel is a bright, happy story, filled with action. In its general outlines it bears a resemblance to "Lorna Doone," but in development is distinctly different. The scene is laid in the western Rockies, and the characters and incidents are like those with which readers of frontier fiction, and especially of the later work of the author, are familiar. Life is insecure at best in the distant railroad town which is the center of the tale, and the youthful hero, who is a friend of "Whispering Smith," finds his hands more than filled with the task of repressing the depredations of a band of desperadoes. To make matters worse he falls in love with a proud girl, who is the niece of the head of the clan. How to win her love and at the same time reduce her turbulent relatives to law and order is the problem Mr. Spearman sets himself to solve. The story is full of thrilling adventures, and most of the time the smell of powder is in the air. But the problem is solved happily in the end, and the book closes in a glow of peace and love.

J. F. H.

The Hound of Heaven. Francis Thompson. Biographical Sketch and Notes by Michael A. Kelly, C.S.Sp. Introduction by Katherine Brégy. Philadelphia: Peter Reilly. Cloth, $0.50; paper, $0.25.

Cardinal Newman's Dream of Gerontius. With Introduction and Commentary. For use in High Schools, Academies and Colleges. By Julius Gliebe, O.F.M. New York: Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss. $0.30.

Father Damien: an Open Letter to the Reverend Dr. Hyde, of Honolulu. By Robert Louis Stevenson. With a Note, Mrs. Stevenson's description of the writing, and related passages from Stevenson's correspondence. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $0.50.

Here are attractive and well-annotated editions of three literary masterpieces that every Catholic of taste and discernment should know almost by heart. Miss Brégy justly appraises the poetical and ascetical value of Francis Thompson's incomparable ode, and the careful editor, after contributing an adequate biographical sketch of the author, gives in thirty-five pages a full analysis of the poem, and a wealth of comments on the text. For Newman's great poem Father Gliebe performs a like service. Particularly good are his pages on the metrical beauties of the "Dream" and on the logical order of its parts. As for Stevenson's renowned letter, written in a generous burst of indignation to defend a heroic priest he had never seen, the author's wife supplies the few notes that are needed. Teachers of literature in our Catholic high schools and colleges who can make their pupils really discern the beauty of these three chef d'œuvres may consider themselves thoroughly competent members of their profession. It would be well to let such text-books as these supplant some of the "Protestant classics" we have accepted from New England school-ma'ams.

W. D.

The Revolution in Virginia. H. J. Eckenrode, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Economics and History in Richmond College. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $2.00.

In this book of a dozen chapters the author has given us a notable addition to the literature of the Revolution. No

State, except perhaps Massachusetts, so richly deserves the special treatment here accorded to Virginia. So wholly English had she been in her settlement that her gradual estrangement from the parent country must prove interesting reading. Dr. Eckenrode's narrative traces the course taken by Virginia immediately before, during and immediately after the war that finally secured our independence from England. Imperial expansion on the part of the European country clashed with the colonial development of our various settlements until the ways of empire yielded to the force of a people's revolt against oppression. This is the atmosphere created by the book, which is not so much a chronological survey of battles and military movements, as an attempt to discern the temper of the people in their growing dissatisfaction with the English Government. In the story of those stormy days in Virginia, Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson played a conspicuous part, and the author has drawn their portraits at full length. Henry is here in his transformation from the radical of 1775 "prepared for any bold advance upon the future" to the one who at the close of the Revolution besought mercy for his defeated opponents. Jefferson is powerfully drawn, as well in the ignominy of his fall as in the triumph of his restoration. The author's language is restrained except when he enlarges on the development of democracy. The trend of current events prompted him to say rather happily: "The ideal of a people rising spontaneously to defend its hearthstones is one thing; the reality of a mob of untrained, half-armed farmers attempting to oppose regulars is sadly different. Jefferson never understood that efficiency in war, like efficiency in everything else, is only secured by preparation." C. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for Holy Week contains well-written ascetical papers of lasting value. Father William Power explains the nature of "The Catholic Sense" that true children of the Church ought to have. Its characteristics, he explains, are (1) loyalty to ecclesiastical authority; (2) readiness in accepting the supernatural when duly authenticated; (3) a truly conservative spirit; and (4) a pronounced aversion to doctrinal error. The second article, "A Problem in Thanksgiving," was written by the late Father Timothy Brosnahan. He shows that we should often thank Heaven for those prayers of ours that are never granted, for "not every present disappointment, however grievous it may be to our existing moods and visions, is a misfortune, nor every satisfaction a blessing." The number concludes with "In the Library," a short paper teaching the art of living pleasantly with others.

Norreys Jephson O'Conor's "The Fairy Bride" (Lane, $1.00) and Horace Annesley Vachell's "Quinneys'" (Doran, $1.00) are excellent plays which it is a pleasure to recommend to those who are seeking something to "put on" as a school or parish entertainment. The scenes of the first, which is more suitable, perhaps, for older children to give, are laid in pre-Christian Ireland, when the fairies were full-grown and benevolent. The simple plot is cleverly developed, the language is stately and poetical, and full directions are given regarding music, costumes, etc. "Quinneys'" it may be remembered, was one of the few clean plays that actually had a successful run in New York. The dialogue and characters are very amusing, while the dramatic ability required would not seem to be beyond the capacity of amateurs.

"My Friend Phil" (Rand, McNally, $1.25), a story by Isabel M. Peacock, is about a busy young lawyer who tells of the doings and sayings of a precocious kindergarten boy. Though many of the incidents are interesting enough, others are so spun out that the book grows rather tiresome. However the author does understand children and her little lads and lassies are very lifelike.——"I Conquered" (Rand, McNally, $1.25) is the title of Harold Titus's good account of a young man's fight against an all-consuming passion for drink. It would seem that his life on the open plains would have driven the poison from the hero's system in a shorter time than that the author assigns for the cure. The story is clean, wholesome and interesting.——"Instead of the Thorn" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), by Clara Louise Burnham, is a story with a disappointing heroine. She is a "spoiled" child of fortune who is somewhat "mended" by misfortune. The other women in the book are more real: the devout Mrs. Porter, Aunt Belinda and wild little Blanche Anna being well worth knowing.

"The New Psalter of the Roman Breviary" (Herder, $1.50) finds its best recommendation in the name of its author, the Rev. L. C. Fillion, S.S., Consultor of the Biblical Commission, who here extends to the English-speaking world a benefit enjoyed hitherto only by those versed in French. The metrical arrangement of the Psalms in Latin and English, according to the Hebrew parallelism, while preserving their inherent quaintness and unction, brings out well the harmony of their inspired sentiments. The scholarly annotations, containing a brief exposition of the thought of the poem, of the lyric standpoint, and lucid explanation of passages obscured in translations from the Massoretic text, will be welcomed by busy priests. The arrangement of the Psalms and Canticles according to their liturgical grouping, with complete alphabetical and numerical indices, makes the book valuable for ready reference. The popularity of the French edition of the Psalter and the timely appearance of the present volume augur well for the restoration of a beautiful custom of the early Church, when the Faithful recited from memory "the heart of the Bible," as the Psalms are called.

"A Book-lover's Holidays in the Open" (Scribner, $2.00), Mr. Roosevelt's latest volume, contains an excellent chapter on reading, in which he makes the following observations regarding the necessity of learning to like solid authors:

> Of course, if any one finds that he never reads serious literature, if all his reading is frothy and trashy, he would do well to try to train himself to like books that the general agreement of cultivated and sound-thinking persons has placed among the classics. It is as discreditable to the mind to be unfit for sustained mental effort as it is to the body of a young man to be unfit for sustained physical effort. Let man or woman, young man or girl, read some good author, . . . until sustained mental effort brings power to enjoy the books worth enjoying. When this has been achieved the man can soon trust himself to pick out for himself the particular good books which appeal to him. . . . Fathers and mothers who are wise can train their children first to practise, and soon to like, the sustained mental application necessary to enjoy good books. They will do well also to give each boy or girl the mastery of at least some one foreign language, so that at least one other great literature, in addition to our own noble English literature, shall be open to him or her. . . . Another matter which, within certain rather wide limits, each reader must settle for himself, is the dividing line between (1) not knowing anything about current books, and (2) swamping one's soul in the sea of vapidity which overwhelms him who reads only "the last new books." To me the heading employed by some reviewers, when they speak of "books of the week," comprehensively damns both the books themselves and the reviewer who is willing to notice them. I would much rather see the heading, "books of the year before last." A book of the year before last which is still worth noticing would probably be worth reading; but one only entitled to be called a book of the week had better be tossed into the waste-basket at once.

But when the author recommends Lea's "History of the Inquisition" and "Coulton's abridgment of Salimbene's memoirs" as good correctives for the assertions of "sentimentalists" who maintain that the "'ages of faith,' the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, for instance, were better than our own," Catholics will wisely leave the advice unused. For Lea is always a special pleader and Coulton has well been termed the "historical scandal-monger."

"Cam Clarke" (Macmillan, $1.35) the hero of John H. Walsh's story, is a real boy whose adventures will hold the interest of grown-ups, as well as that of youthful readers. The author pictures a frontier town in Washington a generation ago with its motley population, and his character portraits are very clever. Indeed there is much in the book to remind the reader of what is best in Mark Twain's boy-stories.——"Babette" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25) is F. Berkeley Smith's story of a young French girl who married a gentleman criminal and succeeds in making him lead an honest life by no other power than her innocence and goodness. The surprise of the story is that the girl never suspects the real character of her husband nor the reformation she has effected. There are some good descriptive passages in the book, but the author's moral reflections are frequently weak. His distinction between immorality and unmorality is decidedly wrong.——"The Belfry" (Macmillan, $1.35) in May Sinclair's recent novel is that round which Longfellow's poem "The Belfry of Bruges" makes so many associations cluster. But associations of a different kind it has for Tasker Jevons and Viola Thesiger. Suspicions are aroused because of circumstances attendant upon their first sight of the Belfry, and the incident is a painful subject in the family circle, and any secret event which transpires is ironically referred to as "seeing the Belfry." Jevons lives under the cloud of these suspicions until the great war, prophesied by him nine years before, begins, and during the terrible days of Belgium Jevons's reputation is rehabilitated. An interesting and well-written story.

A humble and contrite heart, that indispensable requisite for effective intercession, pervades the following stanzas by Mr. Alfred Noyes which are entitled "A Prayer in Time of War":

Thou, whose deep ways are in the sea,
Whose footsteps are not known,
Tonight a world that turned from Thee
Is waiting—at Thy Throne.

The towering Babels that we raised
Where scoffing sophists brawl,
The little Antichrists we praised—
The night is on them all.

The fool hath said. . . . The fool hath said. . . .
And we, who deemed him wise,
We who believed that Thou wast dead,
How should we seek Thine eyes?

How should we seek to Thee for power
Who scorned Thee yesterday?
How should we kneel, in this dread hour?
Lord, teach us how to pray!

Grant us the single heart, once more,
That mocks no sacred thing,
The Sword of Truth our fathers wore
When Thou wast Lord and King.

Let darkness unto darkness tell
Our deep unspoken prayer,
For, while our souls in darkness dwell,
We know that Thou art there.

If "pros" of every variety and description prayerfully repeat those lines, the return of peace may be hastened.

EDUCATION

I—Dangers of Secular Universities

THE dangers besetting the faith of every Catholic entering a secular university recur almost daily and are as various as a chameleon's hues. This statement is based upon a four-year's experience in a State university in the Mississippi Valley. The writer vividly recalls the first assembly of the Latin class. "Pope Gregory (590-604) was afraid the people were reading Livy more than their catechisms, so he ordered Livy's works burned," said the professor, stressing "catechisms" as he curled his lip in righteous scorn, thus revealing pearly teeth. Despite the errors in the statement, there was not a word of protest from the half-dozen Catholics in the class, the writer included. None had the courage to refute the implied charge that the Popes were the enemies of learning; none knew whether the statement was false or true. Doubtless there are many of the professor's auditors who continue to believe to this day that the Popes are and always have been the enemies of learning and progress.

Revelation a Myth

From that first period in the freshman year until graduation there was a succession of theories, statements, innuendos tending to shake belief in Catholicism. "Some sixty million years have elapsed, it can be demonstrated with mathematical exactness," by accepting as true many conditions not proved, "since a fortuitous concourse of atoms, nebulæ or meteorites sent the earth wheeling on her giant ellipse through infinite space"; but there is not a word about a First Great Cause or the primal source of matter and energy. "In the beginning God created heaven and earth," so says Genesis, but that is a fable by the time the young Catholic completes his course in geology. "The hills, rock-ribbed," record the lapses of æons of time. The darting seconds, blending with the more slowly-moving minutes and forming the silent hours which make the stately epochs of geologic time, show the growth of the earth to have been corrodingly lethargic. Hence the Scriptures are an antique myth. The word "created" ceases to have much meaning to the superficial scientist. A Catholic college would have supplied the corrective viewpoint by showing God as the cause of matter and energy and nature's laws. The mention of the Deity in the classroom and in connection with material science is tantamount to a confession of puerile weakness. The writer recalls only one professor who referred with humble reverence to God in the majesty of nature. He was true Scotch and he is dead.

Catholicism is corrupt and licentious; the sophomore's Chaucer proves it. The young man sees monk, friar, summoner, pardoner in "Chaucerian reality"; but he hears never a word about the right of investiture, nor of the struggle the Papacy carried on with the temporal princes to appoint its own bishops. A Catholic college would have supplied the corrective viewpoint by showing how the temporal princes filched from the Church the appointing of bishops, enthroning court favorites with no concern as to spiritual qualifications.

Little wonder the student looks askance at clerical celibacy; he is told much about physical signs of social disease even in the fourteenth century. The history he gets in his course will not supply the corrective viewpoint because too many of his teachers burn incense at strange shrines, descant on the "benefits" of the "Reformation," and are loud in their praise of the "monk that shook the world." Grisar's work is referred to with scant courtesy; many have never heard of it.

Religion an "Antiquated Superstition"

Later on the young man takes a hodge-podge of ethics, philosophy and psychology. The simian prototype is ever present in the classroom, a genealogy which science has failed to demonstrate. Our young Catholic learns that St. Thomas Aquinas and the schoolmen dawdled away many precious hours, attempting to determine how many angels could stand on a pinpoint. Kant, Spencer, Mill, James, and their coteries are the really important names to remember. Darwin leads them all. Lourdes is dismissed with a compassionate glance, for if such wonders really do happen they involve merely the laws of nature not yet fully comprehended. All psychic phenomena should be studied without reference to the soul. There is no distinction between brute and human save that of degree; we are more perfectly developed than the dog. He feels, thinks, reasons, aspires, as we do, but merely more rudimentarily. Science will solve all things, such as Lourdes, in time. "Miracles?" "Impossible! Nature's laws, like gravity, are only but dimly glimpsed."

The young Catholic is an obscurantist if he is not quick to discern that the narrators of the four Gospels greatly exaggerated in their accounts of what Jesus did. Of course those people were untutored in modern psychology and were under hypnosis when the wonders related are supposed to have occurred. These sacred writers were not versed in critical research and their methods were crude; they lived so long ago, too. However, in many respects, Christ was a remarkable man and one of the great reformers. The Catholic student is saved, perchance, because he does not correlate what he has been taught but, through the grace of God, clings to the teachings of his boyhood.

The Sham of Pseudo-Science

Members of the staff firmly believe that science will eventually comprehend in fullest intensity the baffling, omnipresent, ever-beckoning, ever-elusive mystery: life. Science is the bridge which will span the sheer abyss from which the keenest minds of all ages have recoiled appalled. Humility is not the chief characteristic of the blatant college pseudo-scientists. On a rare occasion the Catholic boy will be told that we do not know, in its full meaning, why two ultimate divisions or quantities of matter or energy, hydrogen and oxygen, unite to form water when brought into natural contact at about 3,200° Fahrenheit. A humble physicist may confess ignorance as to the exact nature of gravity, and once in a while a genuine scientist will tell him that many scientific terms merely cloak our naked ignorance, but for the most part materialistic science is clothed with over-importance and set up in the place of God. How, then, does faith escape destruction? F. L.

SOCIOLOGY

The Training of Social Workers

THE development of philanthropy and "social service" in America has presented to the Church in this country problems which exist nowhere else in the same form. The crux of the matter is that the work of relieving our poor, whether in their own homes or in institutions, is accomplished for the most part by lay, private organizations, not by the State, as in Great Britain, nor by religious communities, as in the Catholic countries of Europe. It is true that in America the municipal and State authorities grant large subsidies to private charitable organizations, besides maintaining public almshouses, but this does not make the work of relief a State function as it is under the English Poor Law. In American Catholic charitable institutions the Religious Orders are very prominent, but the charity work of such communities is rather slight in comparison with similar work done by the Orders in Belgium or Italy.

Scientific Philanthropy

Specially characteristic of America is the science of philanthropy, now a recognized university subject with a vast literature devoted to it. As a result of this science a profession of philanthropy is also being formed. It is urged that as philanthropy is a science it must have its trained practitioners. So we have such institutions as the New York School of Philanthropy, the Boston School for Social Workers, and the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy.

While scientific philanthropy is constantly advocating the greater and greater employment of professionals in social work, it is admitted that a very large field remains to the volunteer; but, it is insisted, the volunteer as well as the professional must be trained. Now there is much in the new science and practice of philanthropy which Catholics cannot accept. The whole subject is one that has not at all received the attention it deserves. But it cannot be denied that some training is necessary to effective social work, and it may also be said that Catholics are lacking in this training. A beginning toward improvement has been made by the courses of instruction at the Catholic University at Washington, Trinity College, Loyola University, and the diocesan School of Social Science in Boston.

The Science of Charity

The comparative backwardness among Catholics of social training for the laity is due to the fact that in Catholic countries most of the social work has been done not by the laity, but by religious. The principle of social training is, however, traditionally a Catholic principle. There is no training so searching and so complete as that of a novice in a Religious Order. Exponents of the new scientific philanthropy are generally ignorant of history, and they are in the habit of speaking of "medieval charity" as a synonym for inefficient and pauperizing methods of relief. The truth is that it is the Catholic Church which created not only the spirit, but the science of charity. A saint like Vincent de Paul displayed not only that heroic degree of self-abnegation which is found nowhere except in the Church, but also that faculty of adapting means to ends, which in the lives of the Saints is called prudence, but which in philanthropic treatises is "efficiency" or "organizing ability." In short, the traditional charitable work of the Church is both organized and expert, although it is not professional. Charity organization societies and schools of philanthropy are modern innovations, but they are not due to the superior enlightenment of modern times; they are, like the English Poor Law, but attempts to find workable substitutes for the wonderful system of charity which Catholicism created, and which heresy destroyed.

Training Catholic Social Workers

As the training of social workers is completely in accord with Catholic traditions, it will be agreed that if, under the circumstances of the present day, we must have lay-workers, then these workers should be trained. A St.-Vincent-de-Paul-Society brother, for instance, should be able to do more than carry grocery tickets to a poor family. He should know something of what the books on scientific philanthropy call "family rehabilitation." Besides visiting the poor in their homes, which is the particular province of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the laity are now called to a hundred other forms of social service, both professional and volunteer. There are the "big brothers" and the "big sisters," probation officers, settlement and club workers, besides the special kinds of social service in connection with various professions, as medicine, nursing, teaching.

But we need more than the technical instruction given by secular schools of philanthropy. Catholic social work has primarily a spiritual object, and therefore the worker needs a spiritual training. A "big brother," for instance, is supposed to take hold of an erring boy and to give such inspiration and friendly guidance as will counteract the bad influences in the boy's environment. The non-Catholic big-brother movement thinks only of making the boy a "good citizen," and therefore it requires of the big brother only some education, respectability and philanthropy. But a Catholic big brother knows he can do nothing worth while unless he can make the boy a good Catholic. He undertakes a supernatural work and therefore must cultivate supernatural virtues in himself. There was profound social wisdom, as well as true Catholic spirit, in Frederick Ozanam's rule that the first aim of the St. Vincent de Paul Society was the sanctification of the individual member. He who presumes to the task of uplifting the poor must first purify himself. The Church recognizes this in the Religious Orders. Should it not be applied to lay social workers? Should not social work be regarded as a special vocation, needing a special test and training, something corresponding to a novitiate?

Henry Somerville.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Davenport, Iowa, has been chosen for the next convention of the Supreme Council of the Knights of Columbus. Directly opposite the city, situated on the banks of the Mississippi, are Rock Island and Moline, in the State of Illinois. The intimate social and industrial relations between the three cities will help to unite them in their friendly cooperation toward the success of the congress which might fittingly be called, "The Tri-City Convention." Davenport is easy of access from all parts of the country and picturesquely located in the vicinity of the arsenal on Government Island. The total population of the three cities is approximately 120,000, and together they can afford ample accommodation for all the visitors, although from 7,000 to 10,000 are expected by the enthusiastic promoters of the 1916 convention.

At the Convent of the Holy Name of Jesus, New Orleans, La., there recently passed away a noted Catholic woman, Mrs. Agnes Boone Otis, about whose name many historic memories are entwined. She was a great-granddaughter of the famous American explorer Daniel Boone, and wife of the civil war hero and successor to General Custer in the frontier fighting of the Indian wars, Colonel Elmer Otis. After her husband's retirement from service she accompanied him to San Diego, where he died in 1897. Her son-in-law, Lieut.-Colonel Cabell, is at present chief of General Pershing's staff in the Mexican expedition. Death summoned her unexpectedly, and by her side was a paper in which she had evidently, according to her wont, sought for news concerning him. Few lives have been devoted so ardently to God and country. She is survived by five children, one of whom, the Rev. A. E. Otis, S.J., is President of Loyola University, New Orleans.

A war of science, mechanics and engineering: such is the great struggle at present carried on between Germany and France at the fortifications of Verdun. The following description of it is quoted from the New York Evening Mail:

> It is not a battle; it is not a matter of brave charges undertaken by courageous men. It is an engineering feat. The greatest engineering feat that has ever been attempted in history is in progress. A mountain of forts is being assaulted. Shells filled with explosives, shrapnel shells, huge howitzer shells, are but details of the undertaking. The assault is not being made with men. It is a vast engineering enterprise carried on with machinery, just as a modern factory turns out its product, not by hand labor but by machinery. The quantities of ammunition have been calculated in units of 100,000 tons. The total will reach a million tons. To transport this vast material railroads have been built and macadam roads laid in parallel courses over each strip of territory to be traversed, over each square mile of new land conquered. A whole nation has set itself to the completion of an engineering feat with the aid of modern science, modern machinery and vast forces of men organized by the aid of the telephone and telegraph into the most perfect working mechanism of men and machines that can be created.

Germany and France are engaged in the same methods of warfare, and hecatombs of men have been offered on both sides. These are "the fairy tales of science and the long results of time." Another idol has fallen which men have vainly sought to substitute for God.

Father Francis Kuppens, S.J., the last survivor of the Belgian missionaries brought to America by Father DeSmet, recently died at the Novitiate of the Missouri Province, and was buried in the Florissant cemetery by the side of his renowned friend and co-laborer who had inspired him with enthusiasm for the Indian missions. He was seventy-eight years of age and had celebrated the golden jubilees of his religious life and of his priesthood. Coming to America shortly after the outbreak of the Civil War he began his studies at Florissant and completed them in Boston, where he was ordained in 1863. On the very day of his ordination he exercised his priestly ministry by administering the Last Sacraments to some dying soldiers, wounded at the Battle of Gettysburg. Two years later Father Kuppens went to the Rocky Mountain missions, taking with him a band of Sisters of Providence. While working for the Indian tribes of the Northwest he found no sacrifice too great for his zeal. His constitution was so robust that he could bear the severest hardships. He thought it a slight thing to swim across a swollen stream in winter and continue his journey for miles to bring the consolations of religion to his scattered flock. But his excessive labors and frequent exposure at last brought on a severe rheumatic trouble which unfitted him for active work during the last decade of his life, though his heart and his prayers still belonged to his dear Indians.

The nineteen-year-old daughter of the ex-minister and former Socialist Mayor of Berkeley, California, has recently attained to a certain mild notoriety by giving to the world her early philosophy of life. She left the University of California, where her "ego was being crushed," and confided to the press the following untrammeled expression of her views: "When married people cease to love, they should quit! If later they fall in love a dozen times I believe that each time they should obey their instincts. Marriage, as we know it today, is a terrible mistake! When two people fall in love nothing in the world should keep them apart." She furthermore declares herself prepared personally to reduce her principles to practice. No doubt. But there is after all no striking originality in her doctrine. It can be found repeated ad nauseam in the literature advocated in the Socialist propaganda, and doubtless placed within this girl's reach from early years by a fond Socialist parent. She is only one more of the unfortunates whose ideals have been dragged through the mire by such reading. Modesty is a word lost from its vocabulary and purity now has a meaning which would make the Angels weep. But this Socialist's daughter has not forfeited her opportunities of education, for Stanford University opened its gates to her. There presumably she hopes to receive due consideration for her "ego" which is not to be crushed. It is a question, however, whether she enters as a learner or a teacher. For she is sure to influence the pupils and professors with whom she comes into contact. Will the Catholic students of Leland Stanford find this rampant Socialist a desirable acquaintance?

Few are acquainted with the excellent and extensive work accomplished by the Xavier Free Publication Society for the Blind, New York City. Besides issuing two monthly magazines, the Catholic Transcript for the Blind, in New York Point, and the Catholic Review, in American Braille, it has, during the past twelve months embossed thirty-nine different books, comprising sixty-three volumes. Ten other works have been stereotyped and prepared for publication during this same period. A new invention by the Founder and Director of the Society, Reverend Joseph M. Stadelman, S.J., is likewise announced:

> Books will for the first time be embossed by a new and comparatively inexpensive method in the system known from its inventor as the "Moon" print. Although this system has been applied, it is claimed, to over 400 languages and dialects, no Catholic book has ever been published, at least in the English language, and no book of any kind has ever been embossed in our country, in this tactile print. To the thousands of our Catholic blind in the United States, who cannot read or learn any other print but the "Moon," this invention will undoubtedly prove a great blessing.

To give the widest circulation to its books, the Society has restricted its donations to such libraries as will circulate the volumes throughout the country, or at least will distribute them throughout the respective States in which these libraries are located. Publications are also lent by the Society to all applicants in the United States who cannot procure them any other way. Thus the greatest extension is given to the good accomplished. To perpetuate its work and duly to increase the number of its publications the Society requires a fund of $100,000, or an annual income of $4,000. Thus would new intellectual and spiritual vistas continue to be opened for the Catholic blind.

Much speculation has taken place in the press over the British Prime Minister's recent visit to Pope Benedict XV at the Vatican. "Two things about this may safely be assumed," writes the Toronto Globe with the usual infallibility of secular papers.

> It took place at the instance of the Pope, and the motive was to discuss Papal intervention to bring about a general peace. Mr. Asquith would never have asked for an interview which courtesy forbade him to refuse, and the Pope's intense desire to save his favorite Austria from utter destruction has been made manifest in many ways.

There is scarcely any need of considering the writer's advice to all "would-be interventionists," like the Holy Father, that they should "save themselves humiliation and other people irritation." The fact is that Premier Asquith himself telegraphed to the Pope his wish to be received in audience at the Vatican and his Holiness courteously welcomed him. After his interview with the Pope the Premier called upon the Cardinal Secretary of State, who in turn visited the British legation. What passed between the Holy Father and Mr. Asquith is a matter about which not the slightest information has been given to any one. Yet with the wonted omniscience displayed by the press upon such occasions, the editor of the Globe says, in his own positive and supercilious way: "It was just as well that he (the Holy Father) asked and that Mr. Asquith granted the interview, because it gave the latter a chance to point out the utter futility of intervention." Without even a vestige of fact to guide him, the writer launches into insinuations which he knows must discredit the Holy See. Such an act constitutes a discourteous and unfair attack.

In the first number of Bull, a monthly illustrated magazine, there is quoted from a Danish paper a record of all the casualties and misfortunes that, according to the New York Herald, have befallen the German Crown Prince since the war began:

> August 5 last year, an attempt was made to assassinate the Crown Prince in Berlin. August 18, he was dangerously wounded close to the French border, and was transferred to a hospital in Aachen. Two days later, he lost a leg in a further attempt at his assassination in Berlin, and on August 24, a still further attempt was made to assassinate him. One can easily understand that under these circumstances, he tried to commit suicide on September 4. He had no means of knowing that what he had so far gone through with was child's play compared with what was to follow. On September 13 he died with a mask over his face in a hospital in Brussels. On September 15, he lead an attack on Verdun, and on the following day was wounded by a shrapnel in Poland. On October 18, he was again wounded by a shrapnel on the French front, and on October 20, the Crown Princess came to nurse him on his deathbed. On October 24, a certain lady was present at his burial in Berlin. On October 25, his body was found on the battlefield, and on November 3, he was again buried. The following day, he fell by a French bullet, and on November 8, he became crazy and was transferred to a distant castle. Here he recovered so quickly that on November 13, he could take general command on the eastern front, but here he received his death wound on November 17. In December he took a Christmas vacation, which he certainly could well use. On January 16, he was again wounded. In spite of all that he had suffered for his country, he was deprived of his command on March 3, and sent home to his wife and children, but they must have received him rather badly, for a short time afterwards the Crown Princess personally had to nurse him on account of a bullet wound.

By this time, surely, his Imperial Highness must be well-schooled in adversity. However, should other trials await him still, the cleverly-edited Bull will doubtless chronicle the news faithfully.

Non-Catholics who have at heart the welfare of this country are daily becoming more alarmed at the growth of divorce and the train of evils that necessarily follows from it. "Surely here is a question that touches the very foundation of society," says the Christian Herald:

> Mr. Wilcox, a competent statistician, ventures the opinion that more divorces are now granted here in a year than in all the rest of the Christian world together, more than in the whole of Europe (outside of the Balkan peninsula), civilized Australia, and America. This is a startling arraignment, even if only measurably accurate. Other sources of evidence confirm the extraordinary growth of the divorce evil. According to the last census, there were in the United States 156,176 men and 185,101 women who had been divorced, 3 per cent of the total male and 4 per cent of the female population of the country. In the twenty years from 1887 to 1906, an average of one marriage in 12 terminated in divorce. In 1906, the divorce total was 72,062, nearly three times as many as in 1870. And the increase seems to be going on, especially in the South and Southwest. Our divorce rate is double that of Switzerland, three times that of France, five times that of Germany, and as large as the combined rates of Australia, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Great Britain, Germany, Italy, and Hungary. While marriages have nearly doubled in number in 20 years, divorces have increased almost threefold. Judge H. W. H. Thomas of the Supreme Court of California, in a thoughtful article on the subject in the Christian Statesman, calls attention to the serious situation. He questions whether it can be adequately met by additional legislation, although whatever would tend to increase public sentiment in upholding the sacredness of marriage would be a material help. But there are the plain, hard, undeniable facts with which our country must deal; the divorce tide, rising in all lands, is here reaching floodmark and threatens the family as an institution. And whatever injures the family, threatens the State itself.

These are strong words. As the writer comments, the record is sufficiently startling to set the ablest minds seeking a remedy for conditions that constantly threaten to become worse. The remedy has long ago been given by Christ Himself and consistently applied by the Catholic Church. Divorce is but one of the many evils that have followed upon the rejection of Catholic doctrine. The Protestant Bishop, William H. Moreland of Sacramento, Cal., recently said at old Trinity Church, New York: "Christ taught that marriage is a holy, indissoluble bond. United States census reports reveal how frightfully the practice of the nation has departed from the Divine standard. . . . Protestant ministers are greatly to be censured for lightly marrying divorced people." Thus the truth of the Church's doctrine is slowly gaining recognition.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 3 } APRIL 29, 1916 { $3.00 A YEAR
WHOLE No. 368 } { PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, April 18, p. m.-April 25, a. m.—The Capture of Trebizond—The American Note. China: Patching Up a Peace. France: Rights of War-Orphans. Germany: Death of Baron von der Goltz. Great Britain: Archbishop Whiteside's Letter. Mexico: War, Morals, Religion. Spain: High Cost of Living — Catholic Noblemen's Association — Cervantes Institute 49-52

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Popes and Peace—The Boys of Our City: Boston—Suggestion in Youth—Easter Laughter—Ratan Devi: an Impression—A Lay Apostle of the Faith.....53-60

COMMUNICATIONS
A Proselyting Scheme—Mixed Marriages—Correct Ecclesiastical Titles—A Correction—The Shakespeare Tercentenary—German Grammar. 60, 61

EDITORIALS
"Personal Practical Work" — St. Thomas and the Chicago Tribune — The Veracious Advertisers — Safety First? — Godless New York — Feeling Sorry for Yourself.....62-65

LITERATURE
XXV–Lionel Johnson.

REVIEWS: Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings — The Education of Boys — Singing Fires of Erin—Antwerp to Gallipoli—The Way of the Cross.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Seventeen" — "Practical Stage Directing for Amateurs" — "The Chief Points of Difference between the Catholic and Protestant Creeds" — The Irish Monthly for April—"The Modernizing of the Monroe Doctrine" — "The Curved Blades" — "The Second Coming"—"Gibby of Clamshell Alley"—"Beggars on Horseback"—"Mary Rose of Mifflin"—"Golden Glory"—M. Henri Lavedan's "Credo."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....65-68

EDUCATION
II–Dangers of Secular Universities.....69, 70

SOCIOLOGY
Her Place in the World.....70, 71

NOTE AND COMMENT
Mystic Anglican Rites—Educational Tour of the Rev. Henry Browne, S.J.—Plans for a Merchant Marine—Harvard's Athletic Income—Mosquito Week for New York — Efficiency of Modern Pedagogics—The Rising Mission Spirit....71, 72

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Belgium during the early part of the week the Germans took some 800 yards of trenches between Langemarck and Ypres, but later the British recaptured the lost ground and have thus restored the original line. In the Verdun district both sides have made attacks and counter-attacks east and west of the Meuse, but the general situation has remained unchanged except for some slight gains made by the French north of the Curettes Woods, and by the Germans west and southwest of the village of Douaumont. In the upper Cardevole district the Italians have captured the summit of Col di Lana. The Russians announce several minor successes near Bitlis and south of Lake Urumiah. In Mesopotamia the British relief force has again encountered vigorous resistance from the Turks, who have further impeded the British advance by enlarging the flooded area on the banks of the Tigris.

Bulletin, April 18, p. m.-April 25, a. m.

The main interest in the war last week shifted unexpectedly from France to Armenia. It was known that a Russian column was moving along the Black Sea coast, had taken Rize and Kara Dere, and was operating in conjunction with the Russian fleet, about seventeen miles east of Trebizond. But its progress of late had been so slow, and the resistance offered by the Turks in other parts of Armenia, especially near Baiburt and in the Lake Van region, so effective, that there was a general impression that the Turks, with the heavy snows and the extremely difficult country all on their side, would be able to keep their hold on the important seaport. Its fall, coming so suddenly, was a great surprise. A furious battle took place at Kovana, six miles east of Trebizond, which ended in a complete defeat of the defenders. After this reverse the Turks abandoned the city, and when the Russians finally entered it, they did so without a struggle. The fall of Trebizond is a severe blow to the Turks, not only on account of its intrinsic value, but also because it furnishes the Russians with a new base, to which supplies can be readily transported by sea. If Baiburt should fall, fairly easy communications will be established between Trebizond and all the Russian armies now engaged in Armenia, and the Turks' task of defending their Asiatic empire will be greatly increased.

The Capture of Trebizond

The United States has replied to the recent German communication in a note which is everywhere admitted to be fraught with the very gravest possibilities. Its import is clearly expressed in the following paragraph:

The American Note

> Unless the Imperial Government should now immediately declare and effect an abandonment of its present methods of submarine warfare against passenger and freight-carrying vessels, the Government of the United States can have no choice but to sever diplomatic relations with the German Empire altogether. This action the Government of the United States contemplates with the greatest reluctance, but feels constrained to take in behalf of humanity and the rights of neutral nations.

Mr. Lansing declares that facts in the possession of the United States Government, substantiated by admissions made by the recent German note, make the conclusion inevitable that the Sussex was sunk by a German submarine. Had this been an isolated instance, he says, the act might possibly be attributed to wilful violation of orders or criminal negligence on the part of the commander who fired the torpedo.

> On the contrary, the Government of the United States is forced by recent events to conclude that it is only one instance, even though one of the most extreme and most distressing instances, of the deliberate method and spirit of indiscriminate destruction of merchant vessels of all sorts, nationalities, and destinations which have become more and more unmistakable as the activity of German undersea vessels of war has in recent months been quickened and extended. . . . Again and again the Imperial Government has given its solemn assurances to the Government of the United States that at least passenger ships would not be thus dealt with, and yet it has repeatedly permitted its undersea commanders to disregard those assurances with entire impunity. . . . No limit of any kind has in fact been set to their indiscriminate pursuit and destruction of merchantmen of all kinds and nationalities within the waters which the Imperial Government has chosen to designate as lying within the seat of war. The roll of Americans who have lost their lives upon ships thus attacked and destroyed has grown month by month until the ominous toll has mounted into the hundreds.

The United States has accepted, the note declares, the Imperial Government's assurances of its desire "so to order and control the acts of its naval commanders as to square its policy with the recognized principles of humanity as embodied in the law of nations." But "the commanders of the Imperial Government's undersea vessels have carried on practices of such ruthless destruction which have made it more and more evident as the months have gone by that the Imperial Government has found it impractical to put any such restraints upon them as it had hoped, and promised to put." The United States has waited "until the facts became unmistakable, and were susceptible of only one interpretation."

If it is still the purpose of the Imperial Government to prosecute relentless and indiscriminate warfare against vessels of commerce by the use of submarines without regard to what the Government of the United States must consider the sacred and indisputable rules of international law, and the universally recognized dictates of humanity, the Government of the United States is at last forced to the conclusion that there is but one course it can pursue.

It is generally believed that Germany desires the friendship of the United States, and is disposed to concede whatever is not considered by her to be essential to success in the war.

China.—Yuan Shi-Kai is trying hard to win back the allegiance of the revolted southern provinces. Though he gave up his project of reestablishing the monarchy and humbly acknowledged his "lack of virtue," the revolutionary movement kept spreading. It started in the province of Yun-nan which is far from Pekin, and passed eastward to the sea. Six southern provinces, including Kwang-Tung, which contains the important commercial centers, Canton and Hongkong, declared themselves independent of Yuan's Government, and in three other provinces the revolutionists are reported to be in control. Thousands of Government troops and five of Yuan's warships are said to have gone over to the enemy and news of battles come from time to time, but probably there has been little severe fighting. On April 22, however, the revolted provinces made President Yuan the following peace proposals: (1) That a really representative parliament shall be established; (2) That a Cabinet responsible for its acts to the parliament shall be created; (3) That the provincial legislatures shall be restored; (4) That definite and satisfactory relations shall be established between the central government and the legislatures.

Patching Up a Peace

If Yuan will accept these terms the revolutionists, with the exception of a small group in Shanghai, agree to recognize him as President of China. Yuan seems ready to make the desired concessions, for he has reorganized his Cabinet, giving the premiership and the war portfolio to Tuan Chi-Jui, a staunch republican, and has promised to hand over all civil authority to the new Cabinet, the other members of which are these: Foreign Affairs, Lu Cheng-Hsiang, the present incumbent; Finance, Chang Hu, now Vice-Minister of Finance; Interior, Wang Yih-Ting, former Minister of Trade and Commerce; Marine, Admiral Liu Kuang-Hsun, the present incumbent; Communications, Tsao Yulin, now Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, while Chow Tzu-Chi, Minister of Agriculture, becomes Director General of the Bank of China. Meanwhile Japan appears to be satisfied with the trend of events in China and the Mikado's officials protest that he is not meditating encroachments on Chinese sovereignty at all, but merely desires to have as many of his "political advisers" in the country as are retained there by the British, the French, and the Russians, that he would like to assist in policing "important places" where the Japanese are numerous, and wishes above all things to make China a "strong" neighbor of Japan.

France.—The question of the war-orphans is still unsettled and is deeply stirring the country. M. de Lamarzelle is valiantly fighting for the right these children have to be educated in the faith of their fathers. Thanks to M. de Lamarzelle's initiative and efforts, 12,968 French mothers, whose husbands have been "mobilized," have memorialized Parliament in the name of their 28,992 children, and made the following petitions: (1) Let the law of guardianship be modified for all orphans if necessary, and not merely for the war-orphans; (2) Let these depend on the Ministry of Justice and not on the Ministry of Public Instruction: dependence upon this latter department would impose upon them "official moral instruction"; (3) Let priests and "ministers of worship" be admitted as members of Departmental Boards with the same rights as the representatives of all "social groups"; (4) Let the financial allowances and subsidies be granted to all war-orphans without regard to the character, public or private, of the institutions or schools where they are to be educated.

Rights of War-Orphans

The Catholic senators are making a sturdy fight against the false principle of the Minister of Public Intruction, M. Painlevé, and his Commission, namely that it is for the State to watch over the education of the orphans. They claim that right primarily for the parent. MM. de Lamarzelle, De las Cases and Jénouvrier have been helped in their campaign by journals of such widely differing views as l'Action Française, l'Echo de Paris, l'Eclair, le Figaro, le Gaulois, l'Intransigeant and la Libre Parole.

Germany.—The death of Baron Kolmar von der Goltz, at the advanced age of seventy-three, removes from the field of action one of the foremost strategists and diplomatists of the day. He had served in three wars, and during the years of peace achieved eminence as a military writer. His book, "The Nation in Arms," became most popular soon after its publication, and his historical works, "The Operations of the Second Army," "Gambetta and His Army," and "Rossbach and Jena," attracted the attention of the entire military world. He was wounded in the war against Austria, in 1866, and for the following two years was in charge of the War College. In 1868, he was head of the Topographical Bureau of the General Staff. During the Franco-Prussian war he held command over the Second Army, took part in the battles of Vionville and Gravelotte, and in the siege of Metz, and led the German armies in their march on the Loire. In 1883, he was sent to reconstruct the Turkish army and remained in Turkey for thirteen years. The effect of his training was apparent in the decisive victory of the Turkish Army over the Greeks in 1896. To those who found fault with him for Turkish inefficiency in the Balkan war, he had replied that he had left Turkey many years before the war, and had not been given a free field for practical reorganization, adding:

Death of Baron von der Goltz

> If I have been considered throughout half of Europe as the cause of the ruin of the poor Turkish army, I am the richer by another experience which has taught me the nature of public opinion, that the judgment of the world deserves less consideration and is of less value than even I had already given it, and that history is actually the fable convenue of Napoleon I.

Toward the beginning of the present war he was appointed Military Governor of the part of Belgium occupied by the German troops, but was called to Turkey at its entrance into the war, and was made military commandant at Constantinople, and Acting Minister of War. He was the directing spirit in building up the strong defense on the Gallipoli peninsula. As "Goltz Pascha," he was a leader for the Turks in their greatest difficulties, and pointed out to them the ways and means of success in their undertakings. He and von Bieberstein were largely responsible for the weakening of English influence at the Porte, and the development of the Turkish-German alliance. His death, said to be due to an attack of spotted fever, occurred at the headquarters of his army.

Great Britain.—A letter of the Archbishop of Liverpool, published in conjunction with the Report of the Ecclesiastical Educational Fund, has attracted much attention. After referring to the judgment of Pius X, that "society at the present time is suffering from a terrible and deep-rooted disease, a disease that is rightly named apostasy from God," the Archbishop calls to mind the words of the present Holy Father:

Archbishop Whiteside's Letter

> Think not that if peace has flown from the world, this has been without the Divine permission. God permits the people who have set their thoughts on the things of this world to be punished by one another, on account of the contempt and the carelessness with which they have treated Him.

The Archbishop then traces the cause of the present chaos in Europe to the religious revolt of the sixteenth century which, in the words of Leo XIII, "broke the precious bond of the ancient unity in faith and in authority, and introduced among the ranks of Christians a fatal principle of lamentable disintegration." The alleged "right" of private judgment paved the way to the rejection of the Holy Scriptures and to the denial of the Divinity of Christ. Religion, by degrees, was replaced by indifferentism; expediency became the dominating norm of morality. With the eclipse of true religion and positive morality, public disorder was but a natural consequence of the confusion at first confined to the field of speculation. Again quoting Pius X, the Archbishop says:

> There is no salvation for the world but in Christ. Men have once more attempted to work without Him. They have begun to build up the edifice, after rejecting the corner-stone. And lo! the pile that has been raised again crumbles, and falls upon the heads of the builders.

A true return to Jesus Christ means a return to the authority of the Catholic Church. Outside the Catholic Church there is but a welter of private opinion, eventuating in discord. The Catholic Church alone never compromises with error. She alone resists all attempts, however specious, against the sanctity of marriage and of the home, and by her teaching of the Gospel of Christ in all its purity, promotes virtue in the individual, and safeguards the stability of civil and political order. Such in outline are the contents of the Archbishop's remarkable letter.

Mexico.—Conditions in Mexico are not improving; on the contrary, they are steadily growing worse. The American troops have been attacked again, and Carranza continues to insist that our soldiers be withdrawn from Mexican territory. At present the Administration shows no willingness to meet the demand. Meantime the Diaz faction appears to be growing in strength, and there are persistent rumors of discontent amongst the Carranzistas. The Mexican paper dollar is now worth one and three-quarter cents; in Otumba meat is selling at fifteen dollars a pound and Indian corn at three dollars a liter. Some idea of Carranza's benevolence can be obtained from the following extract from a letter from Vera Cruz:

War, Morals, Religion

Day before yesterday (April 9), about six o'clock in the morning, José Peon del Valle and eighty companions, Mexicans, Frenchmen and other nationals, were arrested without apparent reason and led away to Perote, a prison in the mountains of Vera Cruz. No one knows what will become of the unfortunate fellows; few men return from Perote.

The nature of the moral instruction given in the schools may be judged from the fact that recently a teacher gave an instruction on polygamy to boys, eight and ten years old, urging them to adopt it when they grew up, for the good of the State. Most of the instruction is unfit to print but the following paragraph is worthy of notice:

What they [the boys] had to avoid was drunkenness; they should avoid monks, too, for they became drunk early in the morning. In order to ascertain this, people had but to notice what the monks did in the farce called the Mass. They drank wine on the altar from golden goblets set with precious stones.

The attitude of the bandits toward Catholic schools is still peculiarly savage. A recent number of El Pueblo says: "The 'Honorable Board of Popular Education of the State of Vera Cruz' after having closed a girls' school called the 'Asilio Veracruzano,' directed by nuns, published the following decrees: 'Within the strict limit of fifteen days, counting from the publication of this resolution, all teaching establishments dependent on distinctly religious institutions must be closed.'" There follow some minor decrees and then El Pueblo remarks:

We applaud with genuine enthusiasm the attitude of the Honorable Board of Popular Education of the State of Vera Cruz, because it definitely breaks with the so-called policy of conciliation, which, in brief, was nothing but an affront against the Reform Laws, and because it is high time to render effective the prescriptions which tend to the intellectual emancipation of the new generation. To permit children to receive from the hands of religious teachers the first foundations of their education is practically to become guilty of genuine abuses committed against people worthy of all protection; it is to stifle in fanaticism, superstition and ignorance the soul of our national life; it is in fine to betray human liberty and civilization.

These views need no demonstration. They are admitted by all cultured nations, by all legislators and thinkers, who unanimously proclaim the urgent necessity of entrusting primary education to real teachers, to masters filled with a noble altruism, conscious of their mission and zealous in the accomplishment of their duties.

Even when these religious schools simulate methods in conformity with those demanded by law, even when they pretend to give a scientific education, they are eminently harmful. For, side by side with truths founded on science, pupils are grounded in the teachings of mysteries of faith, and are taught to mistrust their own judgment. Thus weak and sickly characters are formed, incapable of that individual and personal decision which is perfectly justified by the noble destiny which nature has given to man.

It may happen, and as a fact has happened many times, that genius flourishes in religious schools. But this means nothing for such schools. For genius flourishes of itself through its own efforts and as the result of natural gifts . . . and it is proper to note that genius as developed in the halls of superstition and religious fanaticism has many shortcomings, depths of intellectual and moral abysses, a sure result of a morbid theory, of despotic dogma, and of the crushing of the spirit of the scholar through constant penance, contrition and prayer.

On the other hand, among modern nations, it is a received axiom that for them, a large supply of human units perfectly balanced and strengthened for the fight, with sound body and mind, is preferable to a small number of "supermen." This large supply, the secularist school alone can furnish.

With regard to the education of woman, nothing can be so dangerous as to hand her over to mysticism. For her very sensibility and charms are the factors and elements which the religious power brings into play in order to destroy the redeeming work of a patriotic and sincere liberalism. And so a Mexican priest once said on a solemn occasion: that the French Sisters, who in the days of Porfirio Diaz, and in spite of the Reform Laws, came to Mexico, had as important and supreme a mission as Hernando Cortés. They came in fact, according to Bishop Montes de Oca, to conquer the heart of the Mexican woman, in order that thus they might bind anew the shackles which the Republic of Juarez had broken, in other words to win back Mexico to Rome. . . .

Such is "religious liberty" in Mexico.

Spain.—According to consular reports lately received in Washington, prices in some parts of the country have been forced so high by the war that many foods ordinarily used by the working classes have been placed entirely beyond their reach. Even the more prosperous are paying eighty-five per cent more than formerly. In no other neutral country, it is asserted, has the cost of living risen so sharply. In southern Spain the suspension of some industries, and the mining and labor troubles in La Union and Catalonia have greatly added to the difficulties. In the south food prices are declared to average 200 per cent higher than prices in the United States. Since August, 1914, bread in Seville has risen twenty-five per cent and meats forty to sixty per cent. Imported canned goods are quoted at almost prohibitive prices. Rents have gone up fifteen to twenty per cent, coal costs 150 per cent more than usual, and the cost of gas, electricity, and medical supplies has been doubled. To relieve the situation the Government has voted a large sum for public works.

High Cost of Living

The formation, on Lady-Day, of a new association of Catholic noblemen, "The Knights of Our Lady of the Pillar and of St. Francis Borgia," is an eloquent proof of the vitality and fervor of Catholic life among the upper classes. The Association counts among its members two ex-Ministers of the Crown and representatives of the oldest and most aristocratic families in the country. The Association has a threefold end: the study and diffusion of sound apologetics for the defense of the Faith, the promotion of Catholic social action, and self-education in order to prepare for more effective leadership.

Catholic Noblemen's Association

The Royal Decree founding the Cervantes Institute has been published. The Institute is under the Royal patronage and is intended for infirm and impoverished writers, artists and their children. For the education of the latter a primary school is attached to the institution. The Government will make an annual grant. This year the grant amounts to $5,000.

Cervantes Institute

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Popes and Peace

OVER the roar of countless battlefields, one word heartrending in its pathos, is breathed in many tongues by Teuton, Frenchman, Briton and Slav, "Peace, Peace!" Individuals, nations, continents are soul-weary of carnage and blood. Yet, because the world has rejected the umpire whose decision might silence the din of battle and bind the iron forces of war, the fratricidal contest still goes on, and youth and manhood bleed in the trenches, in the viewless spaces of the air, on the decks of drowning ships; and mothers and orphans wail, and the march of progress and civilization is stopped for years. Formerly a voice could be raised, and priestly hands could be lifted in Christendom, before whose solemn utterance and gesture, the combatants sheathed the sword. The White Shepherd, the Pope of Rome, could pass between the ranks of opposing armies, uplift the Cross and bid them lay down their arms. His voice is little heeded now in the councils of the nations. It would even appear that an effort is made by kings and cabinets to prevent his invitation and warning from being heard again. Other arbiters and tribunals are chosen; none so authoritative or influential.

A Protestant writer, the great German thinker, Leibnitz, has written these words:

> If all would become Catholics and believe in the infallibility of the Pope, there would not be required any other umpire than the Vicar of Jesus Christ. If the Popes resumed the authority which they had in the time of Nicholas the First or Gregory the Seventh, it would be the means of obtaining perpetual peace and conducting us back to the Golden Age.

But without going so far in their premises as the German philosopher, even those who are not Catholics and do not accept the infallibility of the Pope, can reasonably admit the historic validity of his claims to be a great world-umpire. As the ruler of millions—millions today unfortunately divided into opposing camps—by tradition, precedent and achievement, as the heir of the Leos, the Gregories and the Innocents, the Pope is essentially a peacemaker. One or two facts culled from history, and to which others will be added in a subsequent paper, will prove the assertion.

When the "palace" of the Popes was a crypt in the Catacombs, and their unvarying lot, persecution, imprisonment and martyrdom, their labors, confined to the spiritual interests of their flock, to the safeguarding of the deposit of faith, counted relatively little in the stirring events happening around them. But not a century and a half had elapsed after the Constantinian Peace had lifted the Church from the Catacombs and made her Pontiffs the peers of emperors, when in the middle of the fifth century, the first Leo, whom history has called the Great, twice proved that the Papacy stood for peace and could effectively enforce its claims. In 451 the Catalaunian fields in Gaul had witnessed one of the decisive battles of the world. Eastern barbarism and western civilization had been arrayed there against each other and the West had won. The Tartar hordes of Attila had met Rome's legions under Aëtius and Rome's Visigoth allies under Theodoric and Thorismond, and had been routed with frightful slaughter. Bayed at last, Attila turned back only to lead next year his hordes into Italy, on toward Rome. Verona, Concordia, Milan, Aquileia, Padua and Mantua, fell into the hands of the savage Mongols. The smoking ruins of camps, walled towns, cities, temples and churches everywhere marked their path. Thousands were driven into the fastnesses of the Apennines, or into the inaccessible fens and lagoons of the Adriatic, where they founded Venice. Rome was helpless before the invader. The citizens turned to Leo. The Pope, sometime before his election, had already acted as peacemaker between the two rival commanders in Gaul, Aëtius and Albinus. He was now to attempt a more difficult task. Accompanied by some of his priests, by the Consular Gennadius Avienus and the ex-Prefect Trigetius, he set out for Northern Italy, and met the Tartar King on the banks of the Mincio. Tradition and legend lifted almost to the dignity of history by the brush of Raphael in one of his stanze, recorded that as Leo pleaded for peace and for Rome, the Apostles Peter and Paul appeared to the terrified chieftain, thus giving a supernatural sanction to the Pontiff's prayers and warnings. Attila listened to the unarmed priest, and withdrew his disappointed squadrons beyond the Danube. It was the second time a Christian bishop had stayed Attila's sword. St. Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, had appealed to him, and Troyes had been spared. Attila exclaimed that he could conquer men, but Lupus and Leo, the Wolf and the Lion, were too much for him. Another victory was to crown Leo's work for peace and western civilization.

In the spring of 455 a fleet of Vandal warships, under Genseric, was ascending the Tiber. From their galleys the pirates could see a lifeless body slowly drifting down the stream and beating helplessly against their oars and the hulls of their ships. It was the corpse of the Roman Emperor Petronius Maximus, murdered by his rebellious subjects. A sad augury for the city which was again the prey of the barbarians. The man who had faced Attila was asked to appease Genseric. Leo met the Vandal King outside the Porta Portuensis, and though he could not turn him back, he won from him the promise that no blood would be shed nor the city set on fire. Robbery and plunder he could not avert. Yet though the sack lasted a fortnight and the Temple of Jove and the imperial residences were rifled of their treasures, the Basilicas of the Apostles were spared. A tribute, perhaps, of the Sea-king to the Pontiff, who alone had been man enough to face his wrath.

Vandal and Hun, Attila and Genseric had disappeared, a century and a half had nearly passed and Gregory the Great was seated on Leo's throne. Not a man of extensive learning or culture, not a philosopher or theologian with original views or a constructive system, he was a stout-hearted Roman, a keen-sighted, practical statesman, a saintly Pope, a born leader of men. By the nobility of his views, principles and life, and by actual benefits and services conferred, he made the Papacy a power in the Empire. When emperors and exarchs either could not or would not help the State, Gregory with Roman-like firmness and decision, assumed the initiative. While Romanus, Exarch of Ravenna, sulked in shameful inactivity in his fortress, the Lombards were constantly growing in power and threatening all Italy. They had formidable leaders in King Authari, in Agilulf, his successor, and in the Dukes Ariulf of Spoleto, and Arichis of Benevento. In the summer of 592, Ariulf was besieging Rome, Arichis marching upon Naples. Both cities were helpless and practically without efficient magistrates or garrison. On his own authority, Gregory made terms with the enemy, and Ariulf, calling off his bands, left Rome in peace. The Exarch Romanus now roused from his lethargy, marched to Rome, and cut off the two southern Lombard chiefs from King Agilulf. But in the spring of the following year the latter was encamped before the Eternal City, and soon from the walls, Gregory "saw Romans with ropes round their necks like dogs, being led away to be sold as slaves in Frank-land." But he was too much of a Roman to do nothing but wail. He saw the city practically unfortified, unprovisioned and unarmed. He knew that he alone could save it. The details of his meeting with Agilulf, recorded by the writer who continued the Chronicle of Prosper, may not all be historically correct, but certain it is, that persuaded by the prayers and maybe by the gifts of Gregory, the Lombard King raised the siege and departed northwards. Gregory knew that a lasting peace would not be granted until the Lombard Chiefs and the imperial authorities came to terms. And though the Emperor Maurice rudely upraided the Pontiff for what he considered his unwarranted interference in affairs of State, he could not prevent him from toiling for that peace for which Italy was sighing and which Gregory alone seemed able to secure. It was only on the death of Romanus and the appointment of the more farseeing and energetic exarch, Callinicus, that negotiations were begun with Agilulf and peace secured in 599. Two years after, the treachery of Callinicus caused the smouldering embers to blaze again. But the Lombards and Avars took Padua and defeated the exarch under the walls of Ravenna. Callinicus, recalled in disgrace, was succeeded by Smaragdus. Peace was at last secured. Gregory died in March, 604, while it still smiled upon the land. One of his last letters was to Queen Theodelinda, wife of Agilulf, requesting her to thank her husband for the peace and to urge him still more to spread its blessings.

Gregory was not a coward or sentimental pacifist. He saw Rome unprepared, and, while it could be done with honor, prevented bloodshed. He gave Rome peace. He saved it from intellectual darkness. The Lombards were uncultured and unlettered. Muratori speaks of their "ferocious ignorance"; Tiraboschi finds little or no evidence that they ever cultivated or fostered learning. Had they conquered, intellectual stagnation and decay would have everywhere prevailed. Gregory saved Rome, Italy and western civilization from that appalling doom.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

The Boys of Our City: Boston

PROBLEMS are a prominent characteristic of the modern world and every phase of life presents them. They are usually of man's own making; often they are the results of neglected or violated laws, they are the work of those who seem to feel that the laws of God are irksome. These problems confront us everywhere and require solution. Among them is the problem of the boy. Boys, especially the lads in cities and towns, need attention and care. The work done in the home must be reinforced if the vast and various inimical forces at work in society are adequately to be offset.

The boy is a man in the making, and any one with an ounce of common sense knows that there must be a logical connection between our idea of what he ought to be and the way in which we guide and care for him. Figs are not grown from thistles yet, notwithstanding the advance in horticulture. There are various types of boys and volumes have been written describing them and their particular psychology. No one admires a rowdy, polished or unpolished; no one in his senses wants his boys to emulate that civic scourge and social nuisance called the "practical" man, the self-seeker and opportunist, whose policy is governed not by an answer to the question, "Is it right?" but rather by the answer to the question: "What is there in it for me?"

The man should know the boy, for he was once a boy himself. But often he forgets that great fact too soon. He knows the world. He knows the ambitions and the needs of the boy, needs not realized by the boy himself. The man has the facts before him, and can, if he will, solve the difficulties. Reason and will must work together to bring about a condition of things that ought to be.

There is a class of normal boys, and the other class. There are fortunate, capable schoolboys, and there are delinquent boys. Now, as far as possible, every boy should have an opportunity to obtain an education that fits him for life. This is a truism, but, owing usually to our anti-Christian social and industrial conditions, many a lad must forego the aid that education brings with it. The State is doing much, but it is not concerned with a religious education, and of this I speak. Over and above this our boys need recreation, gymnastics, entertainments of different kinds, including lectures, and they should have them under Catholic auspices.

Few, perhaps, are the Catholic communities where nothing has been done for the boy, and I know that in Boston the activities in this regard cover a large and constantly growing field. The Working Boys' Home and the great Brothers' School, now moving to much enlarged quarters in Jamaica Plain, are well known. But in addition to these, various parishes have gathered their boys together in semi-military organizations, others have formed bands, Junior Holy Name societies, and various other organizations of lads.

Catholic evening schools are well under way, as may be seen from the splendid work done by the Young Men's Catholic Association evening classes with over 2,500 pupils, the largest number in the history of the Association. Then there are the evening schools under the auspices of St. Mary's Literary Union in Cambridge, with 1,500 pupils. In these schools the boy or young man may choose his course from a variety of subjects, ranging from elementary matters to Catholic philosophy.

On the other hand, the Catholic Charitable Bureau, headed by Father Scanlan, is doing splendid work in other directions. The bureau looks after delinquent boys or girls, and those who, because of the death of the father, are liable to be committed to State institutions. This commitment was the old traditional method of dealing with difficulties. Up to four years ago more than half of the thousand children annually committed to institutions in this State were Catholics. In Boston Catholics formed seventy-five per cent of those committed each year. During the past two years the figure has fallen below fifty per cent, and this fact has brought the Bureau's work strong praises from three Municipal Judges.

The work is performed under the patronage of Cardinal O'Connell by about eighteen visitors who do "protectorate" work so well that they succeed in preventing the commitment of many boys who otherwise would have become State wards simply because no one took interest in them. Family integrity is in this way preserved, and the widowed mother of children, aided by the Bureau, finds it possible to keep the children where they belong. This achievement is made possible by annual donations from the members of the various "Courts" of the Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters. In some cases, where it is necessary to find temporary protection for the boy, a Catholic home is provided until such time as he can be brought back; often the lad's relatives, or some other interested persons, help to pay part of his expenses. Last year $18,000 was spent in this way and of this amount sixty-nine per cent was paid by relatives. Otherwise the money would have been paid by the Church or the State. Strict watch is kept over each child, and pastors are notified of any change in residence. The Bureau thus furnishes children protection in temporary homes, prevents commitments, and is a center of general information. Last year it was used in one way or another by 14,000 persons.

The farm at Framingham, a large estate donated to charitable purposes by Mr. T. B. Fitzpatrick, K. S. G., is also a source of benefit not only to sick women and girls, but also during the summer to little boys who are given the privilege of life in the country for two weeks, coupled with the advantages of light class-work and setting-up exercises. These are a part of Boston's Catholic activities in behalf of the boy, and the work is growing rapidly. It is necessary.

Great Catholic social centers for our young men and boys are needed. I think that they are coming. Those not of our Faith have such institutions with schools, gymnasium, library, concert and lecture hall. Had we such halls we could fill them the moment they were erected. Having accomplished the apparently impossible already, we must go on and do more.

The boy must have protection in this manner; he must gradually learn the value of good training and education, and opportunity for healthy recreation is his right. The more we extend Christian influence in this world the less need we shall have for Juvenile Courts, and the better citizens shall we give to the State. The age is imaginatively riotous, but rather calm and quiescent intellectually. Therefore it is all the more necessary that the boy shall have true standards to guide him. He must be given the opportunity to learn and know the truth. And where can he obtain this except under Catholic auspices? The world cannot give him that which it does not possess, but it can and does give him much that must be counteracted. The boy who must go out into the world to fight his way during the years he should be spending in school under proper guidance, has a right to demand of his elders in the Faith some share of attention and assistance. His education, his recreation, all that is desirable or necessary for a boy along these lines should be taken care of by Catholics in the various cities and towns.

No chance to help the boy to help himself is so small that it may be safely neglected. Each in his own locality knows what is required and what can be done. When that much is accomplished, Catholics of the community may feel they have done all that can be expected of them. No man is too great to interest himself in the work and no one is too humble or too weak to neglect it. We may not be answerable for the welfare of all mankind, but we are responsible for the welfare of the boys around us.

Charles E. Fay.

Suggestion in Youth

MUCH insistence is laid at the present time on the necessity of giving children and young folk information with regard to various sorts of dangers. The purpose of such instruction is to furnish a deterrent. But the effect of such warnings is very often the contrary of what is hoped for. This is precisely what should be expected. The practice, so widely advocated, does not take into consideration the power of suggestion, it fails to take into account the psychological fact that once an idea has got into the mind it has a tendency, especially in young persons, to work itself out in action of some kind or other. Action is the rule in childhood; children always want to be doing things, and they are prone to do whatever occurs to them. It is only later on in life that people think before they act, and even in mature years reflection before action is not always the rule. Indeed, we are all only children of a larger growth with regard to many suggestions.

Advertisers know this very well. The United States postal authorities announce that probably over $30,000,000 are sent through the mails every year to strangers on the strength of advertisements, not a cent of which will ever come back to the incautious investors. It takes today ten times as much patent medicine, the cost of which runs into millions, to satisfy the craving of our people for drugs, as it did when we had only half of our present population. Advertising experts know how to suggest the necessity for medicine, most of which is harmful and nearly all of which is quite useless. An idea need not be reasonable in order to influence conduct; all that is necessary is that somehow it should come home to the mind and, consciously or unconsciously, it will have its effect. We are all much more susceptible to suggestion than we like to admit. A few instances will illustrate my meaning.

Not long ago I was asked to see a little girl in order to help her in the correction of a habit, which the mother was sure represented something pathological on the part of the child. On three different occasions within a single month a specialist had to be called to remove a pea from the child's nose. In order to get at the source of the trouble I asked how the child had come to form this habit, and the mother told me very frankly that having heard of children putting peas in the nose and ears, she had warned her child against the practice. The precious darling, who was three and a half years old, was so struck by the warning that before the day was over, a pea was firmly wedged in one of her nostrils.

Sometimes children will do the most curious things in imitation of their elders and particularly of a favorite parent. A little boy who was brought to my notice set up a rather severe irritation by stuffing paper wads into his nose. Inquiry showed that his father, whom the little boy almost worshiped, had come home a few days before, after having had an operation performed on his nose, with a pledget of absorbent cotton still in place. Several times during the evening this had to be removed and replaced by a fresh piece of cotton dipped in an unguent. The little boy followed these manipulations with deepest attention. The next day, as no cotton was available, he chewed some paper and inserted that into his nostrils. Forty-eight hours later there was a focus of inflammatory irritation which caused a fever that lasted for several days and left a rather serious condition in the nostrils for some time.

These children were under seven years of age, but the influence of suggestion is equally strong in those who have reached the age of reason. A short time ago a mother read that some children, while playing with matches, had set fire to themselves, with the result that two of them had been fatally burned. The very thought of the accident so disturbed her that she told the story to her boy, who was between seven and eight years old, and to his little sister, aged five; she then warned them both not to play with matches. She had never seen them interested in this form of play, and indeed the matches were kept on the mantelpiece out of their sight and reach. Shortly afterwards, on returning after a brief absence, many ends of burnt matches showed her that the suggestion had had its effect. The matches had to be put away under lock and key after that. The boy was a bright little fellow, with abundance of time on his hands, and the match idea strongly suggested and re-suggested itself to him until it worked out in action.

Suggestion plays a very large rôle in the lives of young folk between the years of nine and thirteen. The reading of cheap novels will arm boys with wooden daggers and bows and arrows. Stories of bandits who live in caves will lead lads to band together and find or make an opening in the hillside. Over and over again it has been noted that exhibitions of moving-pictures representing "pick-pocketing" and sneak-thievery are followed in certain city districts by arrests for crimes, like those depicted, of boys and even girls between the ages of nine and thirteen years. It makes no difference that the punishment for the crime is also exhibited. The countervailing deterrent effect produced by the sight of the punishment is not equal to the attraction exercised by the suggestion.

About the age of fourteen a whole new field of ideas comes to young folk with the development of sex. It is sometimes presumed that children of this age have sense enough to derive profit from warnings. Personally I find it very hard to understand how any one can have such an impression. Sexual suggestion makes a powerful appeal to a side of human nature that is very difficult to control. The cultivation of the contrary virtues and the strength of will developed by self-denial and mortification help toward this control; but warnings, especially if frequently repeated, not only will defeat their own purpose, but prove positively harmful. The more emphatic the warnings, the stronger is the suggestion that self-restraint in such matters can scarcely be expected of the young. The attitude of mind, thus formed, is likely to be that which was expressed in the words of a girl, who replied, when asked what a temptation was, "It is something you yield to." Unfortunately, sexual suggestion today flows in upon the children from many sources. The newspapers revel in sex-stories, the magazines that circulate most freely among young folk are full of sex-tales, most of them written with the deliberate purpose of attracting the young by this very means. The theater has become a sink of sex-suggestion. I would plead that at least the older people whom the child loves and respects shall not also lend themselves to this horrible campaign.

What then is to be done to guard children against sins of the flesh? I have heard a good many people say that it is only in recent years that the world has awakened to this danger and proceeded to take measures against it. I have heard even Catholics remark that they were surprised that the Church does not do more to protect children. But the fact is, that in this, as in every other moral problem, the Church took the matter in hand long ago, and has provided the very best possible means for the instruction and the protection of youth. Any Catholic who consults his own experience, realizes the salutary influence of confession. If parents will only be sure that their children have a good confessor and go to confession regularly, they will provide their children with the best possible safeguard. Confession is the most wonderful psychological instrument ever fashioned. In France, where education is being secularized, they are suggesting that teachers take the part of directors of conscience in this matter and secure the confidence of pupils. It is easy to understand what a joke that might be for some teachers. But in sacramental confession, individual instruction and warnings, in keeping with already acquired knowledge, are given under the most impressive circumstances by one who is thoroughly respected and is known to have the soul's best interests at heart. Confession gives the help that is needed, just at the moment when it is necessary, and religious motives make contrary suggestions strong enough to be of real help, but no mere reasoning or human motives will afford adequate protection against the flood of unfortunate suggestion that deluges modern life.

James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.

Easter Laughter

Risus paschalis, this was the term applied in medieval times to the mirth which the preacher was wont to evoke on Easter morning with tales of the devil's ludicrous attempts to keep locked the gates of hell against Him who had that day taken away the sting of death and robbed the grave of its victory. In certain French towns the people danced in church to the strains of the Victimæ Paschali, and elsewhere priests and people played at handball, in symbol of the Paschal leaping of the sun for joy. Doubtless some such impulse to "play before the Lord" inspired the fantastic herring procession at Reims. The customs were local, and like others similar, such as the feasts of asses and of fools, led to abuses which resulted in Papal edicts of prohibition. But abuses though they became, they were all a part of the overwhelming logic of the Ages of Faith. It is not a mistake to jump at conclusions when that is at once the quickest and most logical way of reaching them. So, likewise, when the Flemish and Florentine painters introduced themselves and their familiar friends into the most intimate scenes of the life of the Holy Family, it was not through mere naïveté or a desire to intrude where they had no concern, for in a very real sense they were present at the Annunciation, at the Nativity and at the Crucifixion, and it was a matter of as much importance to Domenico Bigordi as to St. Peter or St. John that Christ was risen as He said.

Laughter is at once the most Christian and the most logical thing in the world. A person may conceivably weep for joy, but laughter was never meant to be the language of despair. And so when Pater speaks of "a larger spiritual capacity and a larger capacity for melancholy," as though the one argued the necessity of the other, he is reading into Christianity something of that wistful sadness which he has made so attractive in depicting the higher type of pagan. But the one thing which Christianity did not borrow from paganism was the latter's melancholy. It took over its festivals of joy and sanctified them, but the lamentations for Tammuz and Baldur and Adonis were suffered to become echoes and nothingness around "the old gods' untended altars." The Christian religion took the pride out of stoicism and gave us asceticism; it took away the reproach from poverty and gave us the virtue of charity; it took the sting out of pagan mirth and gave us the "giant laughter of Christian men," of which Mr. Chesterton writes, the laughter based on "the clock gone wrong and the world gone right." For even as the Lady Poverty ascended the Cross with Christ on Calvary, so was the Spirit of Joy born into the world with Him on Christmas Day. Then for the first time fools and children came into their heritage and the motley was recognized as the livery of the Kingdom of Heaven. "I dearly love a fool," says Charles Lamb, and when he writes in praise of the "darlings of absurdity" it is because he discerns the heavenly lineage of simplicity, whether of mind or manners, thus displaying that Catholic intuition which has entitled him to be called "Saint Charles." This discernment has always been a characteristic of the Celtic race, among whom the "innocents," whether of Irish or Breton villages, have always enjoyed a place of privilege. "There be's luck on a fool," is the way they put it in Connaught, and the very term Chrétien comes down to us from the ages of faith and logic as a specific name for a fool.

It was Christianity which first allied good cheer and righteousness. When Mr. Belloc says "We laughers have a gross cousinship with the Most High," he falls short of the truth, for the relationship is very close indeed. But opposed to the Catholic doctrine of laughter, there arose malignant heresy which made a religion of gloom and dared to teach that although Christ be risen again we are of all men most miserable. This it was which blasted the genial wit of the author of "John Gilpin," until he could describe himself with more or less accuracy as "rising like an infernal frog out of Acheron, covered with the mud and ooze of melancholy." George Borrow had in him the makings of a lusty Catholic humor, but it was crushed in the grip of the Fear.

But who ever saw a melancholy saint or a sad martyr? "See," cried the citizens of Elizabethan London, pointing to the company passing under Newgate arch, "see, they're laughing; they do not care for death." And indeed they did not. No more did Sabina, convulsed with merriment on her way to trial, nor Hermes, beguiling the way with jests. No more did Lawrence, calling out from his gridiron: "Turn me over; I'm cooked on this side." It was solicitude for those who had fallen into heresy which caused Father Roberts to inquire on the eve of "his day" whether he might not be giving disedification by his "great glee." But gallant Campion, "the chief pearl of Christendom," had no such misgivings, while the "laughing martyrdom" of Blessed Thomas More was but the fitting crown of a life which had well deserved the punning dedication of Erasmus's "Praise of Folly."

These were they whom Crashaw calls "ripe men of martyrdom," who, in their eagerness to die seem to verge perilously close to that "fiery daring" which St. Thomas condemns, calling it, by the way, a characteristic of the Celts. But smiles and sanctity have been conjoined in a goodly company of men and women who ran a longer race. What a sorry spectacle is Marcus Aurelius, even when Pater has done his best for him, "a pygmy soul, dragging a dead body to the grave," or Amiel with his everlasting wavering between languor and ennui, beside level-headed, great-hearted, witty-tongued Teresa of Jesus, who was intolerant of only two things, heresy and melancholy; besides Mechtilde of Magdeburg, whom Miss Underhill refers to as "the sunshiny Saint"; beside Catherine of Siena, "full of laughter in the Lord"; beside Philip Neri, whom Goethe calls der humoristische Heilige. Good laughers, all of these, and the well-springs of their mirth were the Five Wounds made glorious on the first Easter. For the only genuine laughter in this world is "Easter laughter," the laughter which began among the wondering shepherds on the hillside at Bethlehem and has gone on increasing in volume until it cracks its sides in the O felix culpa and skips to the lilting measures of O filii et filiæ.

B. M. Kelly.

Ratan Devi: an Impression

THE curtain went up slowly and showed the dimly-lighted stage. At the back hung curtains of a peculiar green color, on the floor were two vases with poinsettias, and an Indian rug. From two braziers that stood on the floor of the stage whisps of incense smoke floated heavily and languidly toward the audience. Then the curtains at the back of the stage parted and Ratan Devi came in, silently, demurely, with her eyes cast down, and about her that eternal imperturbability which in the West is one of the attributes of the enclosed nun; she sat down on the floor of the stage and remained motionless and absorbed for a few seconds.

Ratan Devi was dressed in native Hindu costume. Soft, filmy draperies of every color, which by a singular process of subordination are toned down to no color. There is a subtle mysticism in this Oriental coloring which seizes upon every color of the rainbow, but yet blends them in such a manner as to convey to the imagination that there is no color at all; an absorption of the individuality of each in the impersonal individuality of the whole, which is one of the fundamental teachings of Oriental philosophy and religion.

She took up the tambura, a native instrument of the mandolin type but considerably larger, having four strings, which are tuned to the tonic, the perfect fifth, and the upper and lower octaves. As Ratan Devi plucked at the strings there came a soft low droning, vibrant with subdued emotion, that caught up the imagination and carried it to a world of mystery, of white halls and cool porches, of the heavy shade of trees and of silent fields, of lonely villages, of starry nights and immeasurable space, of a world where nature is tremendously aloof and yet intensely intimate. And then Ratan Devi sang, and into this mystery world there poured a flood of almost blinding light from the full Indian moon, or the fierce noonday sun casting its heavy shadows. And in the stillness of this intense light and shade a New York audience sat breathless and silent.

To ears accustomed to the modern chromatic scale of thirteen notes to the octave, there is something melancholy in the intervals of the Indian scale, which has twenty-two notes. This is perhaps due to the absence of a sense of that finality which seems an inevitable part of the modern scale. The Indian songs have no accompaniment, strictly so-called; the tambura continuously repeats the same buzzing, droning concord with its over-tones, and this is merely a delicate background that floats about the melody like a filmy cloud, at times almost imperceptible, and again moving into the tone picture like a little cloud across a summer sky.

The raga or art-song of India is not a species of entertainment. Its purpose is to express the voice of the Hindu gods to the people, and so the office of the singer is almost prophetical, and his or her personality is reduced nearly to vanishing point; thus the influence of an Indian raga is in the form of a direct appeal to the spiritual emotion of the listener. This lack of a sense of finality which the classical music of India exhibits is also a feature of the ecclesiastical modes, and like these modes, the ragas express moods. But there is an inseparable gulf between the moods expressed by the Indian music and the eight modes of the Catholic Church. There is in the former a sense of vast loneliness, of wandering through the aisles of unendurable space, that has not the feeling of ultimate realization to be found in the chant of Requiescant in pace which is sung at the end of a requiem Mass, a mood that expresses profound sorrow but also eternal hope.

But the consummate artistry of Ratan Devi, the remarkable flexibility of her voice, with its subtle blending of light and shade, are not, after all, the main things. The singer of the ragas, Dr. Coomaraswamy pointed out, is of little consequence, the words themselves do not matter so much, as they may be from an ancient or a modern poem, but the thing of prime importance is the music which is the vehicle of some spiritual emotion. And although this spiritual emotion is not a Christian expression, it is at times a reflection of spiritual conditions that are fundamental in the soul of every man and so have that poignancy and flavor which are the very essence of poetry. It is not a pandering to a languid estheticism, nor the arousing of turbulent passions, which are commonly thought to be an attribute of everything that is Eastern.

As Ratan Devi sat and sang four ragas, she closed her eyes, her body swayed back and forth to an irregular rhythm, and with her left hand she made incessant slight gestures that were in keeping with the unbarred flow of the Indian melody. As her voice rose to a noble exaltation or died away to an almost subdued whisper, as she voiced the poetry of song, and rhythmically expressed the poetry of motion, she personified that inscrutable mystery of the East, which is inscrutable only because material values have largely taken the place of spiritual values. The impression of these songs—and because they are sung in an utterly unknown language this impression is of a high spiritual value—is that of a house that is very quiet, whose shutters are pulled down tight, but within which there is a tremendous activity. Or again, they typify in a slight degree something of the inner meaning of St. John of the Cross's poem, "In a Dark Night." Here we see perhaps the great difference between East and West: for the East knows what it does know, and looks out unperturbed on the world; and the West knows—just what happens to be the current thought of the hour.

This fundamental spiritual disagreement, for it is fundamentally that, between East and West, did not always exist to the same degree. The pre-Reformation religious poetry of England, says Dr. Coomaraswamy, who is the husband of Madame Ratan Devi, was thoroughly Oriental in that it reflected the soul of the people, and this characteristic he finds to a large extent in the fragment of folk-song that remains. But individualism in poetry has driven out the expression of a people's soul in the West, and made it less and less a part of the common experience.

I had expected to find in the Indian ragas some likeness to the ecclesiastical melodies. But these native airs are in some cases some hundreds of years older than the Christian religion, and so are founded upon a different notation. There is in the love song Kauna jatana a recurring refrain which is identical with the opening phrase of Virgo Dei Genetrix, a twelfth century ecclesiastical melody adapted from an older folk-tune.

The Kashmiri folk-songs are of a totally different texture. They are not exclusive as are the ragas; they are a spontaneous expression, whereas the classical songs have a particular function.

The folk-songs are sung unaccompanied, without even the mystic drone of the tambura, and are founded on a different melodic scale. They are brief glad snatches of sunshine, of flowers, and of the laughter of simple folk. The cultivated art of the skilled musician gives place to the unrestrained utterance of the people as they sit under the trees, or wander among the flowers in their native woods.

There is an immediate sympathy between the folk-songs of the East and those of the West, and many of them are not unlike the medieval ditties that may be found in the collection entitled Piæ Cantiones; most striking of all is an apparent affinity between these Kashmiri songs of the peasants and the native airs of Ireland and Wales.

The interest which the Indian music of Ratan Devi has aroused is significant of two things. It shows first of all that the Western mind has not become too dulled to recognize the value of music that is based on purely spiritual expression, apart from the emotional values of tone coloring. It also shows what an appalling degree of ignorance exists among the majority of musicians, to whom the medieval music is merely a relic of barbarism. After all, the Indian music perhaps suits best the spiritual consciousness of the Hindus; but it is not at all impossible that some of those who feel the charm of this Indian music will feel the greater charm of the ancient plain chant, which has spiritual values that are both positive and Christian; which expresses the soul of a people as an emotion of pure worship, and fulfils the highest function of music. Henry C. Watts.

A Lay Apostle of the Faith

IT has been truly said that in the modern world the Church needs laymen as well as priests for her apostles. With those outside the Church the testimony and example of an earnest Catholic layman is often more effective than that of a priest. The layman they regard as a more unprejudiced witness, one of themselves and more likely to understand their point of view. If the layman, moreover, has given proof in his ordinary work of mental power and practical capacity, the testimony he bears to his Faith is all the more telling.

Such a man was the late Lister Maurice Drummond, a lay-apostle of the Faith, who in life did great things for the Church and whose noble work lives after him. He was the son of Mr. Maurice Drummond, C.B., a member of an old banking family, and of the Honorable Adelaide Drummond. On the father's side he was descended from one of the Jacobite leaders, Lord Strathallan, who was killed at Culloden in the rising of 1745, and on the mother's side he was the grandson of the second Lord Ribblesdale.

In 1875, Mr. Drummond at nineteen entered the Church, and from the day of his conversion work for its interests became the ideal of his life. Called to the bar at twenty-three, he soon made his mark as a barrister, receiving a series of appointments which showed an early and continuous recognition of his professional ability. His success was all the more remarkable because he never used political activity and influence as an aid to his career at the bar. In 1892 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the grievances of the evicted tenants in Ireland. The Commission sat in Dublin and Drummond was appointed its secretary. It was Lister Drummond's business to arrange that both the landlords' and the tenants' witnesses should be called, a record of the proceedings kept day by day, and the Commissioners' report put into form for publication as an official document. Needless to say, he acted with judicial fairness in all these proceedings, but his personal sympathies were strongly on the side of the poor people whose cause the report of the Commissioners very effectually championed. The landlord party, no doubt, expected that they would find in the English barrister, with his aristocratic family connections, a partisan of their side, but in this they were disappointed. He held the balance even. He took care that representatives of the tenants, men who had themselves been evicted, were able to give their testimony, and on the other side some of the leading landlords were called. Probably the most effective witness on the tenants' side was one of the landlords themselves, Lord Clanricarde, a man whose name was known in Ireland as that of a typically harsh and tyrannical land-owner. Clanricarde's statement of his case proved most damaging to the class he represented.

In the following extract from a letter written by Mr. Drummond's mother we have a glimpse of her son's work at the Commission, and we see how strongly her own sympathies were on the side of the poor peasant farmers:

> He loves the tenants who come to give evidence and says they are so intelligent, often so well-educated, so well up in all the questions of the day, that it is difficult to conceive how they can be treated as they have been. The hardships of those who belong to these estates are shocking. As dear papa once said of another matter, they are horrible and heart-rending. The estates have been the battleground between the Plan-of-Campaigners and the Syndicate-of-Landlords. But here comes the fact that bewilders me. These very intelligent people seem to put themselves in the first instance into positions which no Englishman or Scotchman would accept for a moment. Speaking of the Clongary estate, one of the landlord papers mentioned, as a matter of course, that part of the land being bog it had been given gratis to the tenant, and that when he had reclaimed it twelve shillings an acre was charged in rent. What sort of a bargain is that? Is not that a nice way of getting your worthless land reclaimed free of expense to yourself and made a source of income to you for ever?

After his work in Dublin, Mr. Drummond returned to England. On two occasions he was appointed as the Commissioner who tried the question of a petition to Parliament against the return of a member. Three years ago Mr. Drummond was appointed for life one of the London magistrates, a position of considerable responsibility. On the bench he was noted for the anxiety he always showed to secure fair-play for the prisoner, often an uneducated man, too nervous and embarrassed to state his own case properly, and in numbers of instances he helped to start in life again those whom he had sentenced to prison.

Something must now be said of the private activities to which all of Mr. Drummond's spare time was devoted. Father Philip Fletcher, a converted Anglican clergyman, had founded an association to secure united prayer for the return of England to the Catholic Faith. Mr. Drummond suggested that the scope of the Association should be extended, and should include an active work of propaganda besides prayer. One day in 1887 a meeting was held at Drummond's rooms in London, and there the "Gild of Our Lady of Ransom" was founded. Under its auspices new methods of propaganda were introduced into the Catholic life of England. Public pilgrimages were made to sanctuaries like the scene of the martyrdom of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, the shrine of St. Edward the Confessor at Westminster, the site of the Tyburn gallows in West London, and of the other Tyburn outside the walls of York, where so many of the northern martyrs suffered. Then came the public processions which are now a picturesque feature of the life of London on every Sunday in the summer months. They are processions of prayer and are made up of the Catholic associations of the parish, religious sisterhoods, priests in their vestments and thousands of men and women who march with religious banners displayed, and behind a large crucifix, hymns being sung and prayers being recited all along the route. When an attempt was made to represent these processions as illegal, it was Drummond who effectively used his legal knowledge to state the Catholic case to the authorities. As a consequence of his pleadings, the "Ransom processions" have never been interfered with.

Another method of propaganda, which has been continued with good results for more than twenty years, is that of open-air lectures in the parks and other public places, where crowds gather every Sunday afternoon, ready to listen to anyone who will address them. Mr. Drummond was one of the first laymen to inaugurate this lecture campaign. He frequently spoke in Hyde Park and always had an attentive audience, for his pleasant, persuasive manner made all he said interesting. Part of the time was devoted to answering questions and meeting objections and he was particularly happy in this kind of work. His well-trained legal mind and his readiness of reply enabled him to conciliate the objector and make his answer a lucid explanation of some point of Catholic doctrine or practice misunderstood by Protestants.

But his work for the Gild of Ransom was only one of his many activities. For several years he was a member of the Committee of the Catholic Truth Society; for four years he was chairman of the Council of the Catholic Federation in the diocese of Westminster, and he was one of the active promoters and directors of the clubs for Catholic sailors in East and West London. Incidentally he found time for considerable journalistic work, contributing to various Catholic papers, and he was the author of several pamphlets published in the Catholic Truth Society's series. The wonder is how he found time to do so much. Hardly a Catholic meeting was held in London at which he was not present and he carried on an extensive correspondence with Protestants who were thinking of entering the Church and with converts whom he had guided into it.

His last letter was a note sent to a Catholic meeting regretting that he could not be present, because he was laid up with a cold. But the illness proved to be more serious than he expected, and a week later he died. It was a Sunday afternoon and that morning he had asked for his Missal, remarking that as he could not go to Mass, he must try to attend it in spirit. He had attended his last Mass. The record of the work he has done is Mr. Drummond's best eulogy. We need more sturdy laymen like him.

A. Hilliard Atteridge.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

A Proselyting Scheme

To the Editor of America:

Recently many Catholics in the United States have been deceived and many more are likely to be deceived into contributing money toward a scheme that is apparently a work of true charity, but in reality is a systematic attempt to rob French Catholic children of the Faith. Here are the facts of the case: Certain ladies are soliciting contributions to a fund that is to be devoted to the care of the children of France, that have been rendered fatherless by the war. Every one who gives the sum of $36.50 becomes the patron of a special child and acquires the privilege of following the course of its upbringing. Recommendations of the project were obtained months ago, when the scheme had not yet developed a decidedly infidel character, from some of the high dignitaries of the Church in the United States. Since that time an entirely new complexion has been given to the whole matter. Last month Léon Bourgeois brought his bill before the French Parliament, with the consequence that the education of the children is to be controlled by the French Government.

Prospective contributors are assured that the children are to be brought up in their parents' religion, but the fact is that they are to be brought up in the école laïque, which naturally leads to atheism. "The Fatherless Children of France" makes an appeal that is hard to resist, but Catholics may be certain that in giving money to this organization they are directly contributing to the destruction of the children's faith. There are laudable charities in plenty to satisfy Catholic women's yearning to soften the lot of the war orphans, without their joining the avowed enemies of Christ, and helping to rob helpless children of their greatest treasure.

I think the readers of America should be warned of this anti-Catholic propaganda. The serpent's tail is easily discernible in the fact that it has as its sponsors President Poincaré and the Presidents of both the French Chambers. M. Poincaré is an avowed infidel. During the entire war he has never attended any of the numerous religious manifestations organized by French Catholics; nor has he once mentioned the name of God in any of his public utterances. The character of the Presidents of the French Chambers is best described by stating that it was under their auspices that the laws framed for the purpose of making infidels of the French children were enacted. A further proof of the nefarious purpose of the plan is the prohibition against assisting the enterprise that has been addressed to French Catholics by Cardinal Sevin, Archbishop of Lyons. Another indication of its nature is the fact that the officers of the American Branch of the association are all non-Catholics, and many of the members of the numerous committees, now engaged in soliciting money in many cities, are decidedly agnostic in their attitude toward religion.

The whole organization is a monstrous, false pretense; and through it the Grand Orient will probably secure a million francs or more for the perversion of the souls of French children, partly through the contributions of ill-informed Catholics. Let our Catholics, therefore, shun all forms of charity under the patronage of the infidel government of France or the exclusive management of non-Catholics. In the latter case, Catholics will be discriminated against; in the former, their charity will assist and abet an infamous form of proselytism.

New York City. J. L. M.

Mixed Marriages

To the Editor of America:

It is interesting to note how, from time to time, Protestants of various denominations work round to the Catholic position. The following letter from a Scotch Protestant journal regarding the engagement of a converted believer, a sister in the faith, to an unconverted unbeliever, puts a part if not the whole of the Catholic position on mixed marriages in a very satisfactory way:

MARRIAGE IN THE LORD

To the Editor of The Witness:

With reference to what a sister should do who finds herself engaged to a man who is not a Christian, surely Answer C, in advising that, should the unconverted man (after explanation, argument, and pleading being of no avail) insist, she should marry him, overlooks the teaching of the Word of God in 2 Corinthians 6. 14-18: "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." Evidently at Corinth such unequal yokes were existing, so the plain and definite command in verse 17 is: "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord," not engaged, far less married. Amos 3. 3 says: "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" Were these two to marry, both would be committed to a life of unhappiness. It is also a solemn fact that frequently in such circumstances the believing wife or husband, for the sake of peace and harmony in the home, has drifted into forsaking any profession of Christ at all.

Answer A advises that the engagement be continued for a time in the hope of winning the unconverted man, but I submit that 2 Corinthians 6. 14-18 forbids this also. Any engagement should cease, although the sister might agree to hold herself free from any other engagement for a period of, say, a year, and, if the unbeliever should be truly born again in that time, be willing to renew the engagement if he should wish. Nor should they meanwhile see much of each other, for he would probably try to persuade her to marry him as he is, and she might eventually yield, with God-dishonouring and disastrous results.

It may be argued that it would be sin to break one's promise, but if through folly, carelessness, or ignorance a wrong promise has been made to do that which is clearly forbidden by God, the course is to humbly, penitently, and frankly explain fully why the engagement cannot be continued, and ask the pardon of the unconverted man for any pain and disappointment caused him.

Matthew 21. 29 is a case of a wrong promise not kept but rightly broken. It is never right to do a second wrong in continuance of a first. James E. Bevan, Birkenhead.

If the writer had added the likelihood of the children growing up without faith, the letter would have left little to be desired on the subject.

New York. H. C. Watts.

Correct Ecclesiastical Titles

To the Editor of America:

The "A. P. F. of the 'rollicking' style" who asserts, in America for April 15, that "Cardinal Henry Edward Manning was also responsible for the introduction into English of the term 'Father' as applied to secular priests" must have no Irish blood in his veins. That great section at least of the Church's millions, which has adopted "Here's a Health to You, Father O'Flynn," as a national lyric, would hardly have accepted the common appellation of their sagart aroon from a sasanagh icicle. Has "A. P. F." never heard of Father Prout of Watergrass Hill, County Cork, who attained immortality of fame as early as 1834? Or did he ever read that interesting Catholic story "Father Rowland," which Dr. Pise wrote in 1829, and which several generations here have since accepted with delight? These dates fairly anticipate the era when Henry Edward, by the grace of God and favor of the Holy See, became Archbishop of Westminster. They are offered along with America's popular Horatian argument for the jus et norma loquendi, as indicating that "A. P. F." will have to guess again as to when the use of the title "Father" began.

Brooklyn. T. F. M.

A Correction

To the Editor of America:

I made a hasty error in speaking of Wilfrid Ward's discourse before "the Metaphysical Society" as being "too turgid for popular consumption." I should have said "the Synthetical Society." The Metaphysical, in which W. G. Ward was interested, ceased to exist about 1880, if I am not mistaken.

I have received several letters asking me about the story I related concerning Manning's remarks about Newman. Several correspondents tell me they cannot find the story in Mr. J. E. C. Bodley's essay on Manning to which I referred. I fear that a certain ambiguity of phrase led to this misunderstanding. I did not intend to give the impression that this particular tale appeared in Mr. Bodley's essay. In that curious critique the author does give hints and even suggests in detail similar remarks of Cardinal Manning's. The story that I told has never, I am quite sure, appeared in print before. It is, however, an absolutely true one word for word. I would take this opportunity of saying to certain correspondents that I regret I cannot give the source from which I obtained it.

New York. Louis H. Wetmore.

The Shakespeare Tercentenary

To the Editor of America:

The English-speaking world at the present time is flooded with articles dealing with every phase and aspect of Shakespeare's many-sided genius, but, as far as the writer has been able to discover, in all this vast mass of contributions, original and otherwise, no reference has been made to one of the best, most critical, concise and analytical appreciations of the man ever written. I refer to the lecture which was to have been delivered at Stratford-on-Avon, during the celebration, in April, 1866, of the tercentenary of the birth of Shakespeare. The distinguished scholar and ecclesiastic, Nicholas Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop of Westminster, was the man chosen to deliver this address. How great was the compliment implied in his selection can be appreciated by those who have any knowledge of the circumstances attending the reestablishment of the Catholic Hierarchy in England, almost three centuries after the exercise of full Apostolical rights had ceased in that country. What a storm of bigotry and bitter opposition was aroused in England when Cardinal Wiseman arrived in London, in November, 1850, as the head of the reestablished Hierarchy is a commonplace of the history of the period and has been well described by the late Wilfrid Ward, in his very excellent "Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman."

Bitter hatred for Catholics, and especially for Cardinal Wiseman, was rife in Great Britain only a few years before the Shakespearean centenary; yet, so completely had the Cardinal won over the enlightened non-Catholic element, that the Tercentenary Shakespeare Committee, representing the United Kingdom, voted that he be selected to deliver the address during the celebration. The Cardinal accepted the invitation, and prepared notes for the lecture. But before the day set for the address arrived he had passed to his reward. As a tribute to his memory, Doctor, subsequently Cardinal, Manning, in collaboration with another clergyman, edited his notes and had them published in book form. Though comparatively brief, they are very comprehensive in range; for they discuss the genius of Shakespeare with its wonderful grasp of human passions, ambitions, feelings, aspirations and desires; they also assign to each of the principal characters its place in the great scheme designed by the master-dramatist. At the same time they testify to the Cardinal's force of mind and his nice powers of discrimination. The notes deserve to be better known, not only by Catholics, but by all who are interested in Shakespeare.

Oakland, Cal. Thomas F. Marshall.

German Grammar

To the Editor of America:

Replying to S. M. S.'s query in the latest issue of America, as to whether we shall say "Four times three is twelve" or "Four times three are twelve," you cite among other languages the German as favoring the plural instead of the singular. This is incorrect, as the German, in this case, uses the singular only; for example: Vier mal drei macht (or ist) zwölf, never machen or sind.

New York. Francis M. Schirp, ph.d.

[On page 110 of the twentieth edition of his "German Conversation Grammar," Dr. Emil Otto, sometime professor of modern languages in the University of Heidelberg, gives the following sentences to be translated into English: Vier mal 8 sind 32: Sieben mal 9 sind 63: Einundzwanzig mal 32 sind 672. As an exercise of translation into German he gives the following: Three times 9 make (machen) 27. By inserting machen in a parenthesis he takes special pains to insist on its use in preference to the use of macht. Moreover, Joynes and Wesselhoeft in their "German Lesson Grammar" (D. C. Heath & Co., 1910) write: Wie viel sind sechs mal zwölf? . . . Sechs mal zwölf sind doch zwei und siebzig. (p. 25) Finally the use of machen and sind, in the collocation to which Dr. Schirp takes exception, is common in conversation both in Austria and Germany.—Ed. America.]

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, Richard H. Tierney; Secretary, Joseph Husslein;
Treasurer, John D. Wheeler.

Subscriptions, Postpaid:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
The America Press, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
cable address: cathreview

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"Personal, Practical Work"

IN a city of the Southwest is a Catholic lawyer who, in the press of many professional duties, has never forgotten that he is a Catholic. For the last decade he has been fighting, almost alone at times, the battle against improper plays and films. That his city is now fairly free, at least in comparison with the majority of large cities, from these "public incitements to vice," is due in great part to his realization of the value of "personal, practical work." It does little good to shake one's head over the degeneracy of the times. If Catholics are to do their part in purifying the community, they must be prepared to act, to act vigorously, and to act in the face of very bitter and determined opposition.

To what degree Catholics seem ready to act, is manifest from a letter written by the Catholic lawyer to whom reference has been made. "It seems to me," he writes, "that now is a good time to call attention to the fact that Catholics are too ready to shirk personal, practical work."

> That, out of the entire country, no representative of any Catholic society appeared before the Committee on Education of the lower House, in the hearings on the Federal Motion Picture Commission Bill, I regard as an absolute disgrace. There is no need to discuss here the reasons for our shameful inactivity. But I am profoundly convinced that there must be a close cooperation between our many Catholic societies, based upon Catholic principles and a real endeavor to sustain Christian ideals. At present nearly everything is "let go." It is fearful, too, but it is a fact, to think that in many cities where the Catholic population is large, New York, for instance, there is very little cooperation for the purpose of saving the community from the interests that make money by providing questionable or even absolutely immoral entertainments. It is discouraging to be told, "Well, in this city, or that, the Catholics made no protest against this film or play," and more than discouraging to discover that the questionable entertainment has even been approved by "Catholics of prominence." If this matter were handled at the point of origin, the rest of the country would not be swamped by the rottenness that comes from New York with the approval of decadent Broadway.

This puts the case exactly. That immorality on the stage is now exploited on a commercial basis, is an undeniable fact. That Catholics should unite to check and destroy, if possible, this nefarious business, which bids fair to ruin the youth of the country, is plain. That they are not so uniting, is equally plain. What they can and will do in the future, depends upon their practical interest, both as individuals and as members of the Catholic societies, in this sorely-needed work of social reform. Of course, Judas has many representatives in the Catholic body; and the weak-kneed, "broad-minded" Catholic, eager to sell his worthless soul for money, for social distinction, or for political power, must be calmly reckoned with for what he is, a scandal and a hindrance, not a help. But the vast majority of Catholics, men and women sound in faith and in morals, are eager to follow a leader in the campaign against public vice, all the more dangerous because clothed, at times, with seeming respectability.

Is that leader among us? Can the Catholic societies which are to meet within the next few months discover him, or in his absence, prescribe a policy of "personal, practical work" on which American Catholics, "sixteen million strong," can unite to destroy the modern Herods, seeking to murder the Christ Child in our girls and boys?

St. Thomas and the Chicago "Tribune"

"IS there any use," asks St. Thomas, "in laws being enacted by man?" If the Angelic Doctor had lived in twentieth-century America, he might have asked the question with a certain sadness, tinged, perhaps, with sarcasm. But sadness and sarcasm were foreign to his bright spirit. Truth was his goal, and apart from the din of contending, petty passions, he attained it, calmly and surely. After premising that although "man has a certain innate aptitude for virtue, yet the perfection of virtue must accrue to him through discipline and training," the Angelic Doctor concludes his discussion in a noble paragraph:

> Because of wanton and saucy spirits, prone to vice, who cannot easily be moved by words, it was found necessary to provide means of restraining them from evil by force and fear, that so at least they might desist from evil doing, allow others to live in quiet, and themselves at length be brought by habituation of this sort to do willingly what formerly they accomplished out of fear, and thus become virtuous. This discipline, coercive by fear of punishment, is the discipline of the laws. (I-II, Q. XCV, Art. II.)

In the twentieth century, St. Thomas would have found himself in a country where great stout volumes of statutes and revised statutes, State and Federal, loom large on the shelves of professional libraries, but very faintly in the public life of many communities. He would have concluded with Mr. W. S. Lilly, that we moderns have a multitude of laws and very little law, at least in America. For, in the view of the Chicago Tribune,

Public opinion on the subject of lawlessness is represented by torpor disturbed occasionally by shock. It is indifference punctuated by useless moments of indignation or horror. There is nothing prohibitory in the attitude of Chicago toward lawlessness. The habit of thought is indulgent. . . . Murder is not committed in daylight in Trafalgar Square, nor in the Unter den Linden, nor in the Place de l'Opéra. Criminals do not kill officers in the much-used streets of Madrid, Stockholm, Petrograd or Copenhagen. There must be some reason why it can be done here, and is done here, and is not done elsewhere.

There is a reason; in fact, two reasons. The first is, that, in pursuit of neo-pagan ideals, we have endeavored to make men virtuous by ignoring positive religion, and substituting statute law. One might as well profess to run a locomotive without steam. The second reason is found in the fact, that a deluded and despicable sentimentality forbids the enforcement of the few wise laws which we yet possess. After replacing duty by expediency, and exiling Almighty God to the extent of our ability from the schools and from civic and public life, we shake mournful and stupid heads over the increase of lawlessness, juvenile and adult. If our boasted democracy ultimately proves an idle dream, the cause of the failure may be traced directly to our insistent rejection of God and His law. "Unless the Lord keep the city, they labor in vain that build it."

The Veracious Advertisers

"OUR automobile, it must be owned, is not the fastest, cheapest and best there is. In fact the 'Climax's' tires wear longer than ours, the 'Meteor' has a better engine, and the 'Flyer' is far safer. Notwithstanding the high price of our machine, however, we really do not clear so much profit on our auto as do many of our rivals on theirs." "The fifty-cent silk we have on sale is not pure silk at all. It is half cotton and is really worth only twenty-nine cents a yard, but as nobody sells it for that, you may as well trade with us." "The antique oak furniture we display this week was never to our knowledge in any baronial castle. In fact it was manufactured only last year at Grand Rapids. But the oak is at least genuine and it actually looks 300 years old. Further & Better, however, our competitors just across the street, are selling a superior chair, we freely admit, at a much lower price."

Suppose the foregoing were good samples of the advertisements the housewife of today would carefully read as she prepared for a shopping tour, what a trustworthy guide the evening paper would then become! The spectacle of merchants being so eager to acquaint the prospective buyer with the naked truth about their wares would probably be at first so severe a shock that thousands and thousands of newspaper-readers would find their only relief in tears, though here and there a cynic would perhaps be moved to skeptical laughter. But once we all grew accustomed to that kind of advertising and found by experience that the assertions made were strictly true, what a golden age would forthwith begin! For the conscientious patent-medicine manufacturer would then solemnly swear that his nostrum, though of no medicinal value whatever, was perfectly harmless; the veracious butcher would candidly state on just what day his lambs were slain or his mackerel caught; and the innocent dairyman would stake his professional reputation on the thoroughly bovine origin of his milk and butter, and would fearlessly vouch for the very birth-hour of even his freshest eggs. But if such marvels as these became commonplaces, the buying of commodities would soon lose all its zest and interest. For that sharp matching of wits, that bargaining and haggling by which a few pennies are triumphantly saved, would have no place in commerce and trade, if sellers always asked a just price and buyers always paid it. Worst of all, the amiable race of shoppers would then become completely extinct.

Safety First?

"SAFETY First," is now a frayed phrase. Yet the alarming increase of railway accidents during the last few months, justifies the question whether or not any serious reality corresponds to the hackneyed words. When, last week, a rear-end collision occurred on a famous railroad, in broad daylight, too, and immediately in front of a railway station, the New York press very justly observed that the railroads of the country might study with profit the New York subway system. If hundreds of these trains are dispatched daily, with a gratifying absence of fatalities, it is surely not asking too much of the railroads to require them to operate a comparatively small number of trains, with an equal degree of safety. To this criticism the managers reply that while the road in question is equipped with the most approved type of safety devices, no corporation can insure itself or the public against "man failure." Back of this wreck lies the whole question of the relation of the public to the public service corporation. It has been said that every safety device now in use, was invented by one appalling accident, and forced into general acceptance by another. There is cynicism in the observation, no doubt. On the other hand, to suppose that the railroads are as anxious to install safety devices, as they are to reduce running expenses, is to credit these corportations with an astonishing degree of humanitarianism. A railroad is a useful, even an indispensable agent; but it is, distinctly, not a philanthropic institution. It was built to make money and is operated for the same purpose. Generosity enters into its calculations, only on its perception that generosity is a good business policy; the "Safety First" cry is an outcome of this perception. Under other circumstances, the aim of the railroad, or of any other corporation, is a minimum of satisfactory service, which means "what the public will stand for," with a maximum of income.

Of course, the railroad argues correctly that there can be no absolute insurance against "man failure." This does not mean, however, that the public service corporation is not bound to seek and adopt measures which will reduce this danger to a constantly lessening minimum. It may be true that the majority of railroads are well equipped with safety devices; but it is not equally clear that the roads have always, or even as a rule, adopted an attitude toward their employees which makes them faithful, interested cooperators, not sullen, indifferent workers, willing to do their scant duty, but no more. The problem has at least three factors, the corporation, the workers, and the public. Ultimately, the public pays, always in money, and sometimes in blood; and it is the public which by wise but stringent regulation can solve the problem.

Several committees are now investigating the New England wreck. They might ascertain the real cause more nearly, by inquiring not whether or no a signal light was displayed, but whether the railroad in question knows how to train its employees to the faithful performance of a function with which the safety of the public is directly concerned. Even a railroad may need to learn that its entire duty is not fulfilled when it has guaranteed a dividend.

Godless New York

THAT New York, no less than darkest Africa or China, presents a field for missionary activity of the most energetic kind, was the discovery recently made by the Open Air Evangelical Committee of the National Bible Institute. From a carefully prepared map it was shown that the "unchurched population" of the great metropolis numbers 2,900,000 souls. The basis for this computation is the census of 1910, in which out of a total of 4,766,000 inhabitants, 1,250,000 are said to be practising Catholics, 200,000 Jews who attend synagogues, and 325,000 church-going Protestants. The rest, it is concluded, are without any church connections.

Without vouching for the complete accuracy of the statistics, we may take them to be sufficiently suggestive of the truth. Judged from the standpoint of observance of religious practices, New York must be classed as a pagan city. If it were not for the mighty leaven of Catholicism, to which no statistics do full justice, the condition of religion itself would be desperate and the state of Christianity all but hopeless. Missionaries might well be summoned from afar to preach the Gospel to the millions of souls who have not even, as the Greeks of old, an altar dedicated to the Unknown God. Many probably have a vague longing for religion and a general belief in a Divinity; but so, too, had the untutored aborigines who wandered over these same places when they were still happy hunting grounds.

Is this an argument against the foreign missions? At first glance it certainly would seem to be. Yet it leads to the very opposite conclusion. When Christ gave His Apostles the commandment to go forth into distant lands, there was sore need of them in Palestine. Christianity had hardly taken root in the native soil, and He Himself was soon to ascend to the right hand of the Father. Yet His words were absolute: "Going therefore, teach ye all nations." Paradoxical as it may seem, herein lies a partial solution of New York's problem. By developing the missionary spirit, according to the desire of Christ, and arousing interest in the missions afar, that same spirit will show its fruit in conversions wrought at home. If Catholics have not done as much as they could have done for the conversion of America, one reason is to be sought in the fact that many do not fully comprehend the meaning of the word "Catholic." Had the Apostles remained at home their whole lives, neither Palestine nor the world would have been converted.

An intensive missionary spirit in the Faithful will apply itself with the same apostolic zeal to assisting the distant missions and bringing the light of Faith to those at our door. The early Church is proof sufficient of this truth. Its spirit must be renewed in us if we would convert New York and the world. We have set out upon the right path in seeking to promote an earnest interest in the propagation of the Faith. But during the time that this interest is growing, no apostolic methods that the Church sanctions for winning our cities to Christ should be neglected. Indeed, the pity of it is that many old-time Catholic practices, such as dignified street-preaching, are not in use in this country.

Feeling Sorry for Yourself

"NOW don't you go feelin' sorry for yourself," counseled Mrs. Wiggs, of Cabbage Patch fame, to a damsel on the point of tears. To be sure, this young lady was a recent graduate from an orphan asylum, had just lost her "job," that perennial menace of the poor, and, if memory serves true, was confronted with the apparently hopeless task of creating a new frock out of an old one. Here, at least, was some cause for grief; yet the sagacious Mrs. Wiggs, innocent of psychology but rich in practical wisdom, rightly understood that by a reflex act of the mind, the poignancy of one's woes may be enlarged to any desired magnitude. "Now don't you go feelin' sorry for yourself, honey," repeated this valiant woman, "for hit don't do no good. Just laugh. That's better." Mrs. Wiggs would have applauded the medieval writers who were wont to depict Satan and his earthly followers as absolutely devoid of a sense of humor. Happiness and holiness are as near allied as evil and despair.

The lesson of Mrs. Wiggs is needed, especially in these days, when even the education of children is designed to move along the lines of least resistance. Self-pity is only another form of self-indulgence. The delicately nurtured are proverbially most given to "nerves," and melancholy finds its chosen refuge in the souls of the pampered. The world is not in ruins because we have broken our toy. Clouds are but ephemeral substances. The shadows that sometimes darken life, are themselves a proof that the sun is shining. Only the servants of evil ought to be unhappy, St. Ignatius used to say. A deep philosophy, drawn from the teaching of Him who "knoweth our frame" is contained in the saying of this wise Saint.

"Consider the lilies," "Take no thought for the morrow," "Your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things," "Are ye not of greater worth," are but a few of many texts, spoken by the wisdom of God for our instruction and comforting. Surely, they are a foundation upon which true and lasting happiness may be built by men of good will.

LITERATURE

XXV—Lionel Johnson

IN this world of transient things it is rather wonderful how the memory of Lionel Johnson persists. It is a triumph of personality. For Americans he seems to have a peculiar charm. The fragrance of the Old World hung about him and hangs about his memory. If you visited Winchester or Oxford for the first time, being on your knees before the Spirit of the Place, and if you had met Lionel, with the small, pure face and domed forehead, a scholar's gown on his little figure, a bundle of books under his arm, you would have cried out that he was Oxford, that he was Winchester. He was in fact saturated through and through with the spirit of these venerable and beloved places.

Lionel in the London literary circles of the nineties, in Fleet Street, was an odd anachronism. It was as though Erasmus, "Erasmus, my darling" of Blessed Thomas More, had appeared wise and smiling amid the babble and clatter and chatter about very often unworthy books which went on in those days and circles. He had stepped out of the Middle Ages, but he was not aloof from the world about him. His was a very friendly presence. He had a wise, roguish little humor and he loved his friends. One has only to take down the two tall gray volumes, which he made in his lifetime, and read the list of names of those to whom he dedicated his poems to know how wide his circle of friends was. He was immensely interested in the world in which he looked a revenant, a wise smiling little ghost; he was extraordinarily generous; his admirations were very many; for all his attainments and scholarship he did not demand these things in his friends. During some eight or nine years of intimate friendship I cannot remember that he ever belittled anyone, though he might enjoy with his little fine smile a shaft flung by another against a stupidity or an absurdity.

He had many different strands of heredity. One, the Irish Protestant, would never have led him to that profound interest in religious matters which brought about his early conversion to the Catholic Church. The Irish Protestant's interest in religion would be limited to his own. The Irish, the Welsh, the Cornish: there were those three strands: but there must have been a streak of English to explain that capacity of his for speculation. One remembers the Oxford undergraduates of Newman's "Loss and Gain" who discussed religion on their daily walks; and the Eton boys of Digby Dolben's day who formed religious societies after the monastic pattern. Lionel was still a Winchester boy when he went off to the old priest of the Catholic mission at Winchester and announced that he wished to become a Catholic. "Very well," said the priest, "but now, hadn't you better go back? You are out of bounds." That reads like a bit from St. Francis de Sales, does it not?

He loved ritual and fair-ordered services, vestments and incense and all the glorious pageantry of the Church in the worship of her Founder. That was one of the golden strands in him. Another was his feeling for the wild and the wind, for hills and wide lonely spaces and the sea. He loved the night full of stars and the quietness of forests and the beauty of English country and the great desolation of bog and moorland. He had many loyalties; to his school and his college; to Ireland, to Wales and Cornwall; to his friends; to his religion. Whence did the religion come, beyond the influences of Winchester and Oxford and the bias of his own nature? From Irish Protestantism, which is less a belief than a protestation? Hardly. Lionel was the son of Captain William Victor Johnson, second son of the second baronet. As a rule the children of these Irish Protestant families used to be nursed by Irish peasant women, between whom and their foster-children there were often the tenderest of ties. May it not have been that the love of God and Mary, imbibed with the foster-mother's milk, may have influenced this devout lover of her to whom the Irish Low Church concedes nothing of honor?

A naturally Christian soul, he had yet about him, perhaps it was his classicism, some suggestion of Plato. At least Plato came naturally to one's thoughts when one considered him. He loved his old poets and philosophers. He had the urbane air of the Greek, with the chivalry of the Christian gentleman. His manner to a woman was always exquisite.

As for his poetry, it suffered in his lifetime because many people held it to be academic. Much of it had a certain precision and formality in a day when poetry was all for abandonment. But his poetry had a curious wild lovely strain in keeping with his love for the wind and open spaces, as in this unearthly love-song:

TO MORFYDD

A voice on the winds
A voice by the waters
Wanders and cries:
O, what are the winds?
And what are the waters?
Mine are your eyes!

Western the winds are
And Western the waters
Where the light lies.
O, what are the winds?
And what are the waters?
Mine are your eyes!
. . . . . .
And down the night winds
And down the night waters
The music flies:
O, what are the winds?
And what are the waters?
Cold be the winds
And wild be the waters
So mine are your eyes!

Nearly all poets have one poem by which they are represented to a great number of readers, and this is perhaps the poem of which people think first when Lionel comes to their memory. But he had many chords to his music. He had "magnalities and splendors" like:

Ah, how the City of our God is fair!
If without sea and starless though it be,
For joy of the majestic beauty there
Men shall not miss the stars nor mourn the sea.

And very often he merits the title he gave to Pindar, "opulent." He is opulent when he writes of the rich English country. But he was a poet of reticence and conservatisms. When he is personal, it is a poignant, half-revelation as in his own "Precept of Silence":

I know you: solitary griefs,
Desolate passions, aching hours.
I know you: tremulous beliefs,
Agonized hopes and ashen flowers.

The winds are sometimes sad to me;
The starry spaces full of fear:
Mine is the sorrow on the sea
And mine the sigh of places drear.

Some players upon plaintive strings
Publish their wistfulness abroad;
I have not spoken of these things
Save to one man,—and unto God.

He was little likely to publish anything abroad concerning himself. In a day of advertising he was full of delicate reticence, and always a little mysterious to his closest friends. It was characteristic of him that he should have slipped away from us to die. He had always a certain loneliness. He lived in rooms as like college rooms or monkish rooms as possible; in Gray's Inn where his sitting-room was lit from overhead with a queer effect of immurement, and in Lincoln's Inn. When he wanted to be left alone he "sported his oak," although I think his courtesy would have shrunk from doing that to a friend. There was something very endearing and touching in his slight childish dignity, the little figure, the little face with the great brow. He preserved all the dignities in life and death. He died by a simple accident which might have happened to anyone, and because his skull was so thin, like a child's, that a fall on a deep carpet fractured it. He had written his own epitaph:

Lonely unto the Lone I go,
Divine to the Divinity.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

REVIEWS

Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings of the Rt. Rev. JAMES A. MCFAUL, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Trenton. Edited by Rev. JAMES J. POWERS. Second Edition. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.50.

"Dedicated to the Clergy, Religious, and Laity of the Diocese of Trenton in testimony of their Loyalty, Devotion and Fidelity," this volume of thirty-two papers strikingly chronicles Bishop McFaul's pastoral vigilance and enlightened zeal. Beginning with a St. Patrick's Day sermon on "Faith and Fatherland," which he delivered as a priest in 1885, ending with his address before the National Convention of the Ladies' Catholic Benevolent Association, July 15, 1914, and with the intervening pages bearing such excellent articles as "The Blessing of Bells," "Catholics and American Citizenship," "The Dead President," "Infidelity in Our Universities," "The Catholic Church and the Labor Question," and particularly the four pastorals on the home, the school, the Church, and on modern problems, the volume shows how wide and varied the author's interests and good works have been. But it is as the enthusiastic promoter of the American Federation of Catholic Societies that Bishop McFaul is best known. His name has been closely identified with the growth and spread of the organization since its inception. In this volume, therefore, is fittingly published the admirable address in which the author explains "What Federation Is Not," "What Federation Is," "Fruits of Federation," and "Work Proposed for Federation."

To those who say that as "Catholics have no grievances" there is little reason for the existence of Federation, Bishop McFaul replies that, without question, American Catholics are suffering wrongs that should be righted and then asks:

> Do you know why we have grievances? I will tell you: It is because of weak-kneed, jellyfish Catholics, who dare not call their souls their own. Go abroad in this splendid country. What kind of man is the average non-Catholic American? Generally a broad-minded, large-hearted man, a lover of justice, of the "square deal." You prate to him of grievances. What will he say? "Your fathers and mine fought shoulder to shoulder to found this Republic . . . and you have no business to have grievances. If you have, it is your own fault. You are too cowardly to make them known, to fight against them and have them redressed." And wouldn't he be right?

During the twenty-two years he has presided over the diocese of Trenton, Bishop McFaul has never failed to make it clear just how he stood on every question involving the interests of Catholics, and in this volume many of these fearless and uncompromising pronouncements can be found. An index would have made the book more useful. W. D.

The Education of Boys. By CONDÉ B. PALLEN, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: The America Press. $0.60.

A Catholic college and a Catholic education for the Catholic boy! Such is the plea which the author puts before us in this brief and substantial book. The thesis is exposed and proved clearly, logically, conclusively. Dr. Pallen goes straight to the mark and, without fear or favor, sets forth the theory of the only education which he judges fit for a Catholic boy, contrasting it with the purely "secularist" system to which so many are unfortunately driven. The tide of secularism is pulling hard against the old anchorage of Faith, the writer says. We need, therefore, a thorough training of our mental and spiritual powers in genuine Catholic principles to withstand the ever-growing strain and beat back the foe. Our boys must be "steeped, saturated with Catholic principles." The Catholic college is the only place where that can be successfully done. Catholic parents assume a grave responsibility if, for social prestige or worldly success, they send their boys to non-Catholic institutions. The author does not mince matters. The friends of Catholic education will everywhere welcome his clear, bold, and genuinely Catholic utterances, while opponents of our educational principles will admire his sincerity and courage. Dr. Pallen has solidly grounded convictions and is not afraid to express them.

The book is made up of fourteen chapters, in the form of letters to a friend, who asks the writer certain leading questions on Catholic education and proposes difficulties for solution. The letter-form allows the author a little more freedom of treatment, and an opportunity to turn into bypaths branching off from the main road. Even in these side lanes Dr. Pallen "botanizes" most profitably. The chapters on "The Responsibilities of Parents," "The Vital Principle in Education," those in which the three dangers of secularism, i. e., specialism, electivism, and utilitarianism are exposed, sound the wise warnings of faith, reason and experience. To Dr. Pallen, Catholic education is the only true education. It is the only one that fits men both for this world and for the world to come. The style of these fourteen letters, though they are perhaps a little more burdened with Latinisms than this kind of composition warrants, is everywhere forcible and clear. There is no mistaking the author's message, and the message is needed. J. C. R.

Singing Fires of Erin. By ELEANOR ROGERS COX. New York: John Lane Co. $1.00.

To people acquainted with the extensive content and the inspirational value of Irish legendary lore, it is no matter of surprise to observe the constant procession of new books which find their matter and inspiration in old Irish themes; and among these recent books, this volume of poetry, "Singing Fires of Erin," must be accorded a rich welcome. The author's soul gives a truthful response to the old, sweet echoes, and her voice is trained to adequate expressiveness. Where others, the set of vague neo-Celts, have found only aspiration, the author has felt inspiration. This is what must be the event, whenever the singer of Irish themes is genuine. For Ireland's book of sagas is, even after the devastation of centuries, more extensive than anything the rest of Europe has to show; we know that its vitality, its perennial interest, is greater than other west-European legends; and, with regard to its inspirational value, Stopford Brooke believes when we get these old Irish literary remains done into English, we shall have set the "Idyls of the King" going for another thousand years. As the author sings:

Long from their purpled heights,
Their reign of high delights,
The Queens have wended down Death's mildewed stair,
Leaving a scent of lilies on the air,
To gladden earth through all her days and nights,
That once she cherished anything so fair.

Yet while Ireland is rich in her great literary past, her greater praise is the achievement of her later world; and in a single poem upon that theme, "O Radiant Faith of Ireland," the author has written a ringing ballad, worthy of Aubrey de Vere and Lionel Johnson:

Her children throng the waterways where pass the mighty ships,
Still pioneers of God they come, a prayer upon their lips;
Still bearing, to their lineage true, Faith's fertilizing rain,
To blossom forth in stranger lands in many a shining fane.

M. E.

Antwerp to Gallipoli. By Arthur Ruhl. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The Way of the Cross. By V. Doroshevitch. Introduction by Stephen Graham. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

Arthur Ruhl covers a wider field than most of the writers of war books, for he gives us a story of a year on many fronts. He is very frank in his opinions and, having sounded the bravery of the different armies, he gives unstinted praise to the men in the ranks under every flag. His criticism of the partisan press of the different nations is well merited. Sedentary fire-eaters and hate-mongers who sit at ease in editorial chairs and call for slaughter or annihilation, who write of "flashing sabers," "without the remotest idea of what flashing sabers do," and slaughter an army corps with words every day, these are the men, editors and politicians of all the countries in arms, that the author would send to serve a week in the enemy's hospitals. Most men who appreciate the grim reality of war will give the writer a vote of approval for this proposal. Arthur Ruhl admits that had he remained in London and read the lies of but one side, he would have been capable of loathing the enemy, but having been in all the countries, and read all the lies, the difficulty in pronouncing judgment on the world-slaughter is by no means slight.

The story of the Russian and Polish fugitives fleeing before the German invader in the fall of 1915 was penned by a journalist who witnessed their sufferings. The writer gives a vivid picture of this great moving human wall of victims. In a most peculiar style, characterized by short sentences, word-paragraphs, dashes and interrogation marks, the author tells how the helpless non-combatants marched and starved, how they camped in the forests, died by the way, and planted their crosses along the roadside. The book justifies its title.

G. C. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who have read and enjoyed "Penrod," the eleven-year-old hero of Booth Tarkington's, will find in the experiences of William Sylvanus Baxter, of the mature age of "Seventeen" (Harper, $1.35), even greater matter for entertainment. The course of true love never did run smooth, least of all in the case of the overpowering affection which envelops the soul of this callow youngster for Miss Pratt, a mincing, sentimental maiden who much affects baby-talk, and is the least convincing character in the book. Jane, a ten-year-old sister, and Genesis, a genial darkey, the two chief obstacles in love's rough current, are genuine "finds." In these two stories, illustrative of boy psychology, the author has struck a new and vastly entertaining note.

"Practical Stage Directing for Amateurs" (Dutton, $1.00), by Emerson Taylor, is intended for ambitious amateurs who may wish to free their dramatics from the reproach of mediocrity so frequently applied to private theatricals. "After all, amateur plays do have a charm of their own, so different from real plays!" is a remark sometimes heard. Personal experience and a competent stage-manager are, of course, the best preventives of such equivocal compliments; but in lieu of them Mr. Taylor's book furnishes at least suggestions, safeguards and fundamental principles. There is a compendium of stage requirements, both for the actors and the stage-manager, a list of "Do's" and "Don'ts," a stage chart, showing wings, exits, drops, etc.; a glossary of stage terms, advice on play-choosing, rehearsing, scenery, make-up and other difficulties encountered by amateur producers. There is also a helpful chapter on the technique of voice, pause, poise and action.

Though more than an introduction to a large subject can scarcely be expected from so small a volume as is Father F. Laun's "The Chief Points of Difference between the Catholic and Protestant Creeds" (Wagner, $0.75), yet within less than 200 pages he gives a complete and logical conspectus of the principal objections of Protestants against the doctrine and history of the Catholic Church. The objections are fairly presented; the answers are adequate, concise and forceful in statement without being intemperate. Possibly a few of the non-Catholic admissions cited might have been taken from authorities of greater weight among Protestants. For example, "Father Ignatius" of Llanthony never secured a following; and it is doubtful whether the Living Church for some years past has commanded the confidence of many serious Episcopalians, even of the small section which it pretends to represent. Perhaps a more reliable and acceptable source of testimony to early vernacular editions of Scripture would be E. L. Cutts' "Turning Points in Church History." Most of Father Laun's citations, however, are of recognized value.

In the Irish Monthly for April is an excellent paper by Father George O'Neill, on "The Tercentenary of Father Alphonsus Rodriguez." In the course of a sane and discerning appraisal of "The Practice of Christian and Religious Perfection," the author well observes: "His [Rodriguez's] distinction is that of a writer who not only gleans from nearly every part of the wide field covered by his predecessors, but also succeeds in combining (within limits) their special merits and values. . . . In matter and manner alike, Rodriguez is central, intelligible, approachable. In the greatest of sciences, he is greatest of vulgarisateurs." But Father O'Neill calls attention to his fellow-Jesuit's careless and uncritical use of history and biology, and "the remarkable inequality in value of his numerous examples and anecdotes," and then courageously attacks with unanswerable arguments the unfeeling doctrine laid down by the Spanish ascetic regarding "Disorderly Affections for Our Relations." Three other very readable articles in this issue of the Irish Monthly are "The Beginnings of Industrial Germany," which is Denis Gwynn's account of Cliffe Leslie's investigations; "In the North of Portugal," by M. J. Casey, and M. Pearde Beaufort's sketch of M. Maurice Barrès, "A French Nationalist." "Eldergowan," a new serial by Rosa Mulholland, starts in this number.

The Monroe Doctrine was formulated in 1823, in order to prevent the acquisition of American territory by a European power.

In these parlous days when Europe is herself so distraught, Mr. Charles H. Sherrill has given us a timely volume on "The Modernizing of the Monroe Doctrine," (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.75). Why this work is needed and what part the business-man should play with great profit to himself and the country is set forth clearly and convincingly. The author has many titles for his authority to speak on the subject, particularly the medal presented him by the people of Argentina on his retirement as Minister to that country. His ideals look to a future along constructive, peaceful business and diplomatic lines till from the Monroe Doctrine, rightly understood, there arises a monumental "triangle of peace," its base inter-republic harmony throughout the Western Hemisphere, its eastern side rising as a bulwark against frictional misunderstanding with Europe, its western side assuring lasting peace on the Pacific Ocean.

An enjoyable exercise of wit is in store for anyone who cares to test his ingenuity by unraveling the mystery that Carolyn Wells has woven in her latest detective story, "The Curved Blades" (Lippincott, $1.25). The sudden death of a rich old lady, in very mysterious circumstances, casts more discord in an already disunited household, and through many pages suspicion is skilfully made to rest successively on everybody in the book, except the detective himself.——In a rather commonplace story called "The Second Coming" (Dodd, Mead, $0.50), Frederic Arnold Kummer and Henry P. Janes describe visits Our Lord makes to the trenches and to the Kaiser's private apartment. The authors hurry the defeated Emperor to a repentant deathbed.——Mr. Louis U. Wilkinson has joined the ranks of the novelists. His first story, "The Buffoon" (Knopf, $1.50), is disappointing. Practically without plot, it is mainly taken up with a description of the lower cravings of an egotistic hedonist.——"Gibby of Clamshell Alley" (Dodd, Mead, $1.35), by Jasmine Stone Van Dresser, is a wholesome and entertaining story. The twelve-year-old subject of the autobiography named himself "Gibson Emory," after a boat. Gibby leads a laborious life, digging clams and hunting for hidden treasures, and a calculating life, trying to out-scheme his arch-enemy, Burly MacGregor, and establish himself in the business of clam-digging. The advent of "Granny," whom he had adopted, and whom he strives to keep from the poorhouse, adds to his life new pleasures and new adventures, until he is restored to his birthright.—— "Beggars on Horseback" (Doran, $1.25), by F. Tennyson Jesse, is a collection of short stories, printed, the author explains, in the order of their composition. The later tales are superior to the earlier ones, not only in subject-matter and treatment, but in the absence of a certain gushing voluptuousness.

"Mary Rose of Mifflin," (Appleton, $1.25) by Frances Sterrett, is a delightful story. Mary Rose, "almost eleven, going on fourteen," and orphaned, finds herself with cat and canary in an apartment house where "the lease says plain as can be, no children, no dogs an' no cats." Mary can't understand it: "Why everybody has children. They always had. Don't you remember, even Adam and Eve?" Full of Mifflin kindliness—for she has "a big heart. Did you know, the more you put into a heart the more it can hold? I think hearts must be like balloons. You can blow and blow and blow into balloons and there's always room for more breath"—the little heroine breaks through the formalism about her, bowls over the snow-gods of feminism and convinces all that "a child is a present straight from God" which may be accepted without fear of consequences.——Though "Golden Glory," (Doran, $1.25) by F. Horace Rose, is a $5,000 prize story of African life, it seems withal but an indifferent tale, told in a common and at times in a coarse way. If after scanning the chapter-headings the reader has the courage to plunge into the jungle he will find himself in the thick of African savagery, witnessing fights and brawls and dances and stumbling over corpses in an attempt to follow a dwarf in the search for "Golden Glory."

In "Les Grandes Heures (1914-15)," a selection from the articles contributed to L'Illustration by M. Henri Lavedan, the dramatist and novelist, during the early months of the war, is a fine passage entitled "Credo," which Studies translates thus:

I believe in the valor of our soldiers, in the skill and the devotion of our commanders.

. . . . . .

I believe in the reward of grief and in the merit of hope.

I believe in confidence, in recollection, in the daily task, in militant charity.

I believe in the blood of the wounded soldier and in the water from the holy font, in the fire of artillery and the flame of blessed candles, in the beads of the rosary.

I believe in the sacred prayer of old age and in the all-powerful ignorance of childhood.

I believe in women's prayers, in the sleepless nights of heroic wives, in the pious calm of mothers, in the purity of our cause, in the stainless glory of our flag.

I believe in our great past, in our great present, in our greater future.

I believe in the living and the dead of France.

I believe in the hands that grasp the steel and in the hands joined in prayer.

I believe in ourselves. I believe in God. I believe. I believe.

M. Lavedan's countrymen should be very grateful for these words inspired by faith.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith, Together with a Treatise on Mental Prayer Based on the Work of the Venerable Father Louis de Ponte, S.J. By Rev. C. W. Barraud, S.J. Two Vols. $3.00; Marie of the House d'Anters. By Michael Earls, S.J. $1.35; The Passion and Death of Jesus. By Philip Coghlan, C.P. $0.75; Only Anne. By Isabel C. Clark. $1.35.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
William Wordsworth, How to Know Him. By C. T. Winchester, A.M., L.H.D. $1.25.

The Christian Herald, New York:
Luther in Light of Recent Research. By Heinrich Bohmer. Translated by Carl F. Huth, Jr. $1.25.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Feminism, Its Fallacies and Follies. By Mr. and Mrs. John Martin. $1.50; First Base Faulkner. By Christy Mathewson. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
A False Saint. a Play in Three Acts. By François de Curel. Translated by Barrett H. Clark. $0.75; Roberta of Roseberry Gardens. By Frances Duncan. $1.25; Victory in Defeat, the Agony of Warsaw and the Russian Retreat. By Stanley Washburn. $1.00; Caliban by the Yellow Sands. By Percy Mackaye. $0.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
A Book for Shakespeare Plays and Pageants. By O. L. Hatcher, Ph.D. $2.00.

M. H. Gill & Son, Ltd., Dublin:
The Flight of the Earls. By Tadhg O Cianain. Edited from the Author's Manuscript. With Translation and Notes. By Rev. Paul Walsh, M.A. 8 shillings 6 pence.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Onion Peelers. By R. P. Garrold. $1.60; Garcia Moreno, a Tragedy in Three Acts. Adapted from the German. By Fr. Bernard, O.M.Cap. $0.25; Paul Mary Pakenham, Passionist. By the Rev. Joseph Smith, C.P. $0.50; Orbis Catholicus, a Year Book of the Catholic World. Edited by Canon Glancey. $1.50; Luther. By Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Authorized Translation from the German. By E. M. Lamond. Edited by Luigi Cappadelta. Volume V. $3.25.

Hinds, Noble & Eldredge, New York:
Writing the Short-Story: a Practical Handbook on the Rise, Structure, Writing, and Sale of the Modern Short-Story. By J. Berg Esenwein. $1.25.

John Lane Co., New York:
Essays and Literary Studies. By Stephen Leacock. $1.25.

J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia:
The Civilization of Babylonia and Assyria. By Morris Jastrow, Jr., Ph.D., LL.D. $6.00; The Magic of Jewels and Charms. By George Frederick Kunz, Ph.D., A.D., D.Sc. $5.00.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Shakespeare's Theater. By Ashley H. Thorndike, Ph.D., L.H.D. $2.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Bars of Iron. By Ethel M. Dell. $1.50.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The End of a Chapter. By Shane Leslie. $1.25.

EDUCATION

II—Dangers of Secular Universities

IN a preceding paper I have sketched some of the dangers to faith which the Catholic student will meet in what may be termed the official life of the secular university. The story does not end with my brief enumeration of these dangers. Not only does the unsuspecting Catholic put his faith in jeopardy when he enters the lecture halls of these schools, but he will probably find in them an attack upon everything that hitherto he has considered sacred as a valid code of morality.

Conventionality is practically proposed as the chief basis of a workable moral code. The older lines of moral demarcation, beyond which none dared transgress, are of less importance than the observance of the foibles and niceties of social life. The diaphanous raiment of college bayaderes, too often originating among the demi-monde of some European capital, furnishes no cause for censure provided the design be modishly conventional. The rake, open or furtive, clever enough to evade the criminal courts and consequent loss of respectability, is received by the perfumed "eminently respectable," as long as he strikes no discordant note in the scale of social conventions. After a training of this kind, the young student is indeed exceptional if he does not believe that character merely means what other people think of us.

The "Broad-Minded" Catholic

Nor will the stability of the Catholic student's faith and morals be made more secure should he come under the influence of the "latitudinarian" Catholic faculty member. Some whom I have met entertain and teach views strangely heterodox. Perhaps this heterodoxy is merely a "pose," or a bid for popularity as "a broad-minded investigator"; oftener, however, the Catholic faculty member has never attended a Catholic school, and has never taken the trouble to acquire the Catholic viewpoint on historical, ethical or philosophical questions. It may even be that he is ignorant of the fact that such viewpoints exist. In any case, he is quite unfit to handle adequately mooted points in biology, history, psychology, and religion; while the advertised fact that he is a "Catholic" will lend, among unwary Catholics, an added but unmerited authority to his expressed opinions. To maintain in these fussy, superficial days, that the religious revolution of the sixteenth century was neither a blessing nor a necessity, that religion is not hostile to science, that both capital and labor have rights which each is bound to respect, that certain forms of modern prophylacticized marriages are legalized concubinage, requires faith, courage, and a thorough knowledge of Catholic philosophy. And the typical "Catholic" professor in the secular university is often lacking in one or all of these qualities. Of course, there are exceptions; but being exceptions, they are rarely met with.

Unofficial Influences

Here a few reflections on the influence of certain "officially unofficial" university activities may not be out of place. Perhaps the most prominent of these agents is the Young Men's Christian Association, a body which, permitting Catholics to contribute to its funds, to its standing, and its general prosperity, excludes them from participation in its government. Strictly speaking, it is true that the Y. M. C. A. is not one of the recognized societies of any modern secular university in which it has gained a foothold; yet the recognition which it is usually accorded is scarcely less than "official." Frequently during the year, for instance, its representatives, with the consent and approval of the authorities, conduct the chapel exercises, at which attendance may be obligatory; often the student will find that university affairs have been changed, so as not to interfere with Y. M. C. A. membership campaigns or other activities. The inference drawn from all this by the careless Catholic student is, that those Catholic clergymen and editors who have been charging the Association with reprehensible methods in foreign mission fields are "narrow and bigoted," dwellers in forgotten ruts, persons who are generally misinformed, and always ready to believe the worst. From this conclusion, especially if reenforced by chance remarks on the campus or set lectures in the classroom, the Catholic student more or less easily passes to the conviction that, after all, the Catholic Faith is ultra-sectarian and needs a little "toning down."

Practical Results

Supposing the most favorable result, a period of some years will elapse after graduation before the Catholic student perceives that his university training was based on a large amount of sham, not to say falsehood. The varied teachings of his Alma Mater seem to be at one only on this point: that, theoretically at least, we can be sure of nothing. This purely negative conclusion is not satisfying, for one thing, and again, practical life shows that it is not true. At all events his Alma Mater has not provided him with a valid, comforting, sane and practical philosophy of life. Such a philosophy the modern university scarcely professes to give. It has busied itself in "correlating the things of the mind with the things of modern life." But "modern life" is so complex and changing an entity that it has defied "correlation." The result is chaos, unless "the things of the mind" and the more important "things of the soul" have been rejected as factors of which the modern world need take no serious cognizance. It seems to me that this rejection of the spiritual things of the mind and of the soul is precisely the ruin into which much of what is termed "university training" has been forced. And with what result? "Success" has taken on a new meaning. The dollar mark, the preferment of a fickle mob, the development of one's "individuality" even beyond eccentricity, are some of the standards by which success is gauged.

Some Inconsistencies

The young student at the secular university will, as a rule, be blind to the fact that, were the Church the illogical, tyrannical institution that she is pictured by some of his professors, she long ago would have ceased to be. A show of learning, an affectation of impartiality, impress him; he has not the discernment to know that it is merely show and affectation; in the language of the campus, "bluff." He does not see that his professor, who would hotly resent any criticism of his own opinions, if put forward save by a specialist, is quite ready to pass judgment, and with the finality found only in some university professors, upon any and all questions pertaining to the Catholic Church. He holds, does this professor, that the opinion of a lawyer on a recondite point of biology is of no particular value, save perhaps, as a curiosity; that mathematicians should not dogmatize upon delicate problems in international law; that, in brief, the cobbler should stick to his last. But not a university professor of his own exceptional accomplishments. A larger field is permitted him; "academic freedom" justifies him in occupying it. While he would not recommend you to consult a blacksmith for a toothache, this person, in no sense a specialist in Catholic doctrine, practice or history, does not hesitate to pronounce the last word on any and all debated points affecting, proximately or remotely, the Catholic Church.

Let me recount briefly a few of the vagaries autocratically dominant in secular schools, and diametrically opposed to Catholic teaching. Take the old question of the freedom of the will. The very terms are rejected by many, as postulating what they call "the compartment-theory of the scholastics," according to which the soul is composed of three separate entities, memory, understanding and will. The beginner in scholastic philosophy knows that the scholastics held nothing of the sort, but how is our Catholic student, carefully guarded by his instructors from contact with the original sources, to know this? But even admitting the terms, the psychology in favor in the modern school cannot allow that the will is free. What is done is done by necessity. Paradise, if there be a Paradise, was never won by Magdalene nor forfeited by Judas. The treachery of the one and the repentance of the other were phenomena over which neither had any control.

As to the perversions which some call "birth-restriction" and others, more properly, "race-suicide," not much need be said save that their liceity is taken for granted. "It is better," some callow instructor, with a genius for ignoring the principle at issue, will utter importantly, "to give one child every material and educational advantage than to allow many to enter life handicapped." What effect these and similar encouragements to immorality are producing may be seen in the small or non-existent family that is typical of what has been called "the most educated corner of America," non-Catholic New England.

Taking Chances

As I view the matter, the young man who expects to go through a secular university with faith unshaken and morals unimpaired, must possess the courage of a saint and the mental training of a Catholic doctor of philosophy. He has enemies within and without the classroom and the lecture-hall. He is surrounded by pagan savants, learned theorists, superficial thinkers, men to whom tradition is a joke, the soul a myth, and the spirit of reverence, which Carlyle set down as a prime requisite in a student, a mental and moral weakness. The young Catholic may rise above his surroundings; again, he may not. He is taking a chance, with the odds against him. I should advise his parents to make a good, old-fashioned meditation on the duties of one's state of life. If, at its conclusion, they can still allow their son to remain at the modern secular college, then I am willing to grant their salvation on the equally old-fashioned principle of invincible ignorance.

F. L.

SOCIOLOGY

Her Place in the World

THIS is a story for those very admirable persons, sociologists, educators, and the like, who preach that some form of Training must be given the Young Person fighting for a Place in Life. I invoke the aid of capitals, because I think it makes the statement much more impressive. If you will allow me to add that I, too, think that some form of Training should be given the Young Person, I shall proceed to the story, which happens to be true. But I also think that it makes very much of a difference as to what form this Training shall take.

Well, then, Lucile and Mary lived in the same handsome apartment house; that is, handsome as apartment houses go. But that is neither here nor there. Both were fairly pretty, lively and interested in the world around them, both a little frivolous, and, as is unfortunately too often the case in handsome apartment houses, each was the only child of well-to-do parents. Now these two young ladies had just finished their education, Lucile at "The Misses Townsend's Finishing School" in New York, Mary at a convent boarding-school at home. Their parents, especially their mothers, looked forward with a great deal of pleasure to the "coming out" next winter. The girls themselves were great chums, had many friends in the best social circles, and certainly everything promised a very enjoyable season. I pause here merely to remark upon the appositeness of the adage that we cannot always foretell the future with accuracy.

A Question of Vocation

For Mary, when she came home from the convent school, with a beautifully-engraved diploma, had a great surprise in store for her parents, and for her friend Lucile. She felt that she had a vocation to the religious life, and had decided to become a Sister of Charity. At first, of course, her mother could not, would not, believe that she was in earnest. And Lucile, who was only eighteen, said, "Oh, nonsense, Mary, you'd have to cut off all your hair (Mary had rather pretty hair), and never see anyone or go any place. Don't be silly." And she changed the subject by suggesting that they go for a motor ride.

But Mary was in earnest, and had made up her mind to be "silly." So at the end of July, though it nearly broke her heart to leave her home, her parents, and all the hopes and dreams she had been building up, she took leave of them all, and departed for the novitiate of the Sisters of Charity. There we may leave her for a while.

What Lucile Did

Now, of course, you want to know what Lucile did. Well, she felt quite bad for a couple of weeks over Mary's going, thought her very, very silly, and prophesied that she would be home again in six months. She herself made her début that winter, and was married the following June to John, a very nice young fellow whom she had known since early childhood. It was a "lovely" wedding, "one of the prettiest affairs of the month," wrote little Miss Respess, the society reporter. Then, after a delightful trip to old White Sulphur, Lucile returned to take up "housekeeping" in an apartment only a little less handsome than the one she had lived in before.

After that she went to dances and lectures and weddings and musicales, bridge and theater parties, charity festivals and afternoon receptions and teas, dinner and club luncheons, just as was her wont before she was married. The only difference was that she was freer now, had more time at her disposal for such "duties" and, in consequence, found these calls upon her time becoming more numerous. In fact, she took so much interest in such activities that in a short time she came to be recognized as a social leader, "one of the younger matrons in society." Lucile also did a little "social work" in the other, popular, sense of the word, namely, "in helping to better social conditions." Most of this work was in the form of getting up subscriptions and charity entertainments, for she found that she did not care for "slumming," or visiting hospitals and orphanages. Really, she could scarcely spare the time, and then, she did not "like" the surroundings of such work.

Odds and Ends

I almost forgot to mention that, two or three years after her marriage, a baby was born to Lucile. But the child did not live, and Lucile did not consider it necessary to wear mourning for more than a few months. Another sad occurrence was the death of her Boston terrier. The poor little thing was "run over," right in front of the house one day, and Lucile cried all the rest of the afternoon. For, as she said to herself: "It was perfectly terrible to think of poor little 'Vic' being killed right before her eyes."

But I'm afraid that I am going too much into detail concerning Lucile. To conclude, then. She went to church pretty regularly on Sundays, even in bad weather, after John got a car. I need not say that she read the magazines and many very popular novels. Of course, this is not all that Lucile did; but in general, we may sum up her life from twenty to fifty-five, when she died, by saying that she did "just about the usual thing." Now about Mary.

What Mary Did

Mary found her year of novitiate decidedly hard. Sometimes it would have been too hard to bear, had it not been for God's grace which helped her. There was no "poetry" about it, and hardly any consolation. Her parents visited her at Christmas and found her a bit subdued, but quite content, and "beginning to be very happy," as she expressed it. After her novitiate she was sent to a large orphanage and day-nursery, not in her own city, but only a hundred miles or so away, so that her parents were able to visit her two or three times a year. Her father sometimes even slipped in an extra visit by himself; for he was very fond of Mary, and, though he never said so, proud of what she had done. It showed pluck, he thought. This ambling paragraph, however, is not about her parents, but about Mary.

At St. Anne's Asylum, you may be sure, she found plenty to do. At first she had charge of twenty-five babies, some weak and deformed, some chubby and happy, others puling and fretful. She found that, in spite of herself, she liked the rosy, smiling ones the best, though her heart and hands were tenderest for the weaklings among her little flock. After a few years, her nursery was doubled, and later an adjoining room was added, for the number of her charges now varied between seventy and eighty. Was it weakness or strength, that she could never help crying a little when one of them died, even though she knew that, still in their baptismal innocence, it was for them but a step from earth to heaven? Mary was not delicate, but neither was she extraordinarily strong; sometimes she had an assistant, sometimes even two, and sometimes none. But there was always plenty to do.

The Things that Count

Of course, Mary, or rather Sister Mary, did other things besides care for her family of seventy or eighty babies. There was the meditation, and Mass, and Holy Communion every morning. It was from these that the motive force for the day's work came. (I commend these practices to the modern sociologist. But I am afraid he does not understand what they are. They are but a few of the things connected with Catholic social work that he does not understand.) These were also the chief, though by no means the only sources of the happiness which brightened her life, and gave a look of holiness, yes, holiness is the word, to her face, as she passed from youth to middle life. There were the daily recreations with the other Sisters, times of pleasant companionship. There was her correspondence with her parents, with Lucile, and with some of the Sisters who had been novices with her, and had been sent to other cities. There were the visits of her parents, and the daily visits of the parents and various relatives of some or other of the children.

When Sister Mary was about fifty years old, she was transferred to a large hospital in another city. Here a new trait of her character, a great power of human sympathy, made its appearance. She was given charge of the free ward where the unfortunate and unhappy women of the city are brought, usually in a dying condition. And how many of them she won back to God before death, the wages of sin, claimed them! Others, too, especially the younger ones, she reclaimed to a new life, either among friends and relatives, or in penance, as Magdalenes in some Convent of the Good Shepherd. To this work were the last ten years of Mary's life devoted until, four years after Lucile, at the age of fifty-nine, very quietly and very calmly, she died.

The Epilogue

One day, shortly after Mary went to the novitiate, her mother met a friend, who inquired when the "child" was expected back. On being told that Mary seemed very contented and determined not to come home, she said, "Oh, tell her to come out and take her place in the world!" Now, considering what Lucile did and Mary did, I wonder which of the two took any "place in the world" worth talking about?

O, yes, another point. You detect an anachronism; you say there were no automobiles, no bridge parties in those days? Ah, well; date my humble narrative 1950, if you like. But every age has its automobiles, its bridge parties, its Luciles, and, thank God, its Marys!

Thomas M. Knapp, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"All of the old rites of the Anglican Catholic Church were carried out, with the purpose of instructing the congregation in the meaning of the ritual." Such, we are told, was the character and purpose of the Palm-Sunday services which were carried out with awe-inspiring solemnity in a high, high church of Brooklyn. By far the most striking figure in the procession, outshining in splendor even the bishop "in full vestments," and making the onlookers oblivious even to the "four trumpeters playing the processional hymn," must have been that "sacred guard in full costume of the sixteenth century with halbard and mace and carrying side arms." Just wherein the "sacred" character of the archaic guard consisted is not altogether clear to the casual reader, but that Brooklyn congregation no doubt was so well instructed "in the meaning of the ritual" that they grasped at once the symbolic beauty of every detail of the sacred guard's costume. Armed cap-a-pie and leading the procession as he did, perhaps he mystically represented the supreme control the State has exercised over the "Anglican Catholic Church" since the lusty days of Henry VIII.

The annual address at the meeting of the Classical Association of the Middle West was given this year by the well-known Greek scholar and archeologist, the Rev. Henry Browne, S.J., Professor of Greek in the National University of Ireland. He was likewise invited to address the Classical Faculties of the Chicago and Illinois Universities. In dealing with the influence of Greek upon modern music he detected clear evidences of a Greek origin in the liturgical melodies of the plain chant. The experiments he himself had made on the melodic interpretation of Greek choral rhythms was the particular subject of his lectures at the universities. Father Browne is at present making a short tour in the Atlantic States and the Middle West with a view to reporting upon the place of museums or archeological collections in the educational system of America. A Committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science has been engaged for three years in seeking world-wide information on this subject. As a representative of the Classical Faculty of the National University of Ireland, the Reverend Professor was definitely requested, on joining the committee, to confine his attention to classical and literary education. He has labored to promote reformed methods of classical study in Ireland and has appealed to the various classical associations to develop the archeological side of teaching, believing that this will be the most potent factor in deepening and widening popular interest in classical learning, which has fallen into disrepute in so many places.

To show that the problem of a merchant marine is not merely a seaboard question the words of an expert were recently quoted by the Hon. E. F. Sweet, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, to the effect that if British vessels only were withdrawn the resulting depreciation in wheat and cotton would be such as to bring the direst distress upon the farmers of the country. He advocated the building of 400 auxiliary vessels and the appointment of a competent commission to consider the entire merchant marine problem. The following series of questions and answers clearly sets forth his point of view:

> How would these Government-owned auxiliaries be operated in time of peace? By private individuals or companies, if such can be found, under long-time charters subject to quick cancellation by the Government if needed for war. To whom leased? The highest bidders. How would they be manned? By qualified American sailors who would receive extra pay and agree to remain on board in case the vessels should be requisitioned for war service. On what routes? Those most needing them. Would the four hundred or five hundred naval auxiliaries give us a merchant marine? By no means. We ought to have five thousand of an average of two thousand gross tons each, and then we would only have two-thirds of the tonnage of Great Britain. How can we get the balance? That I would leave to the careful study of the commission.

The most encouraging element in the present situation, as he sees it, is that the American people realize as never before the need of a merchant marine.

The reason, according to the New York Evening Post, why so many colleges and universities are almost continually in financial straits is that they are managed by college presidents instead of athletic directors.

> For the fiscal year ending last July the gross income from athletics at Harvard amounted to $242,780.41. This is only about ten thousand dollars less than the total income of Amherst College or Lehigh University. It is more than the income of 269 colleges in the United States, and is exceeded by the income of only 70 collegiate institutions in the country. The expenditures for Harvard sports during the same year were $238,632.89, leaving a balance of more than $4,000. This again is in contrast with the usual results of college finances where a profit instead of a deficit is a rarity.

The paper reasonably concludes that for the manager of this quarter-million-dollar business the university is certainly a preparation for business life. He would find it no change to step from the management of the Harvard football team to the presidency of a munition plant, except that he might consider the methods of his new business rather antiquated by comparison. How greatly such a system furthers the scholarship and general intellectual development of players and students may puzzle the uninitiated, but that is of no consequence to the football enthusiast.

A war of extermination has been declared by the "Interstate Anti-Mosquito Committee" against its inveterate enemies. It pronounces them, in its Red Book, to be a nuisance and a carrier of disease and calls upon all, without distinction of sex or position, to enlist against them. Not only the mosquitoes, but all their allies, are to be warred upon relentlessly, and every harbor is to be closed to them. Further details may be learned from a statement issued in the Weekly Bulletin of the New York City Department of Health:

> When one considers what has been done in Havana and in Panama, the plague of mosquitoes which this city tolerates each summer is disgraceful. To be sure many of the pests have been of the salt-marsh variety, but careful studies have also shown that large numbers of mosquitoes are bred in obstructed roof gutters, drains, roof tanks, fire buckets, tin cans, bottles and boxes, and in other places where rain water has been allowed to accumulate. Since this indicates negligence somewhere, the Department of Health will begin shortly to wage a persistent campaign, including criminal prosecution, against all who permit the breeding of mosquitoes on their premises, in violation of Section 272 of the Sanitary Code.

The first week in May has, therefore, been set aside as "Mosquito Week." The Department of Education has promised its support and each school is to be supplied with a jar of mosquito larvæ to be used for the purpose of instruction during Mosquito Week. A special leaflet is also under preparation for wide distribution.

As a "sample of our educational efficiency" the Gateway relates the story of a flat-hunting bride and groom. They were inspecting an apartment which rented at sixty-five dollars a month. The young wife, who had probably enjoyed all the advantages of a Montessori kindergarden and had been educated on the approved principle that children must always have their own way, insisted upon taking the rooms. There were weak protests on the part of the husband, ending in unconditional surrender: "Well if you say you want it, we'll take it." The wise landlord, however, had his prudent suspicions:

> I'm considerably interested in you two young people, he remarked. Would you object to telling me what your salary is? The bride replied, O, $45 a month! Then he has another source of income? Well, not just now. But his aunt —— The business man interrupted. Don't you see, young lady, how absurd it is for this young man to expect to pay $65 a month rent on $45 a month salary? The girl shook her head. But I like this apartment, she said. I want it, and I am going to have it.

The story is not merely an apt illustration of the highly practical education for life which our modern pedagogic wisdom affords, but it furthermore implies a sequel which the writer sagaciously foresees. It is expressed by him in the following faultless solution of a simple arithmetical problem: "Sixty-five dollars from forty-five dollars leaves divorce."

The Central Director of the Holy Childhood for the United States informs us that the sum cleared during the past year amounted to $45,438.37, to which must be added $1,300.00 sent out to the missions as specified donations and Mass-stipends. This is an increase of about fifty per cent over the contributions of the previous year. Though much more would be done if the wish of the Holy Father were fulfilled that every Catholic child should be a member of the Holy Childhood Association and that it should be established in every school and college of the United States and Canada, yet there is decided reason for congratulation. It is clear on every hand that the mission idea is gradually taking a strong hold upon American Catholics. The Field Afar, the cheery little organ of the American Foreign Mission Seminary at Maryknoll, N. Y., gives the true view of the situation when it writes:

> No observant Catholic can fail to note the rising mission spirit of the Church in this country. It has been reaching out to non-Catholics, to Negroes of the Southland and Indians of the West. It has spread over seas and today is strengthening the hope of many a care-worn bishop whose sources of supply have been cut off by the European conflagration. Already thousands of hearts are beating in sympathy with the movement and in a few short years thousands more will wake, to marvel in glad surprise, let us hope, at the place occupied by Catholic America in the army of the world-wide Church.
>
> This is no dream. The people are ready to be missionized. The response of those who have been touched by the Spirit, gives every needed assurance that the Catholics of America would, as a rule, welcome a participation in the mission movement. They wait naturally for the priests, and the priests wait for the bishops. And the bishops of the United States are giving unmistakable evidence of a desire, in the midst of many preoccupations, to lead their flocks from the lowlands of parochialism to heights that command all the nations. In this the bishops are actuated by a conviction that faith extending beyond home boundaries, will bring a generous measure of reward.

A new apostolic spirit has come to American Catholics with the great world war. It is only necessary now that all ranks of the Faithful unite solidly and unselfishly in this sublime work of the evangelization of the world.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 4 } MAY 6, 1916 { $3.00 A YEAR
WHOLE No. 369 } { PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, April 25, p. m.-May 2, a. m. —The Surrender at Kut-el-Amara. Great Britain: The Conscription Crisis. Ireland: The Uprising—Repressive Measures. Italy: Census Figures. Mexico: General Conditions—Religious Liberty. Spain: The Elections.....73-76

TOPICS OF INTEREST

I–The Catholic Charities and the Strong Commission—Spring and the Story of God—II–The Popes and Peace—Simplicity of Life—Catholic Landmarks of St. Louis.....77-84

COMMUNICATIONS

Human Vivisection—"Androcles and the Lion" —Correct Ecclesiastical Titles—A Catholic Work of Art.....84, 85

EDITORIALS

The Unity Conference—"Fabulous History"— "Catholic Hospital Conference" — "Man-Made Laws"—Tangled Paths—The Cruelly Slandered Editor 86-88

LITERATURE

The Fragrant Stars.

BOOK REVIEWS: Michelangelo—A Book-lover's Holidays in the Open—Only Anne—Bars of Iron—Julia Ward Howe, 1819–1910 — The Old Testament in the Light of Today—Wreckage—The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church—The Jews among the Greeks and Romans.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The March "Best Sellers"— "The Rudder"—"The Red Horizon"—"William Wordsworth: How to Know Him"—"Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty"—"Our Home in Heaven"—"Parish Hymnal"—"Christian Armour for Youth"—"A Controversy on Transmigration"—Some Shakespeare Literature —"Hills of Hingham"—"A Tall Ship and Other Naval Occasions".....89-93

EDUCATION

Catholic Authors in Training Schools.....93, 94

SOCIOLOGY

II–The Santa Maria Institute, Cincinnati..94, 95

NOTE AND COMMENT

Cost of the World-War—Death of the Rev. John Baptist René, S.J.—Demands of Advanced Socialism—Operatic Music in the Church—Catholics Worshiping above a Jewish Clothing Store —Shakespeare Not a Moralist—The High Cost of Publishing — Indoor War Correspondents — Ecclesiastical Architecture 95, 96

CHRONICLE

The War.—A noticeable increase of activity on the part of both British and German infantry has been reported from many points on the sector from Ypres to the district immediately south of Arras, but no important advantage is claimed by either side. The French have had some success at Bois des Buttes, north of the Aisne, and the Germans in the Vosges, northeast of Celles, but in neither case has anything of moment been accomplished. No change has taken place in the situation at Verdun except a diminution in the intensity and frequency of the infantry attacks. The Italians have been on the offensive on the southwestern edge of the Doberdo plateau, but have lost a part of the positions they gained recently on the Col di Lana. Southwest of Lake Narotch the Germans have defeated the Russians and taken, according to their report, more than 5,600 prisoners. In Armenia the Russians claim to have advanced in the direction of Erzingan and to have repulsed the Turkish offensive near Sarem, south of Bitlis. Thirty miles east of the Suez Canal, at Quatia, the Turks have defeated a squadron of British cavalry, but have not been able to secure their hold on the town. The British battleship, Russell, struck a mine in the Mediterranean, and was lost, together with a number of her crew.

Bulletin, April 25, p. m.-May 2, a. m.

The British garrison at Kut-el-Amara has surrendered to the Turks. This force, it will be remembered, began, shortly after Turkey entered the war, to ascend the Tigris with the purpose of capturing Bagdad. The strength of the expedition has never been accurately ascertained, but has been variously estimated at from 25,000 to 50,000 men. For a time the project which involved a march of nearly 300 miles through difficult country seemed destined to achieve success. After fighting two important battles, the army arrived at Ctesiphon, almost within sight of Bagdad. Here, however, it was defeated in a battle lasting three days, and forced to retire. Having retreated ninety miles, always hard pressed by the Turks, and having lost, while doing so, 8,000 men, the British reached Kut-el-Amara, a fortified city which had been captured by them more than two months before. As this place offered favorable opportunities for defense, they determined to make a last stand behind its fortifications. They were at once surrounded by the Turks.

The Surrender of Kut-el-Amara

London realized their danger, and immediately sent another force up the Tigris to their relief. This relief force was reported on one occasion to be only seven miles from the invested garrison. It was beaten back, however, by the Turks, and in spite of continued and costly efforts found itself definitely halted twenty miles from the city. Finally, a body of volunteers tried to run a supply ship past the Turkish lines. The attempt failed, and with its failure disappeared the last hope of saving the garrison, which is said to have almost completely exhausted its supplies. Accordingly Major-General Townshend, who was in command at Kut-el-Amara and had held the Turks at bay for 143 days, surrendered after having destroyed all guns and the ammunition that remained. The London War Office puts the number of troops surrendered at 9,000, whereas Constantinople's official report states that 13,300 men were captured.

Great Britain.—The precise reason of the country-wide agitation on the question of military conscription is not clear to those who have pinned their faith on figures hitherto given out under official sanction. Even after weeks of debate, it is not easy to get at the facts in the case. On April 25, after a secret session of Parliament, Premier Asquith announced, through the official press bureau, that "the recruiting up to date, had fallen short of the requirements necessary for our proper military efforts." The Government, therefore, had determined upon three proposals: to prolong to the end of the war the service of time-expired men, to authorize the transfer to any unit, of the territorial troops, and to render exempted men liable to immediate service upon the expiration of their certificate of exemption. On the same occasion, Mr. Asquith further stated:

The Conscription Crisis

(1) The Government, recognizing that the necessary number will not be available for service in the time required under the present arrangements, agree to an immediate effort to obtain men by voluntary enlistment of the unattested and married. (2) If, on May 27, 50,000 of these men have not been secured by direct enlistment, Parliament will forthwith be asked for compulsory powers. (3) If, in any week after May 27, 15,000 have not directly enlisted, the same course will be taken. The surplus of one week will be carried over to the next. (4) Arrangements two and three hold good until 200,000 unattested men have been obtained. In the meantime the Government will constantly review the position. Under the scheme the main ground alleged for the release of the attested married men disappears.

On April 28, a bill providing for the conscription of all unmarried men between the ages of 18 and 45 was introduced, only to arouse such strong opposition that the Government decided not to press the measure. On being asked what course the Government proposed to adopt, Mr. Asquith answered that the decision would be announced later. According to the Daily Mail, two courses are before the Government, either to proceed at once to adopt universal conscription, or to return to the plan stated above by Mr. Asquith. The Coalition Cabinet is plainly facing its greatest crisis.

Ireland.—On April 25 dissatisfaction in Ireland culminated in a serious revolt against British rule. Trouble had been brewing for some time, for much enmity had been aroused by the disarming of some of the "Irish Volunteers" and the threatened deportation of others. Not long before the revolt actually took place mass meetings were held in Dublin, at the Mansion House and in Beresford Place, to protest against the impending exile of Messrs. Blythe and Mellows, prominent "Volunteers." The Irish papers commented on the significant fact that though the meetings were attended by "an extraordinarily large mass of people," yet the Irish Party was not represented. The temper of those present may be judged from this resolution passed at the Mansion House:

The Uprising

This public meeting of Dublin citizens in the Mansion House of Dublin asks all the Irish people to join in opposing the Government's attitude, unanimously condemned by national opinion last year, and now renewed, to send Irishmen into banishment from Ireland.

New Ireland states that Alderman Kelly who proposed the resolution demanded that, if Messrs. Blythe and Mellows were guilty of any offense, a charge should be made against them; if no charge was to be made, the people of Ireland could not afford to submit to the tyranny of their exile. Professor Eoin MacNeill also made an incisive speech, part of which the Leader synopsized as follows:

They were arresting Irish Volunteers because they (the British) were now what they always were, and they were the same a hundred years ago, trying to crush Irish nationality. He knew Blythe and Mellows well as honest and honorable men, who did not care what sacrifice was exacted from them for the sake of Ireland—down to the last sacrifice. . . .

An outrage had been prepared, and, he believed, with a deliberate object, the hope that those who were responsible for the Irish Volunteer Movement would allow their conduct and line of action to be dictated to them and laid down for them by those who were their enemies, who would be able to make their plans accordingly. It was thought that they would be provoked and exasperated to such a degree that either those responsible would lose self-control or that the men of the Irish Volunteers would lose their discipline. He wished to state that the Volunteers' plans would still be their plans and their policy would be their policy, and they would not be diverted from what they had undertaken to do by attempts at exasperation or provocation.

After this, events moved rapidly, and on April 25 the British Government made this announcement:

During the period between the afternoon of April 20 and the afternoon of April 21 an attempt to land arms and ammunition in Ireland was made by a vessel under the guise of a neutral merchant ship, but which in reality was a German auxiliary, in conjunction with a German submarine. The auxiliary sank and a number of prisoners were made, among whom was Sir Roger Casement.

On Monday, April 24, Mr. Birrell, Chief Secretary for Ireland, informed the House of Commons that serious disturbances had taken place in Dublin. His announcement reads:

At noon yesterday serious disturbances broke out in Dublin. A large party of men identified with the Sinn Fein Party, mostly armed, occupied Stephens Green, and took possession forcibly of the Post Office, where they cut the telegraphic and telephone wires. Houses also were occupied in Stephens Green, Sackville Street, Abbey Street and along the quays. In the course of the day soldiers arrived from the Curragh and the situation is now well in hand. So far as is known here, three military officers, four or five soldiers, two loyal volunteers and two policemen have been killed and four or five military officers and seven or eight soldiers and six volunteers wounded. No exact information has been received of the casualties on the side of the Sinn Feiners. Reports received from Cork, Limerick, Ennis, Tralee, and both ridings of Tipperary show that no disturbances of any kind have occurred in these localities.

The next day the Premier, Mr. Asquith, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Baron Wimborne, made reassuring statements about conditions in the Irish capital and in the country at large, but on Thursday, April 27, the Prime Minister informed the Commons that fighting was still in progress in Dublin and that the rebellion had spread to Connaught and to the counties of Limerick, Tipperary and Clare. Meantime Irish opinion showed sharp division. Sir Edward Carson, Unionist Leader, stated that he would gladly join hands with Mr. Redmond and the Nationalists in an effort to put down the rebellion. Mr. Redmond replied:

> In behalf of all my colleagues and the overwhelming majority of the Irish people, I wish to express my cordial detestation of the acts of the Dublin rioters. I will heartily join with Sir Edward in the hope that the situation will not be taken advantage of by any political party.

Others, however, were of a different mind, and the revolt continued to spread. It soon reached Ardee and Louth, Swords and Lusk, and on Friday, April 28, Lord Lansdowne reported that the "rebels in Dublin still held the City Hall, the Four Courts, the Western Road and Amiens Road railway stations." On April 29, Field-Marshal French issued an announcement to the effect that "military operations for the suppression of the rebellion in Dublin were proceeding satisfactorily." The announcement continues:

> What may be described as the organized forces of the rebels are confined to a few localities, the principal one being the Sackville Street district, in which the rebel headquarters appear to be the General Post Office. . . . Sniping from houses in which small parties of rebels have established themselves in various parts of the city still continues. The district where this is most prevalent is that northwest of the Four Courts, which are still in the possession of the rebels. The clearance of these snipers is a matter of time. Considerable damage was caused by fires on the 27th, and a large fire is still burning in Sackville Street. In the other parts of Ireland the principal centers of disturbances are in County Galway and in Enniscorthy. Disturbances also are reported at Killarney, Clonmel and Gorey. The other parts of Ireland appear normal.

On the day that this report was made Baron Wimborne gave an interview to representatives of the press in which he mentioned the places where fighting occurred. They are Dublin, Athenry, another, but unnamed, Galway town, Enniscorthy, in County Wexford, "and there were certain rebellious assemblages in Meath and Louth." This is not in entire agreement with former reports, and it is impossible, just now, to say which report is most accurate.

In this same statement, Baron Wimborne also said that "a proclamation issued by the rebels announcing the foundation of the Irish Republic was signed by seven persons including J. F. Clark, Connolly, Pearse, and MacDermott." Pearse, headmaster of St. Edna's School, was named president of the republic.

If the British press is to be believed, the outbreak was not wholly unexpected. The London Daily Chronicle declares:

Repressive Measures

> The Sinn Fein outbreak in Dublin will not come as a bolt from the blue to any one who has been keeping in touch with Irish affairs. Ever since the Ulster Volunteers under Sir Edward Carson's leadership set the deplorable example of open lawlessness and armed defiance of the Crown in the months before the war, the temptation to all extremists on the other side of St. George's Channel has been to preach violence as the one argument to which English rule must listen. Less than a month ago the Ulster Volunteers perpetrated a sensational act of lawlessness at Beragh, near Portadown. A large detatchment of them, with rifles and ammunition, marched to a hall which was being built for the Hibernians, utterly demolished it, and subjected the houses of local Roman Catholics to a fusillade of shots. With such provocation in the North the armed strength of the Sinn Fein must have grown easily further south.

The easy and immediate capture of Casement lends color to the view that the British Government had some foreknowledge of the uprising. What preparations had been made to meet the emergency is not clear. After the revolt started, Sir John Maxwell, formerly in command of the British troops in Egypt, was ordered to Dublin, to take full military control, and on Thursday, April 27, British regulars arrived in the Irish capital from Belfast and England, with orders to retake Stephens Green, Liberty Hall and several other important posts captured by the Sinn Feiners. Martial law was proclaimed in the city and county of Dublin, and the Government suspended for Ireland section one of the Defense of the Realm Amendment Act of 1905, which gives to a British subject charged with an offense under the act the right to be tried by a civil court. By Friday, April 28, martial law had been declared throughout the entire country, and about the same time the strictest military censorship was established and still prevails at this writing. The Belfast News Letter of April 29 stated that during the night of April 26 a gunboat "shelled the Sinn Feiners out of Liberty Hall." This was confirmed later, and about the same time dispatches announced that the post-office, which the "rebels" occupied, had been burned. Connolly, a leader in the movement, was first reported killed, then captured. After this, it was officially announced that the "back of the revolution had been broken," and the papers of May 1, printed a proclamation from the "provisional president of the Irish Republic," advising all in revolt to lay down their arms. Finally the surrender of all the leaders was cabled.

Italy.—Rome publishes an interesting analysis of the results of the Italian census of 1911, which has only quite recently appeared. The population of the Kingdom in 1911, was 35,597,784; of these only 79,756 were foreigners. In 1910, Germany with its population of 65,000,000 had 1,260,000 foreigners; France with 40,000,000 had probably over 2,000,000 foreigners. The absence of foreign visitors in Italy since the outbreak of the war is a serious loss for the country, and most serious for Rome especially. It is estimated that before the war, tourists and pilgrims spent in Italy every year at least 600,000,000 francs; but since August,

Census Figures

1914, there have been few visitors from other countries. Of greater interest are the figures concerning the religious belief of the people. Thus, 32,983,664 declared themselves Catholics; the Protestants resident in Italy, including the foreigners, numbered 123,253; the Jews numbered 34,324; the Greek Schismatics, 2,200. The figures for the Protestants do not indicate that they are making much progress in spite of the vast amount of money spent every year on their missions. The great majority of strangers resident in Italy are Protestants; the Waldensians, an old sect in Italy, account for most of the other Protestants. The Baptists and Methodists have only a few thousands in their ranks.

But the most significant fact of the census, from a religious standpoint, is that the number of persons who declared themselves and their children atheists was 874,522, while 653,404 refused to make any statement as to their religious beliefs. The atheists and the silent ones are most numerous where Socialism has taken deepest root and is most widely diffused; Emilia, Tuscany, Lombardy, Piedmont and Liguria account for nearly a million of them. In Emilia there are some districts where the churches are almost entirely abandoned, and where the people are almost as pagan as their ancestors of two thousand years ago. This change has come about during the last few decades. Rome adds these significant words: "A corrupting press, fanatical zeal on the part of Socialist propagandists, and, it is to be feared, lassitude on the part of Catholics, are mainly responsible for this deplorable state of things."

Mexico.—General conditions in Mexico still continue bad; money and food are scarce, disease and discontent are widespread. Villa is still unaccounted for, and our Government has sent an extra 1,000 cavalrymen in search of him. General Scott has met Obregon in conference at Juarez, with a view to settling some international difficulties. At this writing the problems under discussion have not been made known officially. However it is stated with some degree of authority that Obregon requested that all American troops be withdrawn from Mexico. According to report the counter proposals suggested are: (1) Cooperation of the Carranzistas with Americans in the pursuit of Villa; (2) Cooperation with Americans in forwarding supplies to our soldiers in Mexico; (3) Use of railroads for American expeditionary forces; (4) Extension of American lines to Casas Grandes at least, and lastly, permission for Americans to police a zone consisting of the territory just south of the international boundry.

General Conditions

Some two weeks ago Calles, Governor of Sonora, issued a decree exiling all priests from the State. His reason was that he had intercepted a letter from Bishop Valdespino of Aguascalientes, in which the prelate remarked: "Perhaps there will come happy days to our country." The Governor declared that this sentence referred to a new revolution, and the priests were expelled. The interpretation is absurd; moreover, as AMERICA pointed out at the time the Calles decree was issued, the Bishop never wrote such a letter. This opinion is now confirmed by a sworn statement of the prelate who says:

Religious Liberty

> I further authorize the statement that the entire report as coming from me is absolutely false, without the remotest semblance of truth, given out for the purpose of prejudicing the minds of the Mexican people against the Catholic clergy, if not directly against me. IGNACIO VALDESPINO, > Bishop of Aguascalientes.

The infamous action of the Governor is quite in keeping with Carranzista methods. Conditions in Yucatan may be appraised from these jottings from Merida:

> Alvarado's hatred for religion is stronger than his allegiance to the First Chief. Carranza, self-appointed supreme ruler of our nation, has declared that he alone can dispose of churches, shrines, etc., yet Alvarado has confiscated many churches and turned them into warehouses, workshops, Masonic halls and so on. The Franciscan church of "Mejorada" is now used as a storage place for whiskey and other alcoholic beverages. Such treatment for the Franciscans who civilized our Indians! Socialistic meetings are frequently held in the chapel, "Divino Maestro." The church of "Candelaria" has been seized and closed. In the first week of April, the beautiful sixteenth-century reredos in the Cathedral was torn to pieces by order of the Government. A late report has it that Alvarado intends to forbid all Holy Week services.

This is the way the promised liberty of conscience is working out. One fruit of this liberty is benefit to certain thrifty Americans who have been bringing into this country from Mexico exquisite vestments, altar vessels, statues, etc., obtained no one knows how. Recently a woman, entering the port of New York, declared $400 worth of "household furniture"; on examination this "furniture" was found to contain church furnishings worth $2,500; other undeclared articles in the same luggage were valued at $1,500. This is but a small portion of the loot, for great quantities have been shipped through Galveston and Laredo, Texas.

Spain.—Partial returns for the elections of members of the Cortes show that 250 Liberals, 80 Conservatives, and about 15 Radicals and Republicans have been seated. If the Liberals maintain their superiority over the Conservatives, Count Alvaro Romanones, the present Premier and Liberal Leader, will have an overwhelming majority to support him in his rather drastic and radical policies. He has so far relied on the support of a majority composed of a combination of Liberal and Conservative elements. The Count is strongly in favor of the Allies. Since he became Prime Minister he, like his predecessor Dato, has officially remained neutral. But before assuming office he plainly indicated where his sympathies lay.

The Elections

TOPICS OF INTEREST

I—The Catholic Charities and the Strong Commission

At last the "testimony" is in. Somewhat ragged it is, inconsequential, disreputable and inconsistent; but such as it is, it is "in," and has been delivered into the keeping of the Strong Commission. The Scribes and Pharisees of the new philanthropy, who for years have been attacking in secret the Catholic charitable institutions of New York, have asked for, and have been accorded, their full day in open court. The grant was the triumph, after years of expectation, and they spared no pains in preparing for an attack to be made under the sanction of an "investigation." Now they have said their worst, and have done their worst. By insinuation, by implication, by open assertion, they have striven to destroy the work and reputation of heroic men and women, the latchets of whose shoes they are unworthy to loose. They found the Catholic charities of New York refusing to pay tribute to the modern pagan philanthropy; for this blasphemy, they marked the Catholic institutions of New York for death. A tool was needed; they found one, did these modern Scribes and Pharisees, in a "devout Roman Catholic," but he could not give that for which they had bargained. Therefore, other "proofs of guilt" were necessary.

The true spirit of the modern sociology, craven, dishonorable and despicable, was never shown more clearly than in the means adopted by its followers to secure this "proof." Prating loudly of "ideals," "honor," "humanity," and with many claptrap phrases presenting their satisfied, sanctified selves as the ultimate types of moral goodness and social holiness, this noisome crew of "reformers" did not hesitate to make full use of such exalted methods of regeneration as systematic eavesdropping and an anonymous, lying pamphlet. This dastardly and unwarranted form of espionage was exercised over a Catholic priest of blameless reputation, nor is it entirely clear that it was not extended to venerable prelates, and all, to our shame be it spoken, by permission of the highest authorities of the city of New York. But the effort failed. No guilt was found, because there was no guilt, save in those who sought to find it in men immeasurably superior to themselves.

But it is not within the province of the present paper to discuss the origin and purpose of the Strong Commission, further than to say that it was appointed by the Governor of New York to investigate the incompetency or worse, alleged against the State Board of Charities by the Department of Charities of the City of New York. Nor will any attempt be made to sift the vast mass of "testimony" which, in its supreme wisdom, the Strong Commission saw fit to admit and to record. These phases of the Commission's activities will be fully discussed in subsequent papers. But it will be profitable to note here, that the whole course of the Commission's work, together with the public comment which it aroused, has served to stress two important, and sometimes unsuspected, facts. The first is, that between the principles of Catholicism and the principles of modern sociology, upon which many unwary Catholics have looked with approval, there is an essential and irreconcilable antagonism. The second is the real danger, with which our Catholic institutions of charity and reform are threatened by that highly-organized agency of paganism, modern sociology and its allies.

The precise reason of this essential antagonism is readily stated. The Church is from God; modern sociology is not; for like the present-day "non-sectarian" education, it has severed all relations with Him. To modern sociology, belief in God and in revealed religion may be a force of social value, like education, or a fondness for "old Greek things," or for clean streets, or a love for flowers, or a taste for music. But it is nothing more. It is not a thing to die for, nor, under given circumstances, should it be allowed to hinder the development of what the individual conceives to be "the fullness of his perfection." But to the Catholic, "religion's all, or nothing." It comes from God; it must lead back to God. It imposes upon every human being an obligation which may not be evaded. It is a strict rule of life, from which no human activity may be completely dissociated. It is not a mere sentiment, an opinion lightly assumed and as lightly discarded, but a revelation, complete, final, satisfying, supernatural; a conviction that underlies all life while it guides it, and for the preservation of which, life itself should be gladly sacrificed. It is first in his life and in his esteem; for it is the one thing of supreme importance.

Now to say that sociology, in its modern aspect, has completely broken away, not only from the high Catholic ideal of man and his destiny, but from all notions of the supernatural by which man in the present order is de facto surrounded, is but to state a truism. The modern sociologist admits the fact, if he does not even boast of it. To him, man is purely a creature of time. The tenuous theories of an extreme evolution may or may not explain his origin; but this, at least, is certain, that there is no place in sociology for an Infinite Creator, nor, by consequence, for any valid theory of man's essential duty to God as his Creator. As to man's final destiny, modern sociology is silent. Thus, after calmly eliminating God and the supernatural from the scheme of possibilities, the modern sociologist sets up his own standard of morality. How far this morality will differ from the morality proposed and defended since the days of Jesus Christ by the Catholic Church, is evidenced by the fact that, while the Church bases her teaching upon Divine Revelation, the modern sociologist finds his theoretical standard of morality in "the highest good of the community." Practically, however, this standard falls to a form of individual utilitarianism, with the individual, of course, as the supreme judge. For few men there are, even among the modern sociologists, who will subordinate a present, private gratification or advantage, to a future possible, or even present and actual, good of so cold and impersonal an entity as "the community." Nor indeed, granting their assumptions, is there any reason why this personal subordination should be admitted.

That this character sketch of the modern sociology is not overdrawn, is clear from a brief review of the text-books most in favor in the schools. Thus, for instance, authors so conservative as Professors Blackmar and Gillin, in their "Outlines of Sociology," regard the question of the origin of the Christian religion as "having no bearing upon the question of whether or not there was a revelation by which man became conscious of the will of God." What God is, the authors nowhere attempt to determine; even He does not seem to be essential to religion. Indeed, I know of not one text-book, written by a non-Catholic, which so much as teaches His bare existence; an important and significant omission in these days, when sociology is setting up its shifting standards of right and wrong, and attempting to legislate for the multifarious needs of man. "Jesus, Paul, Mohammed, and Buddha" are bracketed by our "conservative" professors, as religious prophets of equal value and importance. Morality consists of an ever-changing complexus of human opinions; it is "governed by social sanctions or social disapprovals"; justice is "ethical relations sanctioned by the State," while the natural law is "a delusion." With these and similar aberrations premised, the student of Blackmar and Gillin need not be surprised, that the liceity of absolute divorce is conceded, though occasionally deplored; that care is taken to point out the "social and economic advantages" of race-suicide; and that the learned authors foresee a day, when "with the growth of science . . . we shall take care against the possible weakening of the race through the saving of those who under harsher conditions would not live to perpetuate their kind."

It would be easy to multiply quotations. Indeed, Blackmar and Gillin have been accused of too much conservatism; Zueblin, Mangold, Devine, Flexner, Giddings, Wallis, and other prophets of the modern sociology, frankly avow their complete independence of what they would doubtless term the outworn creed and morality of the Catholic Church. From their point of view, their course is thoroughly justified; but to the Catholic social worker, it is nothing less than a return to paganism and a rather degraded paganism at that. It is imperative that we Catholics, clergy and lay alike, thoroughly realize this fact. Founded upon a philosophy of revolt, which is fast becoming a deification of the State, and propagated by interests that are tireless and often unscrupulous in their methods, the modern sociology is developing into as great a danger to religion, as its allied product, the modern school from which God has been utterly excluded. In some respects, it is a more serious menace. Trained in principles ultimately destructive of faith and morality, the typical modern social worker is entering deeply, intruding rather, into the family and social life of the poor and the neglected. For what appears to be a temporal advantage, he will counsel conscious birth-restriction, sterilization, marriages forbidden by the Church, divorce, or legal remarriage after divorce. Of a future life, of the individual's strict accountability to an Infinite Judge, he knows or cares nothing. If we Catholics, especially in the larger cities, do not take immediate steps to neutralize his work, by even greater devotion to the poor than we have hitherto shown, we will soon realize to our cost and perhaps to the loss of immortal souls for whom Christ died, that the modern social worker constitutes a greater danger to faith and morals, than godless schools or the despicable ever-present proselyter.

For the present, the Strong Commission has ceased to be. The Department of Charities of the City of New York has explained, quite fully, the principles upon which it intends to proceed, and the animus by which it is guided. For this Catholics may be thankful. Called from the quiet of their convent homes, religious women were heckled and cross-examined by men absolutely incapable of understanding the elementary principle upon which Catholic charities are based: the love of God. With somewhat disastrous results to its assumed dignity, the Department summoned a Catholic priest, the Rev. W. B. Farrell, who, in carefully chosen words, voiced the opinion of thousands of citizens, Catholics and non-Catholics, on the influences which called the Commission into being. What recommendations the Strong Commission may feel entitled to urge upon Governor Whitman, must be left to conjecture. But what the modern sociologists think these recommendations should include, may be seen in the following remarks, uttered some eight years ago, by Mr. Edward T. Devine, Director of the New York School of Philanthropy, and, in the opinion of Mr. William J. Doherty, himself an eminent "charity expert," "the standard-bearer of all social workers":

> I am prepared to say that the day of the private institution and reformatory, and the day of the private hospital, has gone past forever, so far as their relation to the civic corporation is concerned. I wish I could say that this is already true of the city of New York. Unfortunately the figures of the last six years show that we have not all proceeded in the right direction and have increased our payments to private institutions, and I for one say it is wrong. Why have we done it? It is because we have in this city a well-organized Catholic interest, whose power and influence with the public officials is such that they dare not deny them anything.

This high-minded indignation cools somewhat, when it is remembered that in 1913 the Catholic institutions in the City of New York received, not in charity, but in part payment for work done for the city, the sum of $2,717,691.67, and expended in work done for the city, besides the labor involved, $4,544,564. This reflection, however, is somewhat beside the point. Mr. Devine on the occasion in question announced his hostility to the private institution. Neither he nor those who profess to think with him have ever retracted that declaration. The exclusion of the private institution, not merely from participation in public moneys in part return for services rendered, but from the legal right to exist, is the aim of the modern sociologist. For charity, he holds, no less than education, is a function pertaining exclusively to the State. Herein is the ultimate cause of the Strong Commission, a crass materialism that would turn the State into a god, and would recognize no creed save one, the omnipotence of the Commonwealth.

Like war, pestilence, earthquakes, famine, and other natural scourges, the Commission has not been utterly without profit. It has forced the modern sociologists and their henchmen, the members of the New York "Charity Trust," to declare their principles. These, together with a few of the many methods now in favor with these light-bearers of civilization, will be further discussed in future issues of AMERICA.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

Spring and the Story of God

THE only two things that can satisfy the soul are a person and a story; and even a story must be about a person. There are indeed very voluptuous appetites and enjoyments in mere abstractions, like mathematics, logic, or chess. But these mere pleasures of the mind are like mere pleasures of the body. That is, they are mere pleasures, though they may be gigantic pleasures; they can never by a mere increase of themselves amount to happiness. A man just about to be hanged may enjoy his breakfast, especially if it is his favorite breakfast; and in the same way he may enjoy an argument with the chaplain about heresy, especially if it is his favorite heresy. But whether he can enjoy either of them does not depend on either of them; it depends upon his spiritual attitude towards a subsequent event. And that event is really interesting to the soul, because it is the end of a story and, as some hold, the end of the person.

Now it is this simple truth which, like many others, is too simple for our scientists to see. This is where they go wrong, not only about true religion, but about false religions, too; so that their account of mythology is more mythical than the myth itself. I do not confine myself to saying that they are quite incorrect when they state, for instance, that Christ was a legend of dying and reviving vegetation, like Adonis or Persephone. I say that even if Adonis were a god of vegetation, they have got the whole notion of him wrong. Nobody, to begin with, is sufficiently interested in decaying vegetables, as such, to make any particular mystery or disguise about them; and certainly not enough to disguise them under the image of a very handsome young man, which is a vastly more interesting thing. If Adonis was connected with the fall of leaves in autumn and the return of flowers in spring, the process of thought was quite different. It is a process of thought that springs up spontaneously in all children and young artists; it springs up spontaneously in all healthy societies. It is very difficult to explain in a diseased society.

It is something like this. Men, looking suddenly at spring flowers, have a poignant sense of being at once intoxicated and unsatisfied; a feeling only to be expressed in the words: "What is it all about?" What is that shining mystery which is called the beauty of this world? Who did it, why did they do it, what are they going to do next, what shall I do about it, what does it mean? The vegetation considered as a process, man could in almost any age have explained simply as a process; he knew lots of processes, bodily, domestic, utilitarian, which worked like clockwork, and to which he never attached any sanctity. What demanded explanation was not the process but his interest in the process; the wordless emotions that mastered him at the sight of certain things and not of others. It was not so much a question of a certain system in the world as a certain spell laid upon him; and it may be noted that travelers and missioners, the most sagacious and the most superficial, all report that in barbaric tribes the minimum of religion is always a belief in the charm or witchcraft of certain creatures and things. It was not the opening of the flowers that the man wanted explained, but the opening of his own heart when he saw them. Religion did not begin in botany, but in something far higher. There are a number of excellent people called agnostics, now probably numbering a majority of the most educated and influential class in society, who sincerely say that the soul does ask this passionate and personal question, but that there is no answer. I am not arguing with these people, not just now. I merely record what the responsible among them will all admit; that in heroic states of youth or simplicity the question is always asked; often, in subjective opinion, answered; and that whenever it can be said to be answered it is always answered in one way. The soul is satisfied, the soul can be satisfied, only by something involving a person or a story. Any explanation is good enough for grass, which today is and tomorrow is cast into the oven. But only one explanation is good enough for the beauty of grass. It is the explanation that springs to the lips of every good savage, of every good poet and, I may add, of every good theologian. It is a God.

Then comes the next great leap of the liberated soul which the scientists cannot comprehend. The fascination of the flowers, when once it has touched the soul, demands a story and a person. The moment the person is believed in, he turns ten thousand times bigger than the flowers or even the story. He does what nothing but a person can do, he explains. The baffling beauty which called him forth as an hypothesis becomes his mere adjunct and ornament. As the simple person sees it, the flowers were but a few hints that there was a story; and now the story has begun. For the soul cares no more for primroses than Disraeli did; it cares for the story of the spring, because it is a detective story.

A child does not look at the lustrous lattice-work of the frost and say: "This can only be explained on the hypothesis that a man called Jack Frost does it with his finger." He feels that such feathery exactitude suggests the finger of somebody; and as he is not allowed, in the best regulated modern families, to say that it is the finger of God, he says it is Jack Frost or anyone else he happens to have heard of. The process which remains perfectly direct and prompt is the passage from the idea of beauty to the idea of personality; art cries out for an artist. It is plainly impossible that so standard a work as the universe should remain anonymous.

But when a child has thought of Jack Frost he thinks more of Jack Frost than of the frost itself. The pattern only excites; but the person satisfies. By the end of the business the child has begun to feel that Jack Frost has rather honored the windows by drawing on them at all. He is superior to windows, superior even to winter: he is what no dead things can be, he is in a story. As these children think about winter, so have all the children of men always thought about autumn and spring. If all this beauty meant purpose, the purpose took the first place; if not, the beauty was hardly even beautiful. If the flowers meant a god, they were flung at the feet of the god. If they did not mean a god, they were flung away.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

II—The Popes and Peace

"IF I were not Napoleon, I should like to be Gregory VII." These words may reveal the pride of the conqueror to whom they are ascribed; they also express his admiration for the incomparable pontiff and statesman who, in a lawless and iron age, preached the blessings of order and peace, compelled princes and emperors and, more difficult still, a worldly and corrupt priesthood to obey the laws of justice and mercy, of righteousness and purity. St. Gregory VII, the stern Pope who kept an emperor, clad in penitential garb, shivering in the snow before the gates of Canossa, is not usually depicted as an advocate or an apostle of peace. His enemies have described him as a meddling, heartless, selfish and domineering despot. A Protestant author, Voigt, has fully cleared him of these charges. An impartial survey of Gregory's reign proves that he earnestly and unceasingly toiled in the interest of peace.

When on the death of Pope Alexander II in 1073, the Archdeacon Hildebrand, the adviser and right arm of the five preceding Pontiffs, the confidant and bosom-friend of Pope St. Leo IX, ascended the Fisherman's throne under the name of Gregory VII, the Church and the State stood in sore need of his sanctity, his fiery zeal, his fortitude and fearlessness. The disorders of his age have been described in vigorous and startling language by a contemporary, St. Peter Damian. If ever peace were needed, it was at the end of the eleventh century. It was one of those periods of transition and transformation, when a new society and a nobler civilization were in the making and at a stage when their jarring elements would take shape only at some masterful and creative voice whose command would crystallize them into harmony and unity. Wherever he looked, Gregory saw neither the factors nor the friends of peace. The Church was enslaved by the civil power. Simony, corruption, and worldliness had invaded the sanctuary. Cruel wars were heedlessly undertaken and ruthlessly waged. Princes and rulers plundered the people and were sapping the very foundations on which society rests. It was the age of the fickle, cruel and immoral Henry IV of Germany; of the able but sensual Philip I of France. If from western Europe the Pope looked to Constantinople, he saw the Seljuk Turks defeating Romanus Diogenes on the field of Manzikert, and dealing a staggering blow to the Byzantine empire. But in brave Countess Matilda of Tuscany he was to find a constant helper and ally, and in the stern Norman, William the Conqueror, an admirer and friend who was, however, too busy in consolidating his newly-won conquest to be of much assistance. Throughout his reign, Gregory had but one ideal, one policy and dream, the moral reformation of clergy and people, and the complete liberation of the Church and the Papacy from the unwarranted assumptions of the civil power and the empire. In his struggle for this end, his most notorious but by no means his only adversary was Henry IV of Germany. But though Gregory had good cause to complain of him, he would not stoop to wrong and injustice to defeat him. In January, 1077, he had seen the Emperor kneeling penitent at his feet, and he was willing to give him a fair trial and see whether the monarch would keep his solemnly plighted word. In opposing Henry, Gregory was furthering the cause of peace, opposing tyranny and standing up for an outraged people's rights. But the severe lesson Henry had received at Canossa effected little or no improvement in his moral or political conduct. Gradually estranged by cruelty, corruption, and tyranny from a ruler on whose oath they could not rely, the German princes met at Forcheim and elected Rudolph of Swabia, king. Two legates of the Pope were present at the election and, moved by the recital of Henry's crimes and the promises of Rudolph not to interfere with the rights of the Church, approved the acts of the assembly. But the Pontiff persistently declared that the election had been made without his knowledge or consent. The Saxon and Thuringian barons mainly responsible for Rudolph's appointment were strongly in favor of the Pope, and the gallant Rudolph was undoubtedly a man after Gregory's heart. But to his everlasting honor, the Pope worked for peace, and instructed his legates to toil for the same purpose. To secure that peace, he was willing to go to Germany and there in a general assembly decide the validity of Henry's and Rudolph's claims. And when before a hundred bishops assembled in the Lateran Henry's ambassadors pleaded their sovereign's cause, Gregory wisely answered that an Imperial Diet presided over by his legates was the only court that could decide the question, and excommunicated those who would dare to thwart such an assembly or oppose its acts. A Court of Arbitration, a Peace Congress was thus proposed. And though the Saxons, his friends, were evidently dissatisfied, the Pope persevered in his peaceful designs. But the two rivals had taken up arms and the bloody battles of Melrichstadt and Flarcheim had been fought without any very decisive results, when a second synod was convened at Rome to decide the quarrel. Only after mature deliberation, and evident proof that Henry had violated all his kingly duties and made himself odious and insupportable by his crimes, was he solemnly excommunicated and the crown given to Rudolph. Gregory had earnestly striven for peace. The fact that he could not finally completely enforce it does not weaken the sincerity of his endeavors or the nobility of his aims.

But if Gregory could not always carry out his noble intentions, he left like Leo the Great and his own namesake, the Doctor and Pope of the seventh century, his bright example to his successors. He had fought for the complete independence of the Church and the Papacy. Another Pope, Innocent III, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, was to fight for the privilege and the right of the Papacy to exercise the plentitude of power in the spiritual and social life of every nation in Christendom. In loftiness of conception, in administrative genius and breadth of view, Innocent III ranks with the greatest geniuses of ancient or modern times. A Cardinal at twenty-nine, he was only thirty-seven when in 1198 he succeeded Pope Celestine III. The noble Conti stock from which he sprang, boasts of having given thirteen Pontiffs to the Holy See. Trained in the schools of Paris, Innocent was one of the keenest jurists of his day. The century to which he gave his name is one of the greatest periods in the world's history. But noble as it was, that age also had to be taught the lesson of peace. With his lofty concept of his office, Innocent constantly strove to enforce this lesson. A year after his election, realizing that the rivalries of the two men who might do much with their united efforts for Christendom, Richard the Lion-hearted of England and Philip Augustus of France, were a serious obstacle to the peace and welfare of Europe, he had induced them by prayers and threats of interdict and excommunication to conclude a truce of five years. A few months after, Richard was mortally wounded by an arrow at the siege of a petty fortress in France. His life was stained by more than one dark crime; but the Crusader-King met his end like a true knight repentant of his sins and forgiving the bowman who had caused his death. Philip now claimed to be released from his oath and again took the field against Richard's successor, King John. Our greatest poet has told us something of the contest. But Innocent, whose watchful eyes were everywhere and whose letters, one of the great monuments of the age, carried their burden of advice, counsel, reproof and warning for every crisis and need, again interfered, and sent a special legate, John, abbot of Casamari, to plead the cause of peace with the French monarch. At the same time he addressed several letters to King John and the Bishops of France. Innocent boldly reminded Philip that the Pope could be no accepter of persons, and that even the world would blame him if he looked to the will of kings and princes rather than to their salvation. He tells him with an apostolic freedom which may sound strange to modern ears:

> No one of sound mind doubts that it is ours to judge of those things which concern the salvation or the damnation of the soul. And . . . to attack God's servants, to destroy religious houses . . . and to shed human blood deserve perpetual damnation and the loss of eternal salvation. If on such a matter the word of God was tied in our mouth, . . . with justice would the blood of so many thousands of men be required at our hands.

Innocent obtained, it is true, but a partial victory. It was a giant's task to make these stern warriors understand the blessings of peace. War was their trade and they joyed in the shock of onset. Too often they treated with scant courtesy the prayers and the threats of the Vicars of Christ. But gradually the message of the Great Champions of Peace sank into the hearts of these rude but chivalrous fighters. The Popes could not always stay the uplifted battle-ax and the leveled spear, but they kept before the world the fair and alluring vision of white-robed peace. Had it not been for the efforts of Roman Pontiffs like Innocent III; like his immediate successor, Honorius III, the "Peace-Maker" between Philip II of France and James of Aragon, between the same Philip and Henry III of England, between Ferdinand III and Alfonso IX of Leon, between the Greeks and the Latins in Cyprus; like Innocent IV and Nicholas III; even in the thirteenth century that vision would have forever disappeared. Every impartial observer will agree with the Protestant Sismondi's verdict: "In the midst of the conflicts of jurisdictions, the Pope alone proved to be the defender of the people, the only pacifier of great disturbances." And Puffendorf was not mistaken when he wrote these words: "The suppression of the authority of the Pope has sowed endless germs of discord in the world."

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

Simplicity of Life

EVERY now and then most people in this country have read a sensational announcement that the bread in common use at the present time, and especially the very white bread of whose snowy appearance the modern housewife is so proud, lacks certain important and even essential elements of food. An article in the recent number of the Public Health Reports summarizes the information obtained upon this question by the United States

Public Health Service. It confirms the ideas of those who insist that not only was the old-fashioned and darker bread much more nutritious than white bread, but that it actually contained materials essential to health, which are entirely lacking in the modern white bread. The report says:

> The highly-milled products, that is, the patent process flours, are often deficient in certain essential accessory food substances which are designated as vitamines. These substances are located in the intact kernel of the wheat, in the outer layers and probably also in the germs. The modern roller process eliminates to a great extent the bran and germ and the resulting wheat flour is deficient in these substances.

The same thing is true not only of wheat flour, but of corn flour and grits, or hominy, which are prepared for the market in the same way. Fortunately on account of the variety in diet so prevalent at the present time, the vitamines which are absolutely necessary for health are obtained from other sources.

Experiments have shown that when fowl are fed on an exclusive diet of wheat, corn, or old-fashioned whole wheat flour, or so-called "water ground" corn meal, they will live in perfect health for many months. If these same creatures are fed on the modern highly-milled products they will die within a month or two of a curious spreading affection of the nerves called polyneuritis, which resembles in many ways the disease among human beings called beriberi. Beriberi is quite common among rice-eating peoples but only among those who attempt to live on polished rice. Manifestly the process of making the rice look attractive has exactly the same effect on it as the modern milling of wheat and corn has upon the nutritive value of wheat flour, and corn meal. Similar experiments have likewise shown that bread or cakes, corn bread or corn muffins made with baking soda are distinctly lacking in the vitamines. This is due to the fact demonstrated by Sullivan, the bio-chemist of the Public Health Service, and Carl Voegtlin, Professor of Pharmacology, that alkalis are distinctly destructive of the vitamines whenever these substances are exposed to high temperature, as in baking while in contact with the alkali.

The reason for the common use of baking soda is that the modern fine white flour and highly-milled corn flour do not yield a bread of the same lightness as the old-fashioned meal when mixed with salt and water. Therefore baking soda has become popular with housekeepers, because it makes bread rise and grow light. Apparently this is an expedient not devoid of danger. Professor Voegtlin suggests the use of buttermilk instead of sweet milk in the preparation of these food products, as it neutralizes the alkalis, prevents destruction of the vitamines and therefore renders the baked materials less dangerous and more nutritious.

Polyneuritis gives rise to painful conditions and disturbance of the muscular action, and it is probable that not a few of the vague "achy" feelings which are so common in this country, and are considered symptoms of chronic rheumatism, are mild forms or initial symptoms of polyneuritis in people who are improperly supplied with vitamines because of their consumption of white bread and other highly-milled products. This whole problem has been worked out by the United States Public Health Service in connection with pellagra which is now found to be due to a lack of vitamines in food. A great many cases of this disease were discovered in the crowded poor-houses and insane asylums whose inmates were fed very largely on bread in various forms deprived of the vitamines either by milling or by the soda used. Having very little eggs, meat, milk, peas, or beans, which are rich in vitamines, in their diet, they soon fell ill from vitamine deficiency. The whole study emphasizes the fact that a variety in the diet is extremely important for health. When the diet is limited and only certain substances are used, such as rice, wheat, and corn, they should be incorporated into the food to a very great extent in the form in which they occur in nature. Efforts to make the food more presentable to the eye, and attempts to simplify the natural old-fashioned baking processes are likely to lead to distinctly lower nutritional value in the materials prepared. We were very prone to look with contempt upon the coarse food of our ancestors, and we consider the recent advances in the preparation of food materials wonderful progress, but after all has been said, the old-fashioned methods were better and the new-fangled ones are distinctly vicious in their results.

The old-fashioned bread, whether made from flour or corn meal or oatmeal, was much harder to eat, but that in itself carried a distinct advantage with it. The chewing of hard bread forms the best possible means of cleansing the teeth thoroughly. The only complete sets of teeth that most of us have ever seen in old people were never touched by a toothbrush. The old folk had chewed vigorously in their younger years on good hard bread, especially crusts, and this helped in the preservation of the teeth. The older days saw a baking once a week. The bread was never eaten till it was two days old. Wash day was Monday and baking day was Friday and the fresh bread so-called made its appearance usually on Sunday for tea. Almost needless to say, such bread required vigorous chewing.

Most old customs of this kind were founded upon certain natural, probably instinctive, inclinations which modern sophistication dismissed as useless or old-fogyish a few years ago, though now we find that for health's sake it would be much better to go back to the consumption of well-dried whole wheat and whole corn bread.

The authoritative information thus afforded by the Government report should be of special service to schools and colleges and communities. Certainly the use of whole wheat bread is one of the things that should be encouraged in youth, for with butter and milk it represents a very complete food. Tastes for life are usually formed in the growing years and a taste for this old-fashioned bread would be particularly precious.

There is a lesson in the result of the investigation that is worth while emphasizing. There has been a definite tendency during the past generation to make things easier and more comfortable for people. Soft bread is provided, and mashed vegetables and chopped foods of various kinds are frequent. These leave the teeth without the work that is necessary to keep them in a healthy condition. Sandwiches are often made with the crusts removed, though the crusts represent the most precious part of the bread. The result has been bad for the general health as well as for the teeth. We have made people more comfortable by the heating arrangements of our houses but the consequence has been a rather alarming increase in the incidence of respiratory diseases. Pneumonia more than rivals tuberculosis as "the Captain of the Men of Death," and together these two diseases account for more than one-fourth of all our deaths. Mankind is constantly seeking ease and comfort but is quite as constantly reminded that advances in this direction are practically always followed by disturbances of health which inflict greater sufferings than the inconveniences men sought to avoid.

The refinements of life are very tempting and usually seem to represent distinct advances. Unless controlled by thorough-going common sense and a definite tendency toward the simple life, they are prone, rather to lead to physical as well as moral deterioration. Man thrives best in a rather changeable temperature while living on coarse food, working hard enough to digest it and taking plenty of air of a temperature considerably lower than that of his body, so as to consume heat energy and arouse appetite. Whenever he tries to avoid these natural trials, disturbance of his system is likely to follow. It is a long while ago since Horace said, "You may drive out nature with a pitchfork if you will, but she will always return." This expression is quite as true in our time as it was in his. JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Catholic Landmarks of St. Louis

SITUATED in one of the most interesting Catholic districts south of Canada and north of Cuba, and looking back over a period of more than 150 years since its foundation, St. Louis may well pride itself upon the number of its Catholic landmarks.

When Pierre Laclede built the first log hut on the present site of the city a savage wilderness stretched westward to the Pacific. But Catholicism had been here a hundred years before in the passing of Father Marquette, and had been beneficially active as early as 1741 in the spiritual labors of Reverend Sebastian Louis Meurin, S.J., who for a quarter of a century ministered to the children of the forest and to the widely scattered white settlers in the territory. The only memorial now left of him is the modest headstone over his grave in the little cemetery at Florissant, the final resting place of all the St. Louis Jesuits.

Most hallowed by Catholic memories is the spot on which the Church of St. Louis now stands, until recently the Cathedral. Tradition and imperfectly authenticated documents indicate the existence of a church built soon after the arrival of the first settlers. Judging, however, from authentic records, the first church was blessed on June 24, 1770. It stood on the corner of Second and Walnut Streets, giving place, in 1818, to a larger structure, erected after the arrival of Bishop Dubourg. Finally in 1834, through the efforts of Bishop Rosati, the old Cathedral, one of the famous edifices of the country, was dedicated. A certain writer said of it:

> It is truly a delightful sight to an American of taste to find in one of the remotest towns of the Union a church decorated with original paintings of Rubens, Raphael, Guido, Paul Veronese, and a number of other paintings by modern masters of the Italian, French and Flemish schools. The ancient and precious gold embroideries which the St. Louis Cathedral possesses would certainly decorate any museum in the world. All this is due to the liberality of the Catholics of Europe, who presented these rich articles to Bishop Dubourg on his last tour through France, Italy, Sicily and the Netherlands.

The old Cathedral is the mother church of hundreds that followed. It is the cradle of much of our Western civilization and Catholicism, and a sanctuary of sacred treasures. Its baptismal record goes back to six years before the Declaration of Independence. It has been the scene of eight episcopal consecrations. Two of the bishops consecrated here were members of the Society of Jesus, and without exception all were for dioceses created out of the diocese of St. Louis. For a decade it was the only place of Catholic worship in the city, save the little chapel of St. Aloysius, served by the Jesuits of St. Louis University.

At the close of the ten-year period just mentioned, a new problem arose for the parish. Its population had grown far beyond the accommodations of the church, and provision had to be made to meet the new conditions. As a result the first church-building epoch followed. Today at Ninth and Barry Streets still stands the earliest of these buildings. It is the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, which was begun by the Vincentian Fathers in 1844. Other churches followed quickly, for instance, St. Patrick's at Sixth and Biddle Streets, commenced by Bishop Kenrick, and St. Joseph's at Eleventh and Biddle Streets, erected by the Jesuits. Each has its striking history of three-quarters of a century's service for the people.

The block of stately commercial buildings between Ninth and Tenth Streets and Washington and Lucas Avenues, now the center of the St. Louis wholesale district, was the birthplace of one of the city's finest Catholic achievements. It tells the story of a century's educational work. It links the Latin Academy, started by Bishop Dubourg, November 15, 1818, with the St. Louis College of 1820, conducted by the secular clergy; with the "Indian Seminary," opened in 1824 at Florissant by the Jesuit Fathers; with their College of 1829, which occupied a part of the aforesaid block; and finally with the extensive group of buildings to be seen today on Grand Avenue, St. Louis University.

When the College that stood on this historic Catholic spot was opened in 1829, St. Louis was a rugged frontier town of 5,000 inhabitants. The building was a structure of three stories, forty by fifty feet, surrounded with ponds and woods and farms. Among the members of its faculty were the famous Indian missionary, the Reverend P. J. De Smet, S.J., and the Reverend James Vandevelde, S.J., who afterwards occupied in turn, the Sees of Chicago and Natchez.

Attached to the building on the northeast corner of the same block is a tablet which completes the story of this spot once consecrated to Catholic activity. It tells of the first St. Francis Xavier Church, the old College Church, which was given a new birth without a new name in the conspicuous Jesuit edifice at Grand Avenue and Lindell Boulevard.

Perhaps, in such a setting of early Catholic educational effort one naturally looks for an institution devoted to young women.

It was not wanting. At Eighth Street and Washington Avenue the Sisters of Charity established in 1843 St. Vincent's Seminary, which in 1875 was moved to Grand and Lucas Avenues, and is now the Rosati-Kain Diocesan High School for Girls. Mention is made of it here merely to complete the story of the old College, since it was established under the direction of the Jesuit Fathers and was in the old College Church parish.

The oldest Catholic landmark in the form of a girl's academy, possessed by St. Louis must be credited to the Religious of the Sacred Heart, the first community of women established in the diocese. As early as 1827 they founded an academy here. It was located on Convent Street, so named on account of the institution. Later it was moved to Maryland Avenue in the West End.

Nine years later the Sisters of St. Joseph came from France and made their first foundation at Carondelet, now the extreme section of the city. The Sisters began their work in a small log cabin on the site of St. Joseph's Academy. This was the first place in the country where the deaf-mute received special attention. Begun in 1844, the work has been carried on continuously by the community ever since. In 1845 the Sisters took charge of a school for colored children on Third Street, a year later opened St. Vincent's, the first parish school in the city and also started in 1846, near the old Cathedral, the orphanage, they still control. In the same year was committed to their wise care the orphanage for boys, then located near the old Cathedral, a charge which remains uninterrupted.

At the corner of Jefferson Avenue and Pine Street is a building which the Catholic eye would suspect of having been diverted from a nobler purpose than its present use indicates. It was once the flourishing Academy of the Loretto Sisters, who arrived in the early forties, but their Academy lost its distinction with the establishment of the present Academy on Lafayette Avenue.

Bearing the marks of many battles with the elements, the recently-abandoned Kenrick Seminary on Cass Avenue tells a long and interesting story. Previous to the Civil War and down to 1892 this was the home of the famous Academy of the Sisters of the Visitation, now at Cabanne Place. It was the third location chosen by them in St. Louis, whither they came from Kaskaskia, Ill.

Close upon seventy years ago the holy standard of St. Ursula was first brought to the United States from Austria and raised over a small house on South Twelfth Street, which had been rented and arranged for school purposes. The year following came another group, and likewise a contribution of $4,000 from King Louis of Bavaria, to be used in the purchase of a site for a convent. The first home of the Ursulines has long ago disappeared, but over and around where it stood have been erected the spacious buildings from Russell to Ann Avenues, making the spot one of precious historic memories.

Out to the northwest on the city's highest elevation is another appealing landmark, the Christian Brothers' College. Sixty-seven years ago it began its work in an old brick house on Chestnut Street, back of and to the west of the old Cathedral, the house that had been occupied for several years as a residence by Bishop Rosati. The following year an increase in the number of pupils compelled the Brothers to seek larger quarters, and a brick building of modest proportions at Eighth and Cerre Streets became the new college. Since 1882 the college has been at Kingshighway and Easton Avenue.

As a fitting climax there remains the St. Louis Mullanphy Hospital. The briefest possible summary of its history would tell of the arrival here in 1828 of five Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., to open a hospital. Their many years of serving the sick had its beginning in a small log house, of two rooms and a kitchen, built on one of the two lots donated to Bishop Rosati by John Mullanphy for this purpose. Soon, however, the accommodations became inadequate and there followed the more ambitious building at the corner of Fourth and Spruce Streets, known as the "Sisters' Hospital." The remarkable success attending the work called, after a few years, for the still more commodious grounds and buildings at Bacon and Montgomery Streets. Yet if grounds and buildings were many times multiplied, large as they are, they would count but little in comparison with the blessings and relief this famous old institution has conferred upon suffering and afflicted humanity in the eighty-eight years of its existence.

JOHN PAUL CHEW.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Human Vivisection

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to correct a misapprehension expressed in your leading editorial for April 22, entitled "Human Vivisection." Your principles I freely concede, not so the facts. I am well acquainted with the investigator whose methods you criticise and personally know him to be a man who would never hurt or harm a man or a beast. This pseudo-scientist, as you call him, was once infected with tuberculosis contracted in course of a search for tubercle bacilli in the sputum of consumptives, one of the most nauseous and thankless tasks a physician is called upon to do. In consequence he spent a year in the Adirondacks. Fortunately he recovered and is devoting his life to a study of the disease which is presumed to be the cause of general paresis. The object of his experiment was to determine the presence in the brain substance of the living virus of the above-mentioned disease. While not of immediate curative value to the patients, the experiment was nevertheless made for the ultimate benefit of all persons so afflicted, those experimented on with the rest. The sole objections to such an experiment are: first, immediate unbearable pain; secondly, harm or danger of harm to the patient. Now these experiments were only slightly painful, no more so than the insertion of a hypodermic needle of large caliber. These experiments were devoid of harm; no more harmful, for instance, than the insertion of a hypodermic needle for the withdrawal of blood, a procedure of common occurrence the country over to determine the presence or absence in the blood stream of substances related to the organism for which the experimenter seeks.

Your misapprehension evidently arose from the obvious impression of violence, suffering and peril conveyed by the thought of boring through the skull for the purpose of extracting brain matter. To make a minute hole in the skull causes no more pain than to insert a hypodermic needle through the skin. The abstraction of brain matter may be accomplished in certain parts of the brain with no more influence on the general bodily economy than the abstraction of an equivalent amount of material from the marrow of a large bone.

Louis Pasteur made the first experiment on human beings for the cure of rabies by injecting a dose of attenuated virus in the arm of a child, and he doubtless attended Mass next morning as was his custom. My scientist friend did not go to Mass in the morning; he is a Jew: and yet if one will grant him a kindly tolerance his youthful enthusiasm may yet solve the riddle why this disease, so easily controlled in its other manifestations, is so refractory to treatment when it elects to destroy the brain.

Buffalo. J. S. L.

[Our correspondent is under a wrong impression as to AMERICA'S reasons for protesting against the experiments of the doctor in question. The unlawfulness of the act criticized consists in the fact that the operation was performed without the consent of responsible persons. Nor could this consent be presumed, for it is morally certain that no normal man would allow such an operation to be performed on himself or on his relatives for mere experimental purposes. The whole incident would be unthinkable in a private sanitarium; it was possible only because the patients were charges of the State. The criminal aspect of the act arises from the fact that the subjects of the operation were treated as if misfortune deprived them of fundamental rights, as if they were mere chattels, at the disposal of the director of the insane asylum. It would be wrong to perform such an operation on persons of sane mind without their consent; it is doubly wrong to perform it on those whose condition renders them utterly helpless.

Furthermore, if we are to allow officials to assume complete control of men in this way, because they happen to be insane, there is no telling how far things will go. There are other forms of helplessness besides mental weakness, and mere novices in the knowledge of State institutional practices are aware that already there is a pronounced tendency to perform reprehensible operations, against the inmates' will. The present instance is an example of an immoral invasion of human rights, and it is not less an invasion because sanctioned by the State, and much less because, as in the present case, the only sanction was that of a mere official of an asylum. Moreover, it is incorrect to say that the operation in question involved no danger. Every physician knows that there is always an element of danger whenever an anesthetic is administered. The proportion of deaths resulting from it, in the present practice of surgery, is no doubt small, but it is a thing to be reckoned with. Besides, it looks extremely like invoking the end to justify the means, to say that the operation was lawful because it had for its purpose the alleviation of humanity. Experiments that are directed to the alleviation of human suffering are laudable, provided they keep within the limits of sound ethics. AMERICA has no quarrel with the surgeon's intentions; it objects to his methods; they are unethical.—Ed. AMERICA.]

"Androcles and the Lion"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Was not Daniel A. Lord, S.J., as quoted by Mr. Young in his article, a little slashing in his censure, not only of the play of "Androcles and the Lion" but also of any one who has been guilty of having witnessed its production? I will freely confess that I have seen the play twice without having my feelings harrowed, and I do honestly believe that my soul is more than slightly "tinctured with the creed of Christ." The poor play is so light that to thunder anathemas at it is very like killing grasshoppers with a sledge-hammer. Still, if one must take it seriously, it should be remembered that the laugh is never at the Christian martyrs, but always with them. Their would-be persecutors are made to look extremely foolish.

The "setting down" that the gilded youth of Rome receive at the hands, or rather the tongue, of Lavinia is choice. And the "handsome Captain" never has the best of an argument. The martyrs are represented as calm and even gay in the presence of death. I fail to see that it is at all derogatory to their dignity to suppose that they really were so. As regards the character of Ferronius, if Shaw had any motive at all in drawing him, it may have been intended as a hit at those Christians whose dislike to active resistance of evil is so strong that they would greatly prefer that Our Lord, instead of driving the money-changers out of the Temple with a whip, had asked them "nicely" to go. The character of Spinthos no doubt owes its existence to the fact that Shaw apparently regards himself as the divinely appointed chastiser of the British public for its many sins, especially for what he regards as its besetting sin, viz., hypocrisy. I do not think that what he says makes much difference to the British public, or has much effect, except to amuse it immensely. And what is there about "Pygmalion" and "Fanny's First Play," that they should be "lumped in" with anything like "Marie-Odile"?

Brooklyn. M. CLEMMANS.

Correct Ecclesiastical Titles

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for April 15, "A. P. F." writes as follows, with reference to Cardinal Manning:

> It was he who introduced the term against which my chief objection is directed. He used to refer to himself as "Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster," which, of course, he never was. Cardinal Henry Edward Manning was also responsible for the introduction into English of the term "Father" as applied to secular priests, and this solecism is now so crystallized that it is hopeless to attempt to look for a return to the older and better way.

A. P. F. may be correct in both of these statements, but if so, there are at least two curious facts to be accounted for. Manning became Archbishop in 1865 and Cardinal in 1875, so it is improbable that he referred to himself as "Cardinal Archbishop" before the latter year, nevertheless we find, on page 373 of Newman's "Apologia," in a letter from the Academia of Catholic Religion, under date of April 19, 1864, the following sentence: "The Academia of Catholic Religion, at their meeting held today, under the Presidency of the Cardinal Archbishop, have instructed us to write to you in their behalf." In reference to the assertion that the title "Father" was introduced into English by Cardinal Manning, it is at least curious that Newman used this very title frequently in his correspondence, before Manning even became a Catholic. (See Ward's "Life.")

Los Angeles. F. L. KOHLER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I beg pardon for a slip of the pen. I should have said that Cardinal Manning introduced the title "Father" into England, not English. I forgot for the moment that the noun and the adjective are not precisely coextensive in meaning.

While Father Prout of Watergrass Hill was undoubtedly an actual personage, the name is usually applied to the gentleman who gave that worthy priest literary fame, and I may suggest to T. F. M. that the late Rev. Francis Sylvester Mahony was a delightful example of the infelicity of the title "Father," as anything or anybody less suggestive of paternal gravity and decorum never existed. However, I am not protesting. I used "Father" to show how the jus et norma loquendi comes about, and to register an emphatic protest before "Cardinal Archbishop" and other similar horrors become the norm.

New York. A. P. F.

A Catholic Work of Art

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some months ago one of your correspondents expressed surprise at the few good examples of Catholic art in the United States. Since then a really notable contribution to Christian art and architecture has burst into full view. It is the new St. Agnes' Church in Cleveland, Ohio. Of all the parish churches in the United States, it is undeniably the most perfect example. In scale, in mass, in line, in proportion, in perfect harmony of detail, in interior decoration, in its glorious stained glass, it stands out on the horizon of contemporary Catholic art in the United States like Mars at perihelion. When the industrious "Baedeker" comes to enshrine this exquisite church edifice in his guide-book of the United States, that invaluable red book with the green string will certainly attach to a description of the new St. Agnes' Church the distinctive star, reserved exclusively for things of the very first rank.

Pittsburgh. THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

The Unity Conference

IF the many Conferences for the "reunion of the Churches," which have sprung up during the last generation, bring men to their knees in humble supplication to God our Father, they will not have been held in vain. God listens to the prayer of the lowly; the infinitely merciful Heart of Jesus Christ is quick to hear the sincere cry of those who wander in the darkness. It is a victory, too, over ancient error, if the multitudinous Churches which have done their part in stirring up "the weltering seas of prejudice and conflicting opinion," existing beyond the pale of the Catholic Church, begin in some dim way to comprehend, that Christ founded but one Church, with an absolutely consistent and authoritative doctrine, and not three hundred or more warring sects.

These Conferences then, if ruled by the spirit of humble and sincere prayer, and directed toward a proper concept of the unity of Christ's Church, may bring the day of reunion appreciably nearer. If, on the other hand, their followers beguile themselves with the hope or belief, that the Catholic Church will ever renounce the smallest part of the deposit of Faith, of which she is the divinely-appointed guardian, their efforts are doomed to complete failure. The Church prays that all men, all alike children of our Father in Heaven and made in His image, may be united in charity and in the confession, not of a compromise, but of the one true Faith delivered to the saints. She has but one Gospel for all alike, the Gospel given her by Jesus Christ who bade her teach all nations, promising that His Holy Spirit would abide with her all days even to the consummation of the world. The sole basis of reunion which she can allow, is the acceptance of the supreme authority conferred upon her by her Founder, Jesus Christ. We cannot build upon the hay and stubble of compromise, but only upon the Rock of Truth.

"Fabulous History"

PART I—On April 5, 1916, the Baltimore Star printed this item:

The problem in Latin America, Dr. Speer said, is not Roman Catholicism, but the rejection of Christianity by the people. Buenos Aires is one of the greatest centers for infidelity in the whole world. Dr. Speer said that he saw a lottery in operation in the Archbishop's (sic) yard at Panama and heard that the prelate made $5,000 a week from it.

Part II—The editor of AMERICA sent a marked copy of the paper to a friend in Panama, with a request for information on the subject. The result is as follows:

April 18, 1916.

DEAR SIR:

I have read the letter written to you by the Rev. R. H. Tierney, S.J., and I do not wonder at all at the calumny repeated by Mr. Speer concerning the lottery of Panama, knowing, as I do, that many Protestants will for ever and ever calumniate the Catholic Church. Everybody in this city knows that the aforesaid lottery belongs to a company in which the Bishop does not participate and with which he has absolutely nothing to do. If held on the ground-floor of the building, this is because it was established there at its foundation, in virtue of a contract that has not yet expired.

✠ GUILLERMO,
Bishop of Panama.

Part III—All the Latin land south of us is decadent; its priesthood is totally corrupt; its laymen are rotten; sixty per cent of its women are prostitutes; the Bishop of Panama makes (sic) $5,000 a week from a lottery from which he does not receive a farthing and over which he has absolutely no control. Such is "evangelic" history, part of the gospel of peace and good will preached by traveling missioners, Dr. Speer included. He at least should have learned a lesson of prudence. This is not his first offense: a few years since he was brought to book for a more serious misrepresentation by which he stood sponsor for a bogus "Papal encyclical" condemning the morals of the clergy of Chile. But then the light of the Gospel must be spread among the lying, corrupt Latins.

"Catholic Hospital Conference"

CATHOLIC hospitals, like Catholic schools and colleges, are everywhere dotting our land. They are an integral part of the external activity of the Church. They are a practical application of her doctrine on the corporal as well as the spiritual works of mercy. Both these classes of works, practised by Our Divine Saviour, may often be performed in the most salutary way within the wards of our Catholic hospitals. In these we behold a historic institution of Catholicism, but this fact cannot dispense the Catholic men and women in charge of them from keeping abreast of every advance of modern science and of every improvement in methods of economic management. Constant study and intelligent cooperation on the part of Brothers, Sisters, physicians, and nurses are a condition for the fullest efficiency.

The first Catholic Hospital Conference, with this object in view, was held at Milwaukee during the past year, and resulted in the formation of the Catholic Hospital Association. Though invitations had been sent only to a comparatively small section of the country, the conference was unexpectedly successful. Besides a number of physicians, nurses, hospital chaplains and other persons interested in this work, there were present over a hundred Sisters. The stability and progress of the Association are now assured, and it can confidently appeal to the Catholic hospitals of the entire country for cooperation and membership. The development of a large and active National Catholic Hospital Association is the next step under contemplation.

Catholic physicians of national repute have already promised their presence and assistance at the coming conference, which is to take place at Milwaukee, June 7, 8 and 9. It is to be followed, beginning with June 12, by a series of summer courses, extending over six weeks, to be given by the Marquette University School of Medicine. Familiarity with the subjects treated in these courses is indispensable for the routine scientific work of modern hospitals, such as laboratory technician work, X-ray technique, dietetics, anesthetics, hospital record keeping, social service, and massage. "I cannot too urgently impress upon the superiors who are responsible for the betterment of hospital treatment of the sick," says the Most Reverend Archbishop of Milwaukee, "the necessity there is for the Sisters to become expert in the various departments of hospital service." His circular is the more timely inasmuch as Catholic hospitals will hereafter be rated like all others by the American Medical Association, and cannot afford to be inferior to them in efficiency. The interests of religion and charity, however, should be a sufficient motive for cooperation in this movement on the part of all who are devoting themselves to hospital work.

"Man-Made Laws"

CONSISTENCY is not always a jewel, or at least it is not always considered so, where the Church is concerned. Hence it is that one hears, principally, it is true, from those outside the Fold, but sometimes even from those within, that ecclesiastical laws are man-made, and therefore not strictly binding. This assertion, by a strange anomaly, is most often on the lips of those who are fanatical in their insistence on the observance of civil laws, which are certainly man-made, and is remarkably in favor with those who are conspicuous for their neglect of the Commandments, which are undoubtedly Divine laws.

Certainly many ecclesiastical laws are man-made, but if this fact exempts men from obeying them, there is an end to the binding force of all national and State laws as well. For while the Church emphatically claims that she has authority from God to legislate for her subjects, the State makes no such claim. Few civil legislators trouble themselves about the source of their authority; fewer still could explain it, if they were asked to do so.

The fact is that there is no legislative power in any body, whether ecclesiastical or civil, unless it comes down from Heaven. Directly or indirectly all jurisdiction must be traced back to the Supreme Legislator. All men are equal to this extent, that no one may presume to control another or restrict his liberty, unless in the words of St. Paul, he be one of "the ministers of God." Church and State are alike in this, that their authority is God-given. They differ only in the process by which the repositories of that authority are selected. In the case of civil society, God speaks through the voice of nature, urging men to enter into social relations, which cannot be maintained securely unless within the body politic there be a moral power of command, to be exercised by those on whom it has been conferred by God for the common good of the community. Whether this power, however, be vested in an individual or in a group of individuals, is left within certain limitations to the determination of the citizens. The Church, on the other hand, was founded by the positive act of Jesus Christ, who has also positively determined both the character of its governing body and the extent of its jurisdiction. But of both Church and State it is equally true to say what Christ said of the power of the Roman Governor in Jerusalem: "Thou shouldst have no power against me, unless it were given thee from above." The phrase, therefore, on which the disobedient children of the Church so confidently rely, when, with supercilious self-righteousness, they repudiate the Church's right to command them, for instance, to receive their Paschal Communion, is either a threadbare screen for conscious bad faith or a palpable example of culpable ignorance.

Tangled Paths

MR. HEARST'S New York American and Mr. William A. Brady agree in their opposition to a State censorship of moving-pictures, but not for the same reason. Mr. Brady asserts that the proposed censorship is unnecessary, since "in the long run the great American public will reject pictures of questionable morality." Mr. Hearst, feeling the occasion to be above words, takes refuge in a cartoon, which argues that the law will promote corruption, since the film-producers will bribe the censors.

As for Mr. Brady, he may rest assured that "the great American public" will undoubtedly reject "pictures of questionable morality," together with all other forms of public crime and impropriety. In fact, the rejection has already been made by the larger and saner part of that public, whose discernment Mr. Brady makes a matter of the future. Yet no community can safely forget, that among its members are the young and the morally weak, who as a matter of public policy, must be shielded from those public incitements to vice so often presented on the stage, and occasionally on the moving-picture screen. Furthermore, those degraded beings whose source of income is conditioned by the stimulated demand for public occasions of evil, are beyond the reach of moral suasion and can be dealt with only by the summary process of law. For the protection of the weak and the repression of the evil members of society, the common-sense of mankind prescribes, in the absence of other suitable means, legal coercion.

So far as Mr. Hearst is concerned, it may be said that he and his collaborators speak with singular authority, when dealing with the problem of how to make money out of flashy newspapers and sex-inspired magazines; otherwise their opinions are of no particular value. It is characteristic of the mentality of the Hearst newspapers that in the possibility that the proposed censorship law may be violated, their New York representative finds an argument against the law itself. Jurors have been bribed, and judges have soiled their ermine in this glorious country of ours, and the chain of penitentiaries stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, bears witness that our laws are occasionally violated. Mr. Hearst may therefore argue that all laws and all courts should be forthwith abolished, but few, it may be thought, will follow him.

The Cruelly Slandered Editor

IT would seem that there is no class of people more misunderstood, misjudged, and maligned than is the meek and gentle craft of editors. Their shining virtues are popularly considered hideous vices, and their unwearied efforts to protect the public from the literary bore, and to offer readers instead the fascinating masterpieces of our best writers, are cruelly misinterpreted by the thoughtless multitude; jealousy, avarice, favoritism, or crass incompetence being the most charitable explanations assigned for the wretched editor's deeds of stupidity or sins of omission. But the two-score magazine-editors who take part in the May Bookman's symposium on the ancient question, "Why are Manuscripts Rejected?" have conspired to disabuse the general public of the false ideas that are commonly entertained regarding the editor's character, motives, and mental equipment, and strange to say they actually succeed in painting a portrait that bears a remarkable likeness to that of a human being.

With pathetic earnestness the editors to a man insist that they are inland bred, know some nurture, have sat at good men's feasts, and wiped their eyes of drops that sacred pity has engendered. Their sole aim in life, they reiterate, is to publish what will interest, though it may not please, their readers. Editors, we are assured, have a passion for producing the best magazine they can. Far from restricting their writers, as is often charged, to well-known men, an editor's keenest pleasure, they maintain, is the discovery of new contributors who have something interesting to say and know how to express it. "We read personally every piece of printable manuscript that comes into this office," one successful editor attests, "and we are unfeignedly delighted every time a newcomer sends in something that is good." Though the average monthly issue of a certain high-grade magazine contains less than two dozen items, its editor receives every day some seventy contributions. The vast majority of them will, of course, be rejected, but all are conscientiously examined. The reader is reminded, however, that it is not necessary to drink a whole bottle of milk to know that it is sour, nor to delay long over manuscripts that are obviously unsuited to a periodical's character, that deal with stale or uninteresting subjects, or that resemble articles or stories with which the editor is already well supplied.

The professional writer's estimate of the value of the Bookman's symposium will be largely influenced, no doubt, by the fact that he belongs either to the favored few whose articles or stories are generally accepted or to the throngs who habitually get their manuscripts back. The latter will no doubt agree wholeheartedly with the following description of the degenerate race:

> Editors are proverbially the lowest form of intellectual life. They only return those weary, wounded, and bleeding little manuscripts because they don't know enough to publish them; because, as a race, they are prejudiced, uncultivated, blind. They seek with passionate ardor only for those outpourings of the human soul that are stereotyped, conventional, obvious, banal. They are utterly lacking in initiative, intuition, sympathy, flair. They are but the driven slaves of the benighted proletariat; or of a band of ignoble advertisers; or—worse and worse—of the wretched being whose tragical misfortune it is to be compelled to employ and feed them. All editors live on flattery. They can be bought or bribed—like so many aldermen or critics. Their outlook on life, and love, and ardor, and humor, and generative artistic heat is no wider than that of the buried, fossilized toad. They are malingerers. They are criminals. There is, in short, something almost slimy and shuddery about the horror of them.

But the affluent contributor who is accustomed to receive large checks from the magazines will probably accept as faithful descriptions of the average editor such passages as these:

> I habitually think of —— contributors as representing the guests at a dinner party. I do not want them all to agree with me, but I do not care to ask anybody whose words do not seem to me worth listening to or whose manners are out of place in company. . . . The writer who has the gift of telling tales that interest his fellow-beings is not dependent either upon the whims or the judgment of any editor. . . . The reader has a right to take it for granted that the editor stands sponsor for everything in his magazine, and if anything is printed bearing the name of one who has openly and flagrantly broken a law of society the inference cannot be escaped that the editor either does not consider the offense seriously or hopes to profit by the author's notoriety.

But unfortunately there are in this country today editors whose magazines force the critical reader to make these inferences.

LITERATURE

The Fragrant Stars

TIME out of mind both poets and poetasters have been fond of singing or rhyming about the stars. The first night that

> Hesperus with the hosts of heaven came;
> And lo! creation widened in man's view,

Adam doubtless composed impromptu lyrics in praise of the stars' wondrous beauty, and ever since then those sons of his who, whether justly or mistakenly, consider themselves sacred bards, have been accustomed to draw their highest inspiration from the star-strewn sky. Astronomy and astrology, moreover, became the most honored and learned professions, skill in determining a planet's influence on human destiny grew to be a highly lucrative art, and thoughts suggested by the movements of the stars were the versifier's commonplaces.

Since the first night in Eden until now the poets, it would seem, have used every imaginable epithet by which the attributes and qualities of the stars can be described, and every figure has been discovered that can plausibly be based on the real or fancied characteristics of night's celestial candles. Not so. For modern writers of futurist, cubist or imagist verse keep forcing into unhappy marriages verbs and nouns that should never wed, and from these unions are born metaphors altogether worthy, alas! of their wretched parents. We had little reason to hope, therefore, that even the blameless stars could evade the roving eye of the new schools of versifiers.

The varied gifts and accomplishments imputed to the thousand eyes of night by the old-fashioned poets are on the whole quite orthodox and intelligible. For they call the stars fair, bright, cold, chaste, comfortable, charitable, auspicious, angry, orderly, silent, punctual, still, etc.; describe them as shining, burning, twinkling, wheeling, threatening, watching, listening, and peeping; even picture them smiling, laughing, weeping, and dancing; and nothing, of course, is better authenticated than the stars' inveterate addiction to singing. For we learn from a high authority that there is not a single one of the tiny orbs that, like patines of fine gold, are thick inlaid in the floor of heaven

> But in his motion like an angel sings,
> Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins.

Milton, too, when he found

> The stars with deep amaze
> Stand fixed with steadfast gaze at the wonders of Our Lord's Nativity, joyfully called to them:

> Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
> Come bless our human ears
> If ye have power to touch our senses so;
> And let your silver chime
> Move in melodious time, and presumably the obedient stars did as they were bidden.

But none of these bards and poets dead and gone had ever discovered, as far as is known, that the stars, besides being vocal, active, watchful and emotional, are also fragrant, and that their delicate perfume, moreover, can really be perceived and enjoyed by highly cultivated noses. For it was left to one of our leading imagist poets to exclaim, in the course of some very free verse she recently published: "I smell the stars!" Unfortunately, details are lacking about the precise nature and value of this extraordinary gift. Is it peculiar to imagist poets only? Can it be acquired? How perfectly has it been developed? Of what practical value would astronomers, sailors and airmen find it? These are some of the queries that at once suggest themselves. Perhaps the imagist's delicate nostrils can detect the rare perfume of the evening star long before sunset, while her eagerness to scent the subtle fragrance of the Light-bringer will arouse a cubist versifier from her slumbers at an hour when a mere rhyming poet would not think of getting up.

A laudable curiosity would likewise inspire questions as to whether the astronomer's "star-dust" is identified in any way with the astral powder that tickles the imagist's olfactory organs; whether the staid and sober fixed stars offer a more recherché perfume than does an errant planet; whether the constellations have a simple or a complex fragrance, and whether the aroma of each star-group is quite appropriate and distinctive, so that the Pleiades' odor, for example, suggests funereal tea-roses, and that of the Hyades, dying water-lilies; whether every star-born smell is pleasant; whether the odor that is wafted down from flaming Mars, for instance, smacks too much of strong anesthetics and burning saltpeter to be agreeable; or whether the sensitive nose can readily distinguish Ursa Major from Ursa Minor; whether the steadfast North Star is likewise a particularly fragrant luminary, and whether the Milky Way's penetrating odor suggests a blending of the dairy's familiar aroma with the smell of new-mown hay.

These and a thousand similar questions clamor for an answer from the imagist poet who says she can "smell the stars," and fuller light on this interesting subject will be eagerly awaited. Meanwhile a cynical poet of the old-fashioned, rhyming school has been perversely trying to lessen the value of our imagist's testimony regarding that alleged stellar fragrance. He maintains that after inditing some seven inches of particularly realistic vers libre, our imagist probably strolled out, like one rapt, into the starlight and some delicately blended perfumes she then perceived seemed to have a celestial origin, whereas in reality they were wafted simultaneously from a bank of violets, a field of poppies, and a bower of roses. To the star-gazing imagist that strangely sweet composite odor seemed to come undoubtedly from above, so she composed forthwith the renowned line: "I smell the stars!" Thus conjectures, at least, the cynical rhymer.

When all is said, however, it must be owned that this poetical fragrance that imagists aver the stars possess is too novel and imperfectly authenticated a quality for conservative poets to welcome very cordially. "Fragrant stars," moreover, do not seem to have so much "ethical value" as do, for example, the "silent," "punctual," "chaste," "watchful," "charitable" or "singing" stars. For few preachers, merely on the unsupported testimony of an imagist, would exhort their flocks to give forth "the star-like perfume of a godly life," whereas strong Scriptural warrant can be adduced for many of those older virtues of the celestial bodies.

For homiletic worth, stars that are only "fragrant" bear no comparison, of course, with those that are described in Holy Writ as "armies on high, shining gloriously in the firmament of heaven," which "have given light in their watches and rejoiced. They were called and they said: Here we are: and with cheerfulness they have shined forth to him that made them." The stars that Isaias and Baruch beheld were not at all fragrant, as far as we know, but they were wonderfully courageous, vigilant, orderly, cheerful, punctual, and self-sacrificing. They were seen practising constantly the virtues that are most serviceable in our modern, work-a-day world, and were richly endowed with those qualities which make social intercourse easy and agreeable. So old-fashioned folk who, unlike our imagist poet, have not yet learned how to "smell the stars" should be content to watch them closely instead, for they have many things to teach the thoughtful observer.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

REVIEWS

Michelangelo. By ROMAIN ROLLAND. New York: Duffield & Co. $2.50.

From Giovio and Vasari to Quatremère de Quincy, Symonds, Karl Frey and John La Farge, Michelangelo has had a long line of illustrious men to sing his praises. Romain Rolland, the author of "Jean Christophe" has for the second time hung his laurel wreath at the shrine of the great Florentine. It is evidently an offering of genuine admiration and love. In the 200 pages of his monograph, one of the series of "Les Maîtres de l'Art," the author reviews the principal events of Michelangelo's life, discusses the problems connected with his stormy career and his colossal undertakings, analyses his genius and the effects it produced upon his own age and his followers. M. Rolland writes with a disciplined enthusiasm which slips into poetry at times, but not into the exaggerations of the mere panegyrist, with originality and the gift of terse and pictured phrase. The "titanic" efforts of the creator of the "Moses" and "The Last Judgment," etc., to attain supreme perfection as sculptor, architect, painter, and poet are admirably portrayed. In this unequal struggle, even this giant, true brother of Homer, Dante, and Shakespeare failed. But our author makes us fully realize that if the artist attempted the impossible, he left behind him masterpieces sealed with the stamp of immortality. Throughout his stormy life, constantly beset with trials, sorrows and bitter disappointments, Michelangelo ever kept burning the torch of his artistic inspiration and his Faith. He yielded at times to that extravagant worship of form so characteristic of the pagan Renaissance, but he found his best ideals in the teachings of the Old Testament and the Gospel. Michelangelo quarreled with Pope and Cardinals, but he never questioned the teachings of the Church they ruled. In his darkest hours his Faith was his only consolation when all others had fled. Only a devout Christian convinced of the Divinity of the Son and of the virginity and motherhood of the Woman on whose knees rests the body of the dead Christ could have conceived the "Pietà" of St. Peter's, the most touching perhaps, of the artist's creations. M. Rolland might have stressed this point more forcibly. Had he done so he would have given a juster and fuller appreciation of the great master. J. C. R.

A Book-lover's Holidays in the Open. By THEODORE ROOSEVELT. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00.

Our interesting ex-President has here gathered into a very readable volume eleven essays dealing with his out-of-doors adventures on three continents. Following a poetically-phrased foreword, in which the author tells of seeing "the red splendor of desert sunsets, and the unearthly glory of the afterglow on the battlements of desolate mountains," he describes a successful cougar hunt in the Grand Cañon, a visit to the Navajo desert, and every detail of the Hopi snake-dance, which he was allowed to see because he had once been the "great chief" at Washington. Mr. Roosevelt pays enthusiastic tributes to the admirable family life of South Americans of every race, and draws therefrom the following lesson for his fellow-countrymen:

> The families are large. The women, charming and attractive, are good and fertile mothers in all classes of society. There are no symptoms of that artificially self-produced dwindling of population which is by far the most threatening symptom in the social life of the United States, Canada, and the Australian commonwealths. The nineteenth century saw a prodigious growth of the English-speaking, relative to the Spanish-speaking, population of the new worlds west of the Atlantic and in the Southern Pacific. The end of the twentieth century will see this completely reversed unless the present ominous tendencies as regards the birth-rate are reversed. A race is worthless and contemptible if its men cease to be willing and able to work hard and, at need, to fight hard, and if its women cease to breed freely. . . . but it nevertheless remains true that voluntary sterility among married men and women of good life is, even more than military or physical cowardice in the ordinary man, the capital sin of civilization, whether in France or Scandinavia, New England or New Zealand. If the best classes do not reproduce themselves the nation will, of course, go down; for the real question is encouraging the fit, and discouraging the unfit, to survive. When the ordinary decent man does not understand that to marry the woman he loves, as early as he can, is the most desirable of all goals, the most successful of all forms of life entitled to be called really successful; when the ordinary woman does not understand that all other forms of life are but makeshift and starveling substitutes for the life of the happy wife, the mother of a fair-sized family of healthy children; then the State is rotten at heart.

Mr. Roosevelt himself, however, carries these "good principles" to a "mischievous excess" when he goes on to say that "the mother comes ahead of the nun," and when he has a fling at the so-called "warped and diseased conscience of asceticism"; for both the Church and the Bible, of course, teach the superiority of the consecrated, virgin life over that of the married. The author's essay on reading should be laid to heart by those who find the perusal of a cheap magazine the severest mental strain they can stand, but no one need tarry long over Mr. Roosevelt's chapter on "Primitive Man," which is full of unsound evolutionary doctrine. The political friends and opponents of the "mighty hunter" will doubtless find very amusing his account of how reluctantly he slew a second bull moose, when the Canadian law allowed him to kill but one. However, in an affidavit, Mr. Roosevelt solemnly swore that it was only to save his own life that he shot the second giant moose. W. D.

Only Anne. By ISABEL C. CLARKE. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.35.

Bars of Iron. By ETHEL M. DELL. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

These two novels from the pens of English women are both excellent stories, marked by that finish of diction and development to which writers on the other side of the water give such serious attention. Both are psychological studies and both are wholesome throughout. "Only Anne" deals with the mental struggles consequent on a heroic act of self-sacrifice, made for the sake of a friend. The principal character is a Catholic girl, who reaps the full fruits of bitterness, with scarcely any mitigation of her pain, from her deliberate setting aside of her own happiness in favor of another's. The only consolation given her is the final success of her plan. There is a rift in the clouds toward the end of the story and it is wide enough to promise floods of sunshine. Anne is an acquaintance worth making, and in creating her, Miss Clarke has added another charming figure to Catholic literature. Those who have not yet been introduced to this clever and altogether representative Catholic novelist could not do better than begin with her latest book. "Bars of Iron," is a more complex story, rich in the atmosphere of English life, and often harrowing in its play of passion. The characters are strongly and sharply developed, and at least four of them are very attractive. Besides the love motif, which vexes the lives of the headstrong boy and the sadly-tried Avery, there are several delightful children whose tranquil affection is an excellent foil for the deeper passions of their friends. This book is quite in the class of those novels for which Putnam has so often and so wisely stood sponsor.

J. H. F.

Julia Ward Howe, 1819-1910. By LAURA E. RICHARDS and MAUD HOWE ELLIOTT, assisted by FLORENCE HOWE HALL. With Portraits and Illustrations. Two Volumes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $4.00.

This eminent woman's biography records a long life of remarkable activity. As wife, mother, poet, editor, author, suffragist, lecturer, preacher and publicist, Julia Ward Howe kept herself fully occupied up to the day she died at the age of ninety-one. The beautiful daughter of a New York banker, she had many suitors, but she married Samuel G. Howe, the Boston physician who had charge of the Perkins Institution for the Blind and who taught language to Laura Bridgman, the blind deaf-mute. Though Mrs. Howe wrote a manuscript volume of verses at the mature age of twelve, her first book of poems, "Passion Flowers," was published in 1853, receiving warm praise from Whittier, Emerson and Holmes. The circumstances attending the composition of the renowned "Battle Hymn of the Republic" are interesting. As Mrs. Howe and James Freeman Clarke returned from seeing a review of the Union troops near Washington, in 1861, he suggested that she should "write some good words for that stirring tune," "John Brown's Body." "Waking in the gray of the next morning, as she lay waiting for the dawn," the words came to her, "line by line, stanza by stanza." When the last line was ended she got up and committed to paper the well-known hymn.

In a diary Mrs. Howe kept during one of her visits to Rome, where her nephew, F. Marion Crawford, lived, she records that: "When Leo XIII was elected, the Jesuits came to him and promised that he should have a Jubilee if he would take part against the Rosminian ideas and put the books on the Index Expurgatorius, the which he promptly did." Let us hope the Fathers kept their promise and gave the compliant Pope that coveted Jubilee. In St. Peter's, she was "almost overpowered" by the thought of "the immense intellectual force pledged to the upbuilding of the Church of Rome," but found some comfort in the reflection that just as the Temple of Jerusalem fell at last, so would St. Peter's, and that was a mercy. About a fortnight before she died, Mrs. Howe received from Smith College the honorary degree of doctor of laws, and the moment it was conferred 2,000 white-clad girls sang the "Battle Hymn" to organ accompaniment. It must have been an impressive scene. As the authors of this biography are Mrs. Howe's daughters, fittingly she has no faults. But the work would have gained by compression.

W. D.

The Old Testament in the Light of To-Day. By WILLIAM FREDERICK BADÉ. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.75.

The title of this book is misleading. It should be "The Old Testament in the Darkness of To-Day." The author writes in the night. Worse than that. For even the night is rarely pitch black by utter lack of light. At least some friendly rays of sunlight are reflected to us by the moon, or diffused by the atmosphere of the gloaming; or starlight is radiated unto us from billions of miles away. Our night is rarely pitch black. But black as black can be is the night of unfaith in which Dr. Badé writes. Not a ray of the light of faith beams to lead him on. No single star of faith is left to him. No faith of another reflects God's light to him. He has passed even the twilight of faith. He is in complete darkness; and under this spell, he writes of the Old Testament. And this is the sum of his benighted study: Old Testament history is not history at all. There is error in the morality of the Old Testament books. They misstate things spiritual. The Deity as presented herein portrays physical and moral limitations. All the supernatural elements of Israelitic religion are brushed aside as not historical; they "belong to the poetry, to the religious psychology of Israel's religion, not the historical facts of its history." Faith in this abandoned "foolish patchwork" is "no longer faith, but superstition. What is more, it is very harmful superstition."

We have been accustomed to this sort of thing from Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, Lutheran and Methodist professors of theology and Sacred Scripture. Here now is a Moravian clergyman gone the way of destructive criticism. John Huss stood for the Bible, the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible. His follower, the Professor of Old Testament Literature in the Pacific Theological Seminary, Berkeley, California, now tells the candidates for the Hussite ministry that we have outgrown the Old Testament. It is no longer of any use as a guide to the followers of Huss. The blasphemous book is introduced into the University of California as a text-book. And the ideas of the rationalistic Moravian professor are hailed in the East and the West as the deliverance of men from an outgrown superstition. Catholics should be grateful that their faith is protected by the watchful successor of St. Peter from such unscientific and blasphemous hatred of the Bible.

W. F. D.

Wreckage: a Drama in Three Acts. By J. HARTLEY MANNERS. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.00.

"Wreckage" is the story of a "dope fiend" fallen to the very depths of human misery who has risen again to his place in the ranks of manhood. All this was brought about by the victim's son, a young physician who has given his life to the task of fighting and curing the drug habit. The drama is not pleasant reading; it is a gruesome tale told in unadorned every-day language. Doctors and nurses come in for their share of abuse because of their alleged carelessness in the administration of drugs. The new woman who longs to control the destinies of men is pictured in anything but an attractive manner; her disregard for old-time parental notions is sad reading. Those who come to read "Wreckage" with ideas of the drama of former days will go away weeping for days that are no more. Nothing is left to the imagination; the actors are a prosaic lot, and the poor victim hardly utters a phrase that is not heavy with despair. Of course the "dope fiend" is cured in the end, there is a love match, and the head doctor has a very laudable aim in giving his life thus for his fellow-man. But will such a play influence the public for good? It may, but the stage is not real life; it should be real life idealized instead of real life realized, as many modern playwriters are endeavoring to make it. There must be more in a play than the hero's noble purpose if the audience is to go away with high resolve and lofty sentiments. As an exhibition of how a generous-hearted man may cure "dopes," "Wreckage" may be worth the reading to those who are interested in the terrible havoc the drug habit is working in American life, but it can hardly be called a drama in the good old sense of that word.

J. S. H.

The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church. Sermons from the German. Adapted and Edited by the Rev. EDWARD JONES. With an Introduction by the Most Rev. JOHN IRELAND, D.D., Archbishop of St. Paul. Vols. IV and V. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.50 each.

These volumes continue and bring to completion a series of sermons covering the field of dogmatic and sacramental theology. Clear and dignified expositions of the truths, laws, and Sacraments of the Church are interspersed with such moral subjects of present-day importance as "The Catholic Young Man," "Truth and Honesty in Business," and "The Influence of Example." Each sermon springs naturally from the quoted text, and is logically developed in precise yet simple language. The sermons' divisions are so logical and natural that a discourse read once or twice is easily retained. Thus the sermon on the existence of God may be summed up thus: Two books are ever open before us proclaiming God's existence; earth and heaven, Saintly men like Augustine and Francis Borgia never wearied of reading them. Both the presence of evil about us and our own hearts too through the voice of conscience proclaim the same truth. We too are in harmony with the great chorus of praise if united to God by loving obedience. "Every day and every night adds a new syllable to the word that we see written in letters of flame on the heavens and this word is: God." The author of these sermons knows how to take theology out of the hand-book and make it a living message for all the Faithful, while science, history, and the Scripture, are all gracefully woven into garments that enhance the beauty of Christ's immaculate Spouse. F. X. S.

The Jews among the Greeks and Romans. By MAX RADIN. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

The present volume offers an interpretation of certain facts of Jewish, Roman, and Greek history from about 450 B. C. to 350 A. D., that is from the end of the Babylonian Captivity to the Triumph of Christianity. The author compares and analyzes the philosophico-religious tendencies of Greek and Jew and Roman and Jew, and the impressions made on one another, when these three races were in contact. Mr. Radin is a Jew; and though he has made a thorough examination of such available sources, as the Greek and Latin writers who refer to the Jews, to the Jewish literature of the period, and to the ancient monuments, coins, utensils, papyri, which are the only unchanged existing contemporaries of the events they illustrate, nevertheless the abiding reverence for the history of his own people has sometimes led him to make statements to which Catholics will take exception. That the entire law, as embodied in the Pentateuch, was promulgated by Moses, for example, is a fact admitted by the most reliable Biblical authorities and cannot be questioned; nor can there be any doubt that the book of the Acts of the Apostles, "in the form in which it has come down to us," does not represent a "recension of much later date" than the time of St. Luke, its undisputed author. Again it cannot be admitted that the attitude of medieval law toward heresy offers a good analogy with the Christian persecutions in the first centuries; nor is it true that the Fathers of the Church "unhesitatingly defend the use of falsehoods," not even "to better enforce a moral lesson," for they were strenuously opposed to the unethical principle that the end justifies the means.

While statements like the foregoing lessen the value of a book which otherwise bears marks of a kindly and tolerant spirit, anyone interested in the subject Mr. Radin writes about will find this book a mine of information and a monument to the painstaking labor and industry of the writer. A. H. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Here is the Bookman's list of March's "best sellers": "The Real Adventure," "Life and Gabriella," "Seventeen," "Held to Answer," "Mrs. Balfame," and "Dear Enemy." Gertrude Atherton's "Mrs. Balfame" is the only one of the foregoing novels that has not been noticed already in AMERICA. The central figure of the story is in intent, but not in act, her husband's murderer, and the author skilfully keeps the reader wondering who the real criminal is. The clever book is marked by the absence of Christian principles from the hearts of all the characters the author describes.

"The Rudder" (Macmillan, $1.50), by Mary S. Watts, is a "novel with several heroes" but with only one central figure, a beautiful, gifted but inconsistent girl named Eleanor Miranda. Around her revolve a composite array of characters, ranging from the son of the millionaire ice-king, the shallow agitator, and the genial author, down to the dregs of humanity. The book should rank high among the novels depicting the spirit and scenes of modern America, for Mrs. Watts has drawn familiar characters truthfully, and has painted scenes and created situations that might be duplicated in almost any city of the country. Though the plot is well developed, the story's ending is somewhat weak.—— Patrick McGill, now a member of the "London Irish," having established a literary reputation for sordid realism, felt, no doubt, that he had to sustain it in his recent war-book, "The Red Horizon" (Doran, $1.25). The descriptions he gives of trench-fighting and of the discomforts of life at the front are seldom lacking in vivid details. A glossary of slang should have been provided for American readers.

Mr. C. T. Winchester, the author of "William Wordsworth: How to Know Him," (Bobbs, Merrill, $1.25) shows that he himself knows Wordsworth well and sound principles of literary criticism too. Instinct with the poet's spirit, alive with generous quotations, the book will win new admirers for its subject. The volume reflects the simplicity and serenity of the great Lake Poet and ought to convert its readers into enthusiastic Wordsworthians. Poems are quoted entire and there is a good index.——Mr. Vachel Lindsay's "Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty," (Macmillan, $1.00), are not real "adventures" at all but just the common experiences of a gentleman-tramp who does an occasional day's work at harvesting, but otherwise leads a tramp's sordid life, many details of which were better omitted, especially by a poet.

Edith Staniforth has made a good translation of "Our Home in Heaven" (Benziger, $1.00) the Abbé Max Caron's excellent little book on immortality and the life beyond the grave. The texts, anecdotes and quotations that abound are always apt and the arguments are convincing. As but one guest in the parable was without a wedding garment the author believes most Catholics reach heaven. The book ends with a spook-story from the New York Herald, a "Protestant newspaper."——The organ accompaniment of the "Parish Hymnal" (Herder, $2.00) arranged by Joseph Otten is intended for choirs, school children, sodalities and congregations. No non-Catholic texts or tunes are included in the book.——Father J. Degen's "Christian Armour for Youth" (Benziger, $0.35) is a little vade-mecum containing forty-two short chapters on the virtues that should grace a young man's life, and on the devotions he should practise.—— For nearly two years a rather heated discussion was carried on between certain writers in the Hindu Organ and the Jaffna Catholic Guardian, and the whole controversy as presented in a booklet entitled "A Controversy on Transmigration" (St. Joseph's Catholic Press of Jaffna, $0.50) contains three parts: "The Clearing of the Ground," "Intellectual Difficulties," and a well-ordered and solid refutation of transmigration.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. John McQuirk, the veteran rector of St. Paul's, New York, is not only a practical and zealous patron of current Catholic literature, but he has for several years published at his own expense, for the use of his congregation, a series of "Parish Tracts" which include sermons and valuable historical and polemic essays. In the latest batch of these brochures he has with timely reverence rescued from oblivion Cardinal Wiseman's excellent lecture on Shakespeare which was dictated from his Eminence's death-bed and left unfinished, for it was never delivered. But even as the composition stands, it is far superior to most of the Tercentenary articles that appeared last month in the papers and magazines. The Boston Evening Transcript's experiment of devoting a page to "Shakespeare in the Golden Cadence of Poesie," however, was quite successful. One of the contributors, Sara Teasdale, asks the great poet's mother:

> Mary Arden, had you known
> That no king upon his throne
> Was ever great as he would be—
> That from shining sea to sea,
> England up and England down,
> None would gain such bright renown;
> That the world's most precious thing
> Under the wide sway of spring,
> Warm against your bosom slept,
> Would you not have knelt and wept?

And Joyce Kilmer makes Queen Elizabeth say:

My hands were stained with blood, my heart was proud and cold,
My soul is black with shame . . . but I gave Shakespeare gold.
So after æons of flame, I may, by grace of God,
Rise up to kiss the dust that Shakespeare's feet have trod.

But any grace that "Golden Eliza" ever wins will be due, most likely, to the intercession of the Catholics she sent to martyrdom.

If one can live under the spell of such books as the "Essays of Elia" and "The Christmas Carol," and can besides be a lover of nature and a tiller of the soil and a college professor, one comes very near to seeing life steadily and seeing it whole. And when to this you add the simple creed: "I am caring for a few college freshmen and my soul. I shall go forth to my work until the evening. The Lord can take the night-shift," you have the ideal life that appealed so strongly to Dallas Lore Sharp, that he must needs write it all down in a pleasant, chatty, amiable way, telling of the foxes, and the beans, and the ploughing, and the pigs, and the bees, and the boys, and her, that make the "Hills of Hingham" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), so delightful a spot to live in.——"A Tall Ship and Other Naval Occasions," (Putnam, $1.00) by "Bartimeus" is made up of entertaining sketches and descriptions of life in the British navy in wartime. The lights and shadows, gaiety and grief of the English sailor, from the officers' cabin to the Jackies' stoke-hole, are described, and vivid pictures are drawn of the sadness of parting, the preludes to battle, the sinking of ships, and the grime and glory of combat. Though written evidently for the young, the chapters should interest grown-ups too.

EDUCATION

Catholic Authors in Training Schools

THE article in AMERICA for April 8, "Catholic Books in Our Public Libraries," prompts me to offer a suggestion that may brand me as an innovator or even as a traitor to the literary ideals of those that have gone before us. Nevertheless I shall take the risk. It would seem that most public libraries are willing to place Catholic books on their shelves if there be a sufficient demand for them. The question is, why is there not such a demand? Certainly, there are thousands of intelligent Catholic readers, but are they fond of reading Catholic books? If not, why not?

The Training Ground

There are many reasons for this comparative neglect of Catholic authors by our Catholic people, but I venture to place the fundamental reason in the fact that our Catholic people are not trained to know and love Catholic books. This may appear to be a sweeping statement. Are not our Catholic papers and magazines constantly urging our people to read Catholic literature? Do not earnest pastors regularly make it the theme of sermon and lecture? They do indeed; but this only helps to prove my statement. Catholic editors and energetic pastors of souls realize the need; hence the never-ceasing appeals from press and pulpit. They are trying to remedy a defect the cause of which lies in early training.

Now, what is the training place for a great Catholic reading public? Undoubtedly the Catholic school and the Catholic college. It is a commonplace to say that if you give a boy or a girl a love for books you have given a great asset in the business of life. No one doubts this. For generations our Catholic schools have been feeding the minds of our students on the great English classics. Addison and Macaulay, Dickens and Scott, Bryant and Longfellow, Wordsworth and Tennyson, are household words among us and no one dreams of wishing it otherwise; they are the music-makers who by their sweet harmonies have made life nobler in the living. But we cannot forget that the aim of Catholic schools is not to turn out mere literary men. That devoted and experienced educator, Monsignor McDevitt, in the report of his schools for 1915, states clearly: "The basic principle of the Catholic school is religion. The primary purpose of Catholic teaching is to prepare the pupil for eternal life; its secondary purpose is to fit him for the present life."

The Church and Literature

With this, of course, all Catholics are in agreement, and the great encyclicals of Leo XIII are constantly holding up this ideal to Catholics the world over. We aim, first and foremost, to put our students in the path that leads up to the glorious throne of God; we desire them to see and know God's Church in all its glory and in all its suffering; we want them to be inspired by the lives of heroes and heroines, churchmen and statesmen that are an honor to God and country. The Church is a rich storehouse of art and literature, high thinking and noble living; her orators, silver-tongued in their eloquence, have thrilled whole kingdoms; her poets have sung loftily and sweetly of nature, of man and the life of man, and her novelists have written tales, pure and ennobling, that no man, woman or child need blush to read.

What the School Can Do

Now, it is for this noble array of talent that I would make a plea. They are not of the dead past; we read series of articles about them in Catholic magazines; we boast that we have enough of them to carry to success our proposed Catholic dailies. Why not introduce some of them into our schools and colleges? Why not have a volume of Catholic essayists side by side with Addison and Macaulay? Why not have a Catholic anthology as a partner to Palgrave's "Golden Treasury"? Why not a number of Catholic novelists on the list for home-reading in company with Scott and Dickens? Ah, but there is no time, or there is no room; the schedule is full to overflowing, and then too we have all this in our school libraries; besides, these writers have not really established themselves as classics. Perhaps again I may be branded as a literary heretic, but in view of our glorious end, if our schedule is too crowded would our pupils suffer by having a little less Wordsworth and a little more Thompson, De Vere or Johnson; a little less Macaulay and a little more Lingard, Spalding, Repplier or Azarias?

After all, if we are constantly dinning it into our Catholic people that they must read Catholic literature, is not a judicious selection of this same Catholic literature worthy of a place in our own schools where tastes and habits are formed in hundreds of thousands of our young people? Must we wait till later on when, in the stress and strain of life, our people lose the appetite for reading? Is it fair to blame them, if in the very training-schools the great storehouse of Catholic literature was not thrown open to them?

Libraries Insufficient

Nor can we admit that the presence of Catholic books in our libraries at school is in itself sufficient to lay the needed strong foundation. It is an immense incentive, but it cannot take the place of the influence which daily contact with Catholic writers in the classroom would effect. If finally we pick out the best of our Catholic writers for school study, there need be little fear that Catholic students will lose any of the literary polish claimed for the classic writers. Nobility of thought, elegance of expression and sound doctrine fill the pages of many a Catholic writer and no student will lose in the mastering of them. Now, let my remarks be in nowise construed as a reflection on the grand work of our schools. There are indeed splendid efforts being made in many schools in the direction of Catholic reading. Some Catholic authors are used and used with great profit. Nor am I speaking of any lack of sound Catholic training; that, of course, is the bulwark of all our teaching. Our students get what we may call the fighting spirit for their religion; but do they get the reading spirit?

EFFORT AND SYSTEM

My plea, then, is for a more united effort, an organized system which will fill our schools with text-books of the best Catholic authors, a system which will make the reading of Catholic historians, orators, poets and novelists, a part of the regular schedule in Catholic schools and colleges. I would not dethrone the old, time-honored English classics; but it seems to me that if our Catholic writers deserve the place we demand for them in the home and the public library, they certainly deserve a place in the Catholic school.

Their entrance into the school may, undoubtedly will, require some readjustment in the schedule, but if we are in earnest about a Catholic reading public, the change will be worth while for the sake of the thousands of young men and women who will leave our schools with a stronger affection for writers who are preserving in history, novel, essay and poem, our rich Catholic heritage.

JOSEPH S. HOGAN, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

II—The Santa Maria Institute, Cincinnati

IT began, as many other important affairs have begun, in what was almost a chance remark. While visiting the mother house of the Sisters of Charity at Delhi, Ohio, in the summer of 1897, an old Jesuit Father, whose name is still venerated by Cincinnati Catholics, said to an Italian Sister whom he encountered, "Why do you not do something for your people in Cincinnati?" She replied by asking him why he did not start a certain foreign mission that very day. Taking the hint, he carried the matter to the authorities, and the problem which was grievously tormenting his apostolic heart was solved a few days later, when two Italian Sisters were commissioned to work among the Italians of Cincinnati. Within a few weeks, strengthened by the approval and blessing of that venerable prelate, the late Archbishop Elder, and with five dollars in a common pocket-book, they entered upon their labors. David with his sling-shot, confronting the mailed giant, was about to be represented once again.

HUMBLE BEGINNINGS

The first Italians settled in Cincinnati in 1835; the first church was built only in 1893. During the intervening years, religious indifference had made strong headway among these people, and when to this was added the work of proselyting, the situation was disheartening. The Italian priests in Cincinnati have ever been zealous and self-sacrificing; but without a school and unable to start one, they were forced to witness the continued ravages of their flock by the sectarian bodies, which, well supplied with funds and teachers, maintain schools and night classes calculated to entice the quick-witted children and their ambitious parents. Moreover, all was free. The little congregation, struggling for its existence, could not compete with those well-financed organizations; and their fellow-Catholics looked on with ineffectual regret.

The advent of the two Sisters of Charity was hailed with delight, and the rectors of the Cathedral and St. Xavier's Church placed basement rooms at their disposal, for the new school which they proposed to open in September, 1897. Meanwhile, the Sisters visited the Italian families and impressed upon the parents their duty to accept this opportunity of securing a Catholic education for their children.

THE FIRST SCHOOLS

But Italian pride balked at those basement rooms, and on the opening day not one pupil presented himself before the waiting Sisters. Several mothers, however, brought their offspring of school age to the Holy Trinity Parochial School, and the astonished teachers appealed to the rector, the late Vicar General Albrinck. Wiser than his colleagues, he turned over two well-equipped schoolrooms for the use of the children; and the beginning of the end of Italian proselyting in Cincinnati was at hand. By April of the next year the sectarian school was closed and the Catholic school, known as the Santa Maria Institute, numbered one hundred and twenty-six pupils. Besides these, ninety-one children were graded in the parochial schools, nearest their place of residence. Sunday schools were opened, at Holy Trinity and at the Italian church, and thirty-two candidates were prepared for First Communion. Several prominent Catholic women had rallied to the support of the Sisters, and classes in plain sewing, embroidery, music and other subjects, were established.

The closing of their school in the West End was not a withdrawal from the field by the proselyters. They sought a new locality, and thither the Sisters followed them. It required seven years of unremitting toil and vigilance before the Italian people of Cincinnati saw the final exit of the wolf in sheep's clothing. A better understanding is now beginning to prevail, and while the classes and settlements of other religious bodies draw some Catholics, their pronounced methods of proselyting have practically ceased. The fight made by the two dauntless Sisters, before this satisfactory condition was brought about, attracted interest far beyond the sphere of their activities. Their work received the blessing of the late Pope Pius X, while the Dowager Queen of Italy donated to it the sum of five hundred lire.

SPECIAL WORK

Without losing sight of the prime object of its existence, charity after charity began to cluster around the Santa Maria Institute. Seeking Italian children, the Sisters found Syrians whom they instructed and held together until a priest of their own rite was provided for them. Other foreigners were also aided, while the poor and unfortunate of every class, creed and color meet a saving hand held out to them by the Institute.

In every community there are cases which institutional effort cannot reach or handle, and where, if lasting good is to result, individual must meet and treat with individual. Work of this nature is written large in the history of the Santa Maria. The youth guilty of one rash act, the man who has "lost his grip," the girl rebellious against home restrictions, the woman repenting her first offense, what these and many others need, is not care given by an institution, but counsel and advice from a good friend. This they obtain whose star leads them to these Sisters. Working with the Juvenile Court as the Sisters do, the girls committed to the Institute suffer no stigma, since it is educational and not reformatory. Again, as the Sisters are in touch with the House of Refuge and the jail, unfortunate girls, adrift on the heartless world, which has exacted from them the bitter payment of their sins against society, find, through the Institute, some benefactor to give them a new start in life; while the convalescents, discharged from the hospitals and yet unfit for work, are directed to a haven where they may rest and regain their strength. For, helpless to meet even a fraction of the demands made upon it, the Institute keeps in close touch with the various charities and organizations of the city; and through them some way is found to meet a difficulty. All these failing, a place is provided by the Institute for destitute applicants, at its own expense.

One noteworthy accomplishment of the Santa Maria Institute is the arousing to a sense of their fraternal duties and religious opportunities of an increasing number of the Catholic laity. From the beginning the Sisters had to depend largely upon the laity not only for financial support but personal service as well. Their classes have been practically taught by lay people, and lay women have been their companions and co-laborers in their social work. One of their means for encouraging this is the Layman's Home Missionary League, which, imposing no obligations of fees, meetings, or regulations, asks of its members but two things: to keep a friendly lookout for fallen away Catholics and induce them to return to the practice of their religion, and to obtain the cooperation of their friends in the League, thus forming an endless chain of Catholic interest in the struggle for souls. I asked one of the Sisters the secret of their success in overcoming proselytism. She said, "We did not go about telling our people to keep away from proselyters. We got up something better; they heard of it, and came to us of their own accord."

This, it seems to me, is the ideal at which Catholic social workers must aim. Men on the whole, our struggling brethren in particular, want to do what is right. It is our duty to provide them with all those opportunities so lavishly offered by non-Catholic social agencies, and opportunities that embrace "something better."

ANNA C. MINOGUE.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A writer in the May Atlantic offers figures of inconceivable magnitude regarding the monetary cost, thus far, of the world-war. He estimates that up to January 1, 1916, the direct and some of the indirect loss to the nations engaged reached $55,000,000,000, and it will reach $80,000,000,000 by next August unless peace is made before then. Reckoning the average commercial value of a man's life to be about $2,933, he finds that the total loss in human life will represent $35,196,000,000.

The Rev. John Baptist René, S.J., who recently died at Los Gatos, California, was a man widely known and prominently identified with many Catholic interests during his religious life of fifty-four years. As a young priest he was director of the Apostolic School at Poitiers and thence was sent to Ireland, where he was placed in charge of Mungret College. On April 2, 1891, he became president of Gonzaga College, Spokane, Wash., and successfully guided the institution through the panic of 1893. His next appointment, which brought him more conspicuously before American Catholics, was that of Prefect Apostolic for Alaska, with jurisdiction over the entire Alaskan territory. In his old age he taught theology at Gonzaga University. Stricken with apoplexy, he finally retired to the Novitiate of the Sacred Heart at Los Gatos, where he died. Father René was a man of many interests and varied abilities, an accomplished musician and a great apostle of the Sacred Heart.

Under the appropriate nom de guerre, "Militant," a feminist writer expresses the following aspirations and views in the Unpopular Review:

> May the day soon come when every wife will be ashamed to be supported by her husband, for then she will secure for herself an independent income—then and then only will wives be free. Political freedom, economic freedom, free motherhood: these are the trinity of woman's emancipation. Without these she is a dependent and a dependent cannot be free. The terms are a contradiction.

This may be taken as a concise summary of the demands of advanced feminism, which is but another step in a movement whose ultimate object is emancipation from God Himself, for such and such only is the implied meaning of "free motherhood." Economic freedom itself, on the part of the wife, has a sense and purpose in the minds of these radicals that is no less directly opposed to the law of God. It is a slimy doctrine and the spawn of Satan.

The first annual meeting of the Auxiliary Committee to the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music is to open May 10 with a Missa Solemnis at the Church of St. Francis Xavier, New York. The music of the Mass will illustrate the three types of church music approved by the Holy See: Gregorian Chant, music of the school of Palestrina, and such modern compositions as conform to correct, artistic and devotional standards. This Mass is to furnish a practical lesson of what can easily be accomplished in any parish, and particularly in any parish that maintains a parochial school. In conveying the approval of Pope Benedict XV, the Papal Secretary of State wrote to Mrs. Cabot Ward:

> The Holy Father not only takes pleasure in pointing out in this praiseworthy propaganda an act of filial adhesion to His Supreme Authority, but He admires also this proof of a noble apostolate for the decorum of Divine worship, in order that the Faithful may live the life of the sacred Liturgy by experiencing, through the mysteries of religion, that sublime elevation toward God which revives the Faith and betters the practice of the whole Christian life.

The new committee, largely made up of lay people, was organized to lend support to the Papal College of Music in Rome, and to promote and stimulate efforts in the United States to create a sound standard of church music. The choice of theatrical selections for church choirs has lowered the ideals of Catholics in this regard, and the Motu Proprio of Pope Pius X, on sacred music, was part of his great plan for renewing all things in Christ. His reforms did not die with him, and today we behold them developing new strength.

A correspondent sends us the following interesting item. Some time in March the Catholic Standard and Times of Philadelphia published a notice headed: "Where Catholics Worship above a Jewish Clothing Store in Bangor, Pa." A picture showed the Faithful climbing up a ladder, set against the outside of the building, to reach the second story. A few days later the Reverend J. P. McKey, pastor of the little congregation, was delighted with an offer of $500 toward the building of a small but suitable church. In his grateful acknowledgment he wrote to the donor:

> Let me tell you, just the circumstances of your letter's arrival. I had asked at Mass a week from last Sunday for nine volunteers to go to Holy Communion for nine days, for the purpose that God might help us in the securing of a place and chapel. The five sanctuary boys volunteered immediately after Mass; then another boy; then six girls; afterwards, three women. The men could not go on account of their work in the quarries. Of the fifteen volunteers, three had fallen away from the practice of their faith before the opening of the chapel above the Jewish clothing store. They finished their novena of Communions at 7.30 yesterday morning. As I left the chapel at ten minutes to eight, I stopped at the post office and received your encouraging letter. The novena was made in honor of Our Lady of the Miraculous Medal. Does it not seem that the Mother of God is answering speedily the prayers of the communicants?

The happy little incident is given not only as an example of the sweet efficacy of prayer and the power of Our Lady's help and intercession, when we have done our own manly part to make known our needs and to relieve them, but it likewise illustrates the condition of many a struggling congregation. It enables us to appreciate more fully the glorious work of Church extension. A small sum may often accomplish a great good.

The editor of San Francisco Town Talk evidently believes that there is good reason for all to be duly grateful that Shakespeare was not "a moralist." To deserve that title, as understood in our day, a first condition is to be "very much alive to the inadequacy of the Ten Commandments." As a substitute any ideas may prove satisfactory, provided they are sufficiently "advanced." From the new ethical standpoint, Shakespeare gave us "little more than platitudes." Whatever were his faults, from the Catholic point of view, he was at least content with the Gospel code of morality wherever principles were involved:

> "Let all the ends thou aim'st at," he exclaimed, "be thy country's, thy God's, and truth's." A mere generality, of no consequence alongside the paramount question whether, if wives wish to abandon their husbands, the husbands, by the latest rules of the game, should get hot under the collar and bolt the door or generously help their truant wives to a possible higher realization of themselves. Shakespeare spent no time in solving problems. But, after all, why seek to gather thistles from roses? Shakespeare was a poet, not a Martin Tupper or a Bernard Shaw.

It is for this reason that he will continue to live. He was not a self-appointed prophet of a new social order and a new morality. Such writers are merely the oracles of their own deranged selves. "Before one cult of advanced ideas is sufficiently well established to be a serious menace to society, another cult comes to the front and destroys the first." So the idol Ibsen is succeeded by the idol Strindberg. Their feet are of clay and must crumble with time.

The high cost of publishing is the latest complaint of men who feel the pinch of war. The Pennsylvania State Editorial Association adopted a resolution in its annual convention to increase the price of one-cent newspapers to two cents. Moreover, it was the universal conviction, at the thirtieth annual meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, that the present white paper problem is a serious menace to the publishing business. Reduction in waste and reduction in the size of papers were the expedients suggested. Many have doubtless thought that while the war has caused great distress elsewhere, it has been a benefit to papers. Such is not the case. Aside from the greatly increased cable tolls and the expense of correspondents, there has been an astounding increase in the cost of materials necessary for the publisher. In an article published by the newspaper trade journal, the Fourth Estate, some figures were given to show that the prices of such materials has risen from one to 3,000 per cent. Lead has advanced from $4.25 to $7.25; block tin from $40 to $55; antimony, from $8 to $44; stereotype metal, from $7 to $14; monotype metal, from $10 to $16.50 and $20; glycerine, from 18 cents to 52 cents. Chemicals have risen from 1,000 to 3,000 per cent, gum arabic 100 per cent, wrapping paper and twine 100 per cent, type founders, supplies 20 per cent. The prices are not steady, but while there have been occasional fluctuations, the trend has been constantly upwards. The reason for this is to be found not only in the cessation of imports in certain lines, but likewise in the material needed for the making of munitions and clothing for the soldiers. "The average newspaper reader," remarks the Pittsburgh Dispatch, "has no conception of the thousand and one things, including brains and energy, necessary to provide the daily record of world happenings which he gets for a couple of cents. To the ordinary difficulties of normal times, and they are many and varied, are added nowadays staggering costs and the not infrequent doubt of getting the necessary materials at any price."

While there have been "good stories" from the front, the great march of events has been recorded, correlated and interpreted by men in shirt-sleeves and with eye-shades, in some obscure office. Such is the statement of an "indoor war correspondent," who had long been engaged in the London office of the Associated Press. "This war," he writes in the Outlook, "has been largely a war of fake stories and misinformation." Time was required even for experts to detect and catalogue many of the current figments of the imagination. Thus we are told of a certain correspondent in Copenhagen, "the human adding-machine," whose specialty was German casualty totals. "Although he kept them in suspiciously round numbers he was for a time convincing." Anti-Entente material, it is needless to say, seldom can find its way to America by cable.

> By virtue of her cable control England has become the Editor-in-Chief of the belligerents. She edits not only her own war copy, but, with trifling omissions, the copy of her enemies, and on occasions the copy of her allies. Matter passed by the Censor in Petrograd for transmission via England to America was often censored by the British before it was delivered to our office for forwarding, and at times dispatches, passed in France and sent via England because of delay on the French cable, got no farther than the British Press Bureau. I have seen many cablegrams from our Berlin correspondent, going also into the enemy's hands, that had been so scissored as to resemble Mexican drawn-work. Edited to taste, these cablegrams are stamped "Passed for publication," and may be forwarded to America, provided they reach the cable office with no alteration whatsoever. There is a censor on duty at the cable office to see that there are no interlineations on passed matter.

The night of the first great Zeppelin raid the writer watched the huge airship "with a professional anguish that burns within me yet," but there was no hope of forwarding any copy. An official version was given for transmission containing just fifty words. Yet "here was the biggest thing that happened to London since the start of the war." From such sources Americans are forced to gather their impressions of the great European conflict.

The Western Christian Advocate describes with approval certain advanced views now prevalent in church architecture. Old medieval ideas are discarded and new conceptions, more in accord with modern life, it believes, are finding expression in the latest ecclesiastical designs. The change is more significant than even the writer himself realizes.

> Perhaps the most striking innovation in church affairs is in building. The steeple, bell, and even cruciform ground plan are things of the past. New ideas in construction dictate buildings that look exactly like other buildings, and that, above all, are planned to suit needs, not planned to demonstrate ecclesiastical actions. One church in New York even proposes a church inside an apartment house, like the duplex apartments inside big flat buildings. Not an autumn in years has brought in as many new ideas in church practice as the last, and leaders in Christian work in America are saying that more innovations are just ahead that are even more significant, and that utility and up-to-dateness will characterize church management as never before.

Nothing could be more in conformity with recent sectarian developments than this latest innovation. In many instances the churches have been converted into lecture halls or social meeting places, where the economic, political or literary novelties of the hour are the preacher's theme. The essential doctrine of salvation is out of place and antiquated, since allusion to Our Divine Lord's teaching concerning eternal punishment for sin, from which men were to be redeemed, is banned as impolite, unsocial and medieval. Under such circumstances no reason exists for any outward distinction between churches and other semi-public buildings. Far different is the case with Catholics. Although content to offer up the Holy Sacrifice in caves and catacombs, or in the most modern of apartment houses, when necessity demands, they nevertheless wish that the House of God should have its own distinctive style, as set apart for the Holy Sacrifice and the Sacramental Presence of Our Lord. This is good art as well as evidence of a true spirit of religious devotion.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 5 } MAY 13, 1916 { PRICE, 10 CENTS
WHOLE No. 370 } { $3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, May 2, p. m.-May 9, a. m. —The German Note—The Reply of the United States. France: Anticlericalism Officially Rebuked. Germany: German Rule in Poland and Serbia. Great Britain: The Proposed Conscription Bill. Ireland: The Uprising—Punishment of the Leaders. Mexico: Starvation, Persecution. Rome: "Catholic Action".....97-100

TOPICS OF INTEREST

II–The Charities Investigation: Its Inspiration —III–The Popes and Peace—"The Rosary of a Parish Priest" — The Silver Wedding Ring — I–Irish Priests and Their Flocks.....101-108

COMMUNICATIONS

Father Damien's Leprosy—Inexcusable Mistakes —A Proselyting Scheme?—Thrift and Extravagance—Efficient Censorship 108, 109

EDITORIALS

Faith or Tooth-Brushes? — In Defense of Optimism — The New Criminology — Duties to Things—The End-Seat Catholic—Modern "Christianity" 110-112

LITERATURE

XXVI–"Father Prout."

REVIEWS: England and the Catholic Church Under Elizabeth—Shakespeare's Theater—A Book for Shakespeare Plays and Pageants — The End of a Chapter.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Caliban by the Yellow Sands"—The Current Catholic Mind—"My Lady of the Moor"—"Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles" — "The Mother of My Lord" — "The Passion and Death of Jesus"—"Holders of Railroad Bonds and Notes: Their Rights and Remedies" — "Bankrupting a Great City" — "Catholicism in Medieval Wales"—"Medieval History."

BOOKS RECEIVED 113-116

EDUCATION

The Kindergarten 117

SOCIOLOGY

Paganizing Charity.....117-119

NOTE AND COMMENT

Bishop Nilan and the Diocese of Hartford—Operatic Music in Church—Birth Control Popularized—Shakespeare Commemorations at Catholic Colleges—Justification of Assassination in Congress—Is the Dust from Books Dangerous?—Catholic Sisters Imprisoned.....119, 120

CHRONICLE

The War.—On the western front the Germans have had some minor successes near Dixmude and Loos; they have also occupied some of the French trenches on the northern and eastern slopes of Hill 304 in the Verdun section. Further east, however, the French have driven the Germans from Hill 265, north of Hill 295, which is the summit of Mort Homme Hill. East of the Meuse the Germans have made a slight gain between Bois d'Haudromont and Fort Douaumont. On the Italian fronts nothing of importance has taken place. It is reported, but without official confirmation, that Greece has taken over a portion of southern Albania and proclaimed Greek civil rule at Komitza and Argiro Kastro. On the Russian front there has been considerable activity near Jacobstadt, Dvinsk, Donbrovka and Czartorysk, but no marked modification of the general situation has been recorded. In Armenia the Russians claim further gains in the direction of Erzingan. In Persia the Russians have gained another victory, and are again slowly but steadily moving toward Bagdad.

Bulletin, May 2, p. m.-May 9, a. m.

On May 5, Foreign Secretary von Jagow delivered to Ambassador Gerard the note of the German Government, which contains the official reply to the communication dispatched to Berlin by Washington on April 20 concerning submarine warfare. The note apparently meets the President's urgent demand that "the Imperial Government should now immediately declare and effect an abandonment of the present methods of submarine warfare against passenger and freight-carrying vessels." Germany's concession is expressed as follows:

The German Note

As far as lies with the German Government it wishes to prevent things from taking such a course ["a turn seriously threatening the maintenance of peace between the two nations"]. The German Government, moreover, is prepared to do the utmost to confine the operations of the war, for the rest of its duration, to the fighting forces of the belligerents, thereby also insuring the freedom of the seas, a principle upon which the German Government believes itself now as before to be in agreement with the Government of the United States. The German Government, guided by this idea, notifies the Government of the United States that German naval forces have received the following orders:

In accordance with the general principles of visit, search, and destruction of merchant vessels recognized by international law, such vessels, both within and without the area declared to be a naval war zone, shall not be sunk without warning, without saving human lives, unless the ships attempt to escape or offer resistance.

The motive assigned for this concession is expressed with great clearness:

If the German Government, nevertheless, has resolved to go to the utmost limit of concession, it has not alone been guided by friendship connecting two great nations for over a hundred years, but also by the thought of the great doom which threatens the entire civilized world should the cruel and sanguinary war be extended and prolonged.

There is one reservation to the concession made by Germany, but this reservation is implied rather than declared, and though the note hints that, in the event of certain contingencies, there may be a return to the methods against which our Government protested, yet this does not limit the completeness of the actual concession.

But neutrals cannot expect that Germany, forced to fight for existence, shall for the sake of neutral interests secret [evidently this should read "abandon"] the use of an effective weapon if the enemy is permitted to continue to apply at will methods of warfare violating the rules of international law. Such demand would be incompatible with the character of neutrality, and the German Government is convinced that the Government of the United States does not think of making such a demand, knowing that the Government of the United States repeatedly declares that it is determined to restore the principle of the freedom of the seas from whatever quarter it has been violated. . . . Accordingly the German Government . . . does not doubt that the United States will now demand and insist that the British Government shall forthwith observe the rules of international law.

The Reply of the United States

Waiving all minor issues, the United States, in an official communication, bearing the date of May 8, has accepted Germany's "declaration of its abandonment of the policy which has so seriously menaced the good relations between the two countries." It takes for granted that the abandonment of the former policy is unconditional, but to avoid all misunderstanding declares very plainly that the United States cannot for a moment entertain, much less discuss, a suggestion that respect by German naval authorities for the rights of citizens of the United States upon the high seas should in any way or in the slightest degree be made contingent upon the conduct of any other Government affecting the rights of neutrals and non-combatants. Responsibility in such matters is single, not joint; absolute, not relative.

The note is firm but courteous in tone.

Anticlericalism Officially Rebuked

France.—The campaign of slander which proclaims the clergy as "shirkers" and traitors is producing results quite unexpected by its authors. It is uniting Catholics in every walk of life and winning champions for them even in the ranks of their enemies. The able and devoted Catholic deputy, M. Piou, has written an eloquent letter to M. Briand, the Prime Minister, asking him to put a stop to the agitation. M. Briand is evidently becoming less intolerant, or else more astute, for in writing to the Deputies of the "Action Libérale" he says:

. . . You have called my attention to the campaign carried on against the members of the clergy and . . . certain categories of good Frenchmen, and to infamous rumors . . . which accuse them of having first driven us into war and then shirked dangerous duties, even becoming accomplices of the enemy, and you ask the Government to put a stop to this. . . . They (the attacks) spring most frequently from political prejudices and from a spirit of controversy absolutely out of place in the face of the enemy; besides they are plainly without foundation. The truth . . . is that all Frenchmen, without distinction of social condition or religious and political opinions, are doing their military duty. The Government, therefore, intends to prevent every attempt, under whatsoever pretext, to set up differences between citizens, with the risk of rendering them suspect to one another and of destroying that "hallowed union" which is the essential conditon of victory.

To M. Briand's official condemnation of the campaign, a well-known Freemason, M. Maurice Bompard, French Ambassador at Constantinople, at the beginning of the war, has added his protest. In a letter to M. Ernest Daudet, he pays tribute to the patriotism of the French Catholics, the French priests and missionaries in the Levant. Writing later to the Figaro he enthusiastically praises the Marists, Capuchins, Dominicans, and the Brothers of the Christian Doctrine for their generosity and self-sacrificing devotion to duty. To the long list of the brave priests, etc., who flocked to the colors, he adds that of a "Dominican who hastened from the heart of Kurdistan to join his regiment" and later died heroically on the battlefield.

The new War Minister, General Roques, a practical Catholic, has boldly reminded all the Generals in command to put a stop to this campaign of slander and to see that the offenders be punished.

German Rule in Poland and Serbia

Germany.—The 125th anniversary of the granting of the Polish Constitution by King Stanislaus Augustus was solemnly celebrated on May 3 in all towns of Poland under German occupation. Archbishop Kokovsky officiated at the Johannes Cathedral in Warsaw, and a civic procession took place in which 250,000 persons participated. Public meetings were held in ninety-six different parts of the city, showing the new awakening of Polish national ideals which had been suppressed for so long a period. A report from Warsaw says:

This was the first time since 1815 that the Poles had been permitted to celebrate the anniversary. Poles who attempted a celebration twenty-five years ago were arrested and sent to Siberia. A deputation waited upon the Governor-General von Deseler to thank him for the permission he had given to hold the celebration.

Poland is at last enjoying unhindered religious freedom. The development of Catholic schools and of theological instruction in the national university is not only permitted, but fostered by the German Government. National aspirations are encouraged and the national language is given free scope. An enlightened course has likewise been followed by the Central Powers in Serbia, according to the account of the Vicar Apostolic of Serbia, Father Byelik. The population was in a state of starvation, with epidemics breaking out on every side:

The military authorities, therefore, established soup kitchens, rebuilt schoolhouses and founded workshops. A majority of the children had not been in school since the Balkan War; 10,000 orphaned children are now lodged in especially established asylums. The instruction everywhere is free and text books are distributed free of charge. The authorities feel certain that they will thus be able to diminish the appalling total of illiterates. A soup kitchen for the distribution of free meals is connected with every school.

The work of reconstruction begun in this spirit will help greatly to destroy national animosities.

The Proposed Conscription Bill

Great Britain.—If the plans of the Government can be carried to a successful issue, Great Britain will soon exercise the drastic powers already used by the other belligerent Powers, for the purpose of recruiting. On May 4, the Premier announced that the Government had agreed upon a policy of conscription, and proposed to urge a bill providing for a general compulsory service, not for limited periods, but for the duration of the war. Up to the present, Great Britain had been limited in her recruiting because of two conditions not applying to the other Powers: the necessity of maintaining supremacy on the seas through the navy and the merchant marine, and of financing the Allies. The justification for the proposed radical change in the Government's methods can be found only in the general consent of the nation, and, from the parliamentary speeches of the preceding week on the extension of military service, the Premier concluded that this had been obtained. The resignation of Mr. Birrell is in no sense due to the Government's resolution, and it is thought that the new measure will meet but little opposition, even from the Labor party. The following figures bearing on enlistment were submitted by the Premier:

Total enlistments		5,000,000
Irish volunteers	140,000
Colonial volunteers	688,000
Naval volunteers	151,000
Casualties	677,467
Eighty-three full divisions	1,826,000
		3,482,467
In service, not at front		1,517,533

To the number in service, but not at the front, may be added 190,000 men now recovered from their wounds, and a colonial enlistment of about 150,000 troops. Under the volunteer system and the semi-compulsory enlistment of unmarried men, about 4,000,000 recruits for the army were secured in England, Wales and Scotland. Admitting the correctness of these figures, it would seem that the military forces of these parts of the British Empire are nearly exhausted. The number of possible recruits to be affected by the proposed Act is variously estimated at from 300,000 to 550,000 men.

Ireland.—The uprising has ended in dismal failure. By May 2 the leaders were in jail and Dublin was comparatively quiet. At Ferns and Enniscorthy the Sinn Feiners still held out for a short time, but if official dispatches are to be believed, peace reigned in the whole of Ulster, in Arklow, Dunlavin, Bagnallstown, New Ross, and in the counties of Wicklow, Cork, Limerick, Clare, and Kerry. Over 1,000 prisoners were taken, and of these 489 were sent to England for trial. Thus the "Irish Republic" proved abortive, and this proclamation issued by the leaders of the movement became a pathetic document worthy of preservation:

The Uprising

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE IRISH REPUBLIC

To the people of Ireland:

In the name of God and of the dead generations Ireland summons her children to her flag which strikes for freedom. Through her military organization having perfected discipline, she resolutely awaited the right moment. She now seizes that moment and, supported by her exiled children in America and her gallant allies in Europe, but relying first upon her own strength, she strikes in full confidence for victory. We declare the right of the people of Ireland to the ownership of Ireland and the unfettered control of Irish destinies to be sovereign and indefeasible. The usurpation of that right by a foreign Government has not extinguished that right, nor can it ever be extinguished except by the destruction of the Irish people. Standing on that fundamental right, we hereby proclaim the Irish republic a sovereign and independent State and pledge our lives and the lives of our comrades to the cause of its freedom and welfare and exaltation among nations. The Irish republic claims the allegiance of every Irishman and every Irishwoman. The republic guarantees religious and civil liberty and equal rights and opportunities to all its citizens in the affairs of the republic. We place the cause of the Irish republic under the protection of the Most High God, whose blessing we invoke upon our arms. The Irish nation must by its valor and the discipline and readiness of its children sacrifice itself for the common good and prove itself worthy of the august destiny to which it has been called.

Signed in behalf of the provisional Government:

Thomas J. Clarke, Sean MacDiarmada, Thomas MacDonagh, P. H. Pearse, Eamon Ceaunt, James Connolly, Joseph Plunkett.

On May 3, Mr. Asquith announced in the House of Commons that four of the signatories of the proclamation, Messrs. P. H. Pearse, James Connolly, Thomas J. Clarke, and Thomas MacDonagh, had been court-martialed, sentenced to death and shot. According to the Prime Minister three other signatories were sentenced to three years' imprisonment. Unnamed "extenuating circumstances" saved them from death. At this time Commons was informed that Sir Roger Casement would be brought to trial without delay. A second announcement declared that Connolly had not been executed but was a prisoner, severely wounded. On May 4 the following official communication was issued:

Punishment of the Leaders

Four prisoners, Joseph Plunkett, Edward Daly, Michael O'Hanrahan and William Pearse, were sentenced to death and shot this morning, after the sentence had been confirmed by the General Commander-in-chief. Fifteen others were sentenced to death but commuted to ten years' penal servitude. They were Thomas Bevan, Thomas Walsh, Finian Lynch, Michael Mervyn, Dennis O'Callaghan, P. E. Sweeney, Patrick McNestry, Peter Clancy, William Tobin, George Irvine, John Doherty, J. J. Walsh, James McLinn, J. J. Reid, and John Williams. The death sentence of another prisoner, John McGarry, was commuted from death to eight years. Two others, Francis Fahey and Richard Davis, were sentenced to ten years.

On May 6 the execution of Major McBride was made known officially; this was the eighth man executed up to that date. On May 7 dispatches told of the transfer to England of another group of those implicated in the uprising. Others were sentenced to prison, the Countess Markiewicz for life. The mildest American opinion about these executions is that England has made a tactical mistake, the most severe, that she has committed an atrocious crime. When the news of the death of Messrs. P. H. Pearse, Clarke, and MacDonagh reached America the New York supporters of the Irish Parliamentary Party sent this cablegram to Mr. Redmond: "Irish in America, contrasting execution of Dublin leaders with treatment in Ulster and South Africa, are revolted by this sign of reversion to savage repression."

The opinion of the anti-Redmondites is thus expressed by one of the most influential of this group:

England has again shown herself in her true colors and has committed at once an atrocious crime and a colossal blunder. The murder of Pearse, Connolly, Clark, and MacDonagh, has added four names to the long list of Irish martyrs and placed four additional names among the Irish imperishables. They were guilty in England's eyes of the unpardonable offence of loving their country and they have bravely gone to the death which they welcomed for Ireland's sake.

But England has reckoned badly if she thinks that such work on her part will strike terror into Irish hearts. For every man thus done to death many thousands of others will spring up as her implacable enemies, determined to do all that they may in order to bring to an end her unholy reign of tyranny and savagery. Badly beaten in her struggle with the Central Powers, she dragged Irishmen down in order to glut her savage hate upon them and thought by their murder to frighten the Irish race. But she forgets the past and knows little of the race over which she has tyrannized for so many centuries.

Finally, in the course of a long editorial the New York Evening Post, which is decidedly English in sympathy, declares that England's act was inexpedient and remarks: "We think that time will show the Irish executions to have been a blunder in public policy." These citations represent the opinions of three distinct groups whose members look upon Ireland and Irish problems from three different angles.

Mexico.—Some idea of present conditions in Mexico can be had from the following abstracts from letters received during the week:

Starvation, Persecution

The conditions in Zacatecas approximate those described in Dante's Hell. The "staff" of Mexican life, corn, has all but disappeared. This important article of food is now selling at $300 a hectoliter—our liter is slightly larger than your quart measure—bran is $2 a liter, flour is $4 a liter, lard is $8 a liter and so on. Many people have starved to death; last week a corpse was found with a bit of raw nopal in the mouth.

The following citations are from letters written in different places in Yucatan:

(1.) We are almost in despair. The bodies of our nearest relatives are to be taken from their tombs in the Cathedral to be burned. My parents' remains will be committed to the flames; there is no way of saving them. N's people have taken the bodies of their father and brother to a private house, but then, they own the house. I have no such good fortune. . . . The Government has taken over the churches of Santa Lucia and Candelaria. The church of Santiago was treated as was the Cathedral: all the images of the Saints were burned. Alvarado says that if the Americans intend to take Yucatan, he will leave ruins only. God rules and will save us in the end.

(2.) We have had a gloomy Thursday and Friday, this Holy Week. All our churches were closed except the "Nuns," which was opened part of the morning. It was crowded with people, who went there for the Via Crucis. . . . The Protestant church, on the contrary, was open all day; its bell pealed continually and the minister was not molested. The officials are so set against religion that they changed the Easter vacation in order to have class during Holy Week. All our schools are mixed and the boys are requested to kiss the girls on leaving; they are bidden to do it lovingly, however!

(3.) Holy Week was gloomy indeed, thanks to the work of fanatics against "fanaticism." Almost all our churches have been confiscated, "occupied," as the officials say. The exquisite reredos of the Cathedral and the grand organ have fallen under the blows of the hatchet savagely handled.

(4.) On Monday in Holy Week the rabble went to the Santiago church and demanded admittance in the name of the police. Entering, they broke the image of Christ to pieces; on Tuesday Santa Lucia was confiscated; poor old Father Avila was dragged off to prison, and heckled for several hours. We are constantly threatened with death; everywhere one hears the vicious cry: "Death to priests who deceive people." Farmers are punished because they "enslave" farm hands; merchants because they "exploit" people; nobody is safe. It is reported here that the American troops have invaded Mexico; some say that they have joined Villa because Carranza broke his promises to the United States; others declare that Carranza's generals have deserted him because he allowed the Americans to cross the border. Nothing is known for certain, however; it is all rumor. No news is permitted to enter Merida. Last Friday we went to Mass, some at 5.30 o'clock; others at 6 o'clock. The church was ordered closed at 10 o'clock.

This sufficiently illustrates the nature of the religious liberty promised by Carranza.

Rome.—The Board of Directors of the "Catholic Action" which recently met in Rome reported considerable progress in the work of the Association and passed several important resolutions. Thirty diocesan societies have been affiliated. A great improvement in methods and results was noticed in such works as "Mutual Help Societies," "Agricultural Unions," and "Mutual Insurance Companies" for the protection of crops, stock, etc. The transfer of the Settimana Sociale from Padua to Rome and its publication twice a month in somewhat enlarged form was discussed, but no decision seems to have been reached. Owing to the war a widespread movement has taken place in the country to suspend the law forbidding servile work on holydays of obligation. The Board emphatically disapproved of the agitation which it deemed especially dangerous at the present time. A commission presided over by Count Santucci was requested to consider ways and means for the inauguration of a national campaign to control the application of laws governing testamentary bequests and the assistance given to war-orphans. A national association for the clergy was also discussed. But the Board confined itself on this point to an earnest exhortation to Italian Catholics to help and foster the associations already formed or to be formed in the various dioceses under ecclesiastical authority. Attention was called to the beneficial results to be derived from the amalgamation of these particular bodies into a Central Federation.

"Catholic Action"

PACIFIC SCHOOL

TOPICS OF INTEREST

II—The Charities Investigation: Its Inspiration

THE recent attack by the officials of the Department of Public Charities of the City of New York upon certain child-caring institutions in that city and its vicinity can be regarded only in the light of a conspiracy to effect certain very definite purposes. Evidently, one of these purposes was to supplant by a paid Board of three members, the present unpaid, representative and independent State Board of Charities, composed of twelve members from various parts of the State, who visit and inspect child-caring institutions, as well as others that are in receipt of public moneys. The smaller paid board, if established, would not only be subject to very direct political manipulation, but would also be more responsive than the present State Board of Charities has ever been to dictation from the self-seeking representatives of certain private charitable organizations which have for many years, with varying degrees of success, sought to impose their views upon public officials engaged in charitable work. Another and correlated purpose was, undoubtedly, to secure through such proposed paid board more direct control over the child-caring institutions of the State. Logically, the genesis and the subsequent history of the attack admit of no other explanation.

The main forces back of this movement are the representatives of the State Charities Aid Association and some of their immediate allies engaged in so-called organized charity work in the City of New York. For years these forces have sought to rule with an iron hand the charity work of the city and of the State, and whatever body or individual interfered with their self-appointed purposes soon became the object of their displeasure. As long ago as 1906 they attempted without good reason to interfere with the selection of a secretary for the State Board of Charities, but their advice was not then heeded. Two or three years ago they tried to dictate to the Board what it should say in its annual report to the Legislature on the subject of hospitals for the treatment of patients suffering from tuberculosis, but again their suggestions could not be accepted at their face value. Without any conference with the State Board they have frequently sought to secure amendments to the State Charities Law, as well as to other laws affecting the institutions under the Board's supervision. They were angered because the Board approved the recent legislation which provided public relief for the children of widowed mothers, and especially because the Secretary of the Board, as director of the investigation carried on by the special State Commission on the subject, brought to light facts which showed that organized charity in the City of New York had completely fallen down in its attempt to provide adequate help for such children.

The State Charities Aid Association in particular has long given definite evidence of religious intolerance, in so far as the institutions for children are concerned. For years it regularly published in its annual report a series of tables showing the amounts paid by the City of New York to Catholic, Jewish and Protestant institutions respectively, but it omitted to explain that the moneys were earned by the institutions in caring for duly committed inmates at per capita rates, and that the Catholics received the largest amount because they did by far the greater part of the work. The evident inference sought to be conveyed was that the Catholic institutions were being unduly favored in the distribution of city money, when the real fact was that the more inmates they cared for, the more they had to make up out of their own private funds, for both plant and maintenance. The general attitude of the representatives of the State Charities Aid Association toward public officials who disagree with them is well illustrated by the statement of Mr. Homer Folks, the secretary of that organization, in an address made at the Sixth International Congress on Tuberculosis, held at Washington, D. C., in September, 1908. In the course of the address, he outlined a platform for compelling public officials in small cities and rural communities to do their duty, from his point of view, as follows: "The municipality or the county, according to the plan of local government in the State, must be petitioned, threatened, entreated, persuaded, browbeaten, bullied into doing its duty."

The records of the State might be searched for many years without finding in them the admission of any other man in public work that he used, or intended to use, either threats or any other weapon of the browbeater or the bully, to secure the carrying out of his particular kinds of reform in public charitable work.

With the appointment of Mr. John A. Kingsbury to the position of Commissioner of Public Charities in 1914, came the opportunity to carry out plans, apparently long nourished in secret. At last the chance was at hand to attack the State Board of Charities and the private institutions at one and the same time. While no one can say to what extent Deputy Commissioner Doherty and the members of the so-called Advisory Committee, in the persons of Messrs. Reeder and Bernstein, were originally parties to the scheme, it must be apparent that they finally acted their respective parts as well drilled soldiers in carrying it out. Then came the visits to the institutions to get "evidence," and finally the vague and ill-digested charges presented to the Governor. If defects in the management of the institutions for children were discovered by the investigators of the Department of Public Charities, as alleged, the question naturally arises, granting that the purpose behind the inquiry was fair and honest, why the representatives of the Department did not go to the responsible heads of such institutions, the Cardinal of New York, and the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, for example, and lay the facts before them, in so far as they related to their respective institutions, requesting that such defects be remedied? This would have been the logical and orderly way of conducting the business of the Department in its relation to the institutions in question. No such course was pursued, however; on the contrary, the heads of the institutions were made aware of the criticisms of the investigators of the Department through lurid articles which appeared almost daily for a long period in the public press.

Inspired by his antipathy to the State Board of Charities, and to the private child-caring institutions, which were not made of the kind of material to yield honest convictions to either threats or entreaties, Mr. Folks—the stage meantime having been properly set by the agents of the Department of Public Charities—went to Albany at the time of the State Conference in November last, accompanied by his trusty friend and former subordinate, Commissioner Kingsbury, of the Department of Public Charities, and there pressed the complaint of the latter, involving the State Board of Charities and the management of the child-caring institutions, upon the Governor. The further important fact also appears that not only did Mr. Folks press such complaint, but that, according to his own testimony, he actually nominated the Commissioner to try the charges in the person of his friend, Mr. Charles H. Strong. This of itself is sufficient to cast discredit upon the whole proceeding. The State Board of Charities was to be tried for high misdemeanors. Issues of great importance to institutions largely maintained by the charity and public spirit of private citizens, were to be freely discussed by hostile minds. To speak in terms studiously restrained, it was scarcely fitting that the accusers should be allowed to influence the selection of the trial judge, much less to name him. However, since a review of the proceedings of the Commission is to be published as a separate article in the columns of AMERICA, I shall not now outline further reasons for my belief that from the beginning the Commission was necessarily biased.

Not only, as has been said, did Commissioner Kingsbury not bring the alleged defects in the institutions to their responsible heads for correction, but it also appears that early in the course of the investigation, he arranged to finance an anonymous pamphlet, prepared in cooperation with him by a "Publicity Agent" of the State Charities Aid Association, which was made up largely of newspaper headlines greatly exaggerating the testimony given at the hearings with relation to alleged conditions at some of the institutions. All this conduct tends to show very clearly that the real purpose behind the inquiry was not to secure improvement in the institutions, but to injure them in the eyes of the public.

While the attack was aimed ostensibly and primarily at the unsalaried State Board of Charities, it must be evident from its origin and history that one of the effects intended was to place the institutions for children under a small paid board. This board naturally would be more or less subject to the domination of the private charitable organizations, such as the State Charities Aid Association which has long maintained lobbying relations with many of the officials at Albany. Some idea of the sincerity of the representatives of this organization may be gained from the fact that although Mr. George F. Canfield, the Acting President of the Association, gave out to the papers of the State a pronunciamento approving the investigation by Commissioner Strong, which urged "that the judgment of the public be suspended until all the facts are known," he also, according to his own testimony, covertly gave consent to the publication and circulation of the scandalous anonymous pamphlet prepared by Moree, the "Publicity Agent" of the Association in cooperation with Commissioner Kingsbury, and financed by the latter. It is apparently true that the State Charities Aid Association later adopted a resolution deprecating the circulation of such a pamphlet while a proceeding of a judicial nature was pending, but the pamphlets had then already been given out. Properly to characterize the conduct of the "Acting President" of the State Charities Aid Association in this matter would require the pen of a Dickens or of a Thackeray. An Association with a leader of this particular "temperament" is obviously not of a kind to be entrusted either directly or indirectly with greater power over the public or the private charitable institutions of the State. ROBERT W. HEBBERD.

III—The Popes and Peace

IN the Easter message which he sent to the American people through the United Press, his Holiness, Pope Benedict XV, said:

"Peace be with you": These sweet words the Risen Saviour spoke to the Apostles, We, His Vicar, re-address them to all men. May the nations at peace preserve it, thanking God for so great a blessing. May those at war, presently laying down the sword, end the slaughter dishonoring Europe and humanity.

Throughout their eventful history it has been repeatedly the glory of the Popes to utter similar words of love and mercy. To record all that the Roman Pontiffs have done, often at great personal risks, by their denunciation of unjust wars, by their salutary decisions as umpires in world-crises and by their intervention as peacemakers between rival governments and armies, would be virtually to write their chronicles. In these articles such a task is impossible. With a few additional facts strikingly indicating the general trend of their humane policy, we must conclude.

The successors of Innocent III and the "Peace-Maker," Honorius III, imitated these statesmen. Urban IV (1261-1264) saw the German Empire convulsed by the jealousies and wars of the rival Kings of the Romans, Alfonso of Castile and Richard of Cornwall, and attempted, at least, to arbitrate their differences. If his endeavors failed, Richard, not the Pope, was to blame. A few years later, Innocent V, through his legates worked for a reconciliation between the Guelfs and the Ghibellines, the story of whose endless feuds darkens so many pages of medieval history. He also tried to mediate between Rudolf of Habsburg and Charles of Sicily. Although success did not always crown these efforts, the idea of peace and of arbitration, thanks to the Popes, gradually permeated the life and the views of the people. According to Rivière and Weiss (Pandectes Françaises), in the thirteenth century alone, a hundred treaties of arbitration are recorded between princes and their subjects. The people were already lifting their head. It was not in vain that a great Pope, Alexander III, had been chosen a century before as head of the Lombard League against Frederick Barbarossa, and after the triumph of the League at Legnano (1176) had, by the treaty of Venice, secured the people's liberties. It was the same great Pope, for whom even Voltaire has only words of praise, who condemned slavery on the ground that God is the Father of all and that all men are by nature free, and forced Henry II to do penance for the murder of St. Thomas à Becket.

When in 1294, Boniface VIII succeeded St. Celestine V, the Papacy was no longer to occupy the predominant power it had enjoyed in the thirteenth century. The age of the Crusader, of the man of faith and enthusiasm, was disappearing; the day of the "legists," calculating and cynical, was coming in. Gregory VII had faced Henry IV, who at one time at least trembled before the spiritual weapons of the Roman Pontiff. Boniface VIII, whose name, as Tosti says, groans under the weight of unjust slanders, had to oppose the shifty, unbending and soulless Philip the Fair of France, the King who stooped to the unkingly art of minting debased coinage and forging a Papal Bull. But Boniface stood manfully against him and forced him in one instance at least to observe the truce with the King of England. And it is to Philip the V, the son of this faux-monnayeur, that Pope John XXII writes: "If you reflect . . . you cannot reject or eye with disfavor the exercise of the right belonging to the Holy See to impose a truce." Innocent VI labored for the Peace of Brétigny, concluded between Edward III of England and John of France. Eugenius IV, the apostle of preparedness in his day, wished to unite all Europe against the hosts of Islamism. He wrote: "In order that no obstacle in Christendom may hinder the holy undertaking, the Pope wills and ordains, in virtue of the authority which he holds from the Most High, that the Christian world be at peace." And he threatened individuals with excommunication, communities with interdict, if they disobeyed. Martin V, his predecessor, witness of the havoc and disorder caused by the Great Schism, had earnestly striven to bring back peace to suffering Europe. And though Alexander VI was unfaithful to the standards of personal purity and holiness set by so many of his worthy predecessors, he was true as a prince and ruler to the peace-policy of the Holy See. Though in his time, the Papacy had lost much of its temporal prestige, Christian princes still turned to it as an international arbiter. By the treaty of Alcacevas, in 1479, Spain had accepted the decision of Pope Calixtus III, granting to Portugal exclusive trading privileges and the right of founding colonies on the west coast of Africa, between Cape Bojador and Guinea. When Columbus returned from his first journey, Emmanuel of Portugal claimed the newly-found lands on the strength of the treaty. King Ferdinand of Spain appealed to Rome. By the famous "line of demarcation," Alexander VI, with the decision and ease of the hero who undid the Gordian knot, settled the difficulty.

The boundary line between the two powers was drawn from the North to the South Pole, 100 Spanish leagues to the west of the most westerly island of the Azores; all that was east of the line belonged to Portugal, and all that was west of it to Spain.

The act was as diplomatic as it was simple. But it has been often used as a ground of accusation to prove the world-embracing ambitions of the Papacy. But says Pastor, it is absurd "to speak of Alexander VI as having given away what did not belong to him, and taken no account of the liberties of the Americans." The word grant used in the Papal document "signifies nothing more than the confirmation of a title justly acquired; and was understood in that sense by contemporary and later theologians and by the Spaniards themselves." Pastor adds, that the peaceful settlement of these boundary discussions between Spain and Portugal "should be . . . justly regarded as one of the glories of the Papacy."

We pass over the efforts of Gregory XIII (1572-1585) to mediate between the King of Poland and the Muscovite Czar, when the Jesuit Possevinus was the papal Envoy; of Urban VIII (1623-1644) to settle peaceably the succession of the Duchies of Mantua and Monferrat, and come to our own times and Leo XIII.

The Caroline and Palaos Islands in the Pacific Ocean had been discovered by Spanish navigators and claimed by Spain. But they had gradually been neglected and Spain had almost forgotten that she owned them. Germany's claim to these "derelicts," in 1885, stirred deep resentment in the Peninsula. Still greater anger was aroused when Germany occupied the island of Yap and raised the imperial flag over the little archipelago. For a moment the two countries were on the brink of war. Wiser counsels, however, prevailed and King Alfonso XII and Prince Bismarck requested Leo XIII to act as arbitrator. The request was an open acknowledgment of the power of the Papacy. The Pope's decision affirming Spain's sovereignty and ownership of the islands, but granting to Germany the rights and privileges of a favored power, was eminently satisfactory to both parties and was gratefully accepted. Statesmen have always admired the impartiality, the accurate historical knowledge, the logic, the judicious interpretation of international law, the nobility of views everywhere manifest in this epoch-making award. Its articles were evidently the text-book from which Mgr. Alessandro Bavona, the representative of Pius X, conned his lesson when he settled, as umpire, the famous Acre rubber dispute, which had been the cause of such bitter feelings between Brazil, Bolivia and Peru.

In the proceedings of the Caroline-Palaos arbitration, Mgr. M. Rampolla was Leo's Nuncio and representative at Madrid. He had as secretary Mgr. Giacomo della Chiesa, now Benedict XV. Trained in such a school, the Pope realizes the blessings of peace. From his lofty position and with the full weight of his office, faithful to the traditions of his predecessors and true to the inspirations of his own heart, in allocution, brief and encyclical, by warning and prayers, he also proves that he has seen the vision which has haunted the Popes for centuries. It is the vision not merely of the Pax Romana girdling the globe with the tranquillity of order, but of a nobler peace, the Peace of Christ which unites all men in the bonds of love. On July 28th, 1915, he wrote:

> In the holy name of God, in the name of our Heavenly Father and Lord, by the blessed blood of Jesus. . . . We conjure you whom Divine Providence has called to govern the fighting nations to put an end . . . to this awful carnage. . . . It is brother's blood which is being poured out on land and sea. You bear before God and men the terrible responsibility of peace and war.

Heeded or scorned, these prayers and warnings prove that the Papacy is still the advocate, the guardian and the promoter of peace. JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

"The Rosary of a Parish Priest"

THE Catholic layman is too apt to think of the priest as associated only with Sundays and an occasional Saturday. Therefore, the vision that "The Rosary of a Parish Priest" will conjure up before the minds of most lay-readers of AMERICA is one of a black-cassocked priest piously telling his beads in the sanctuary of some parish church. Yet the word "rosary" means a garden of roses as well as a string of prayer-beads. And there is no reason in the wide world, save only the association of ideas, why the picture presented should not be as idyllic as that which Halévy has drawn of the venerable Abbé Constantine in the vicarage garden at Longueval. I suppose that to philosophic thinkers the association of ideas is wholly and easily explicable, but to me it is a bit of a paradox. Certainly, I am unable to see anything incongruous in conjoined concepts of a parish priest and the perfumed petals of the Pernetianas. Was it not a Catholic priest, Canon Sheehan, who said in his book, "Under the Cedars and the Stars": "I only speak of what I know, and that is the flowers are the fairest and gentlest things the hand of God hath fashioned from His elements of nature; and one could almost hope they had souls to be reborn forever in the sunlit valley of Paradise"? Indeed, was it not a Catholic priest, the Abbot Johann Gregor Mendel, who, as a result of eight, eye-blinding years of experimenting in the monastery garden at Brünn, evolved those laws of plant heredity that, had Darwin known, might possibly have changed his theory of natural selection, as undoubtedly as they have revolutionized the theory of hybridization? At any rate, this paper has to do with a Catholic priest and the growing of roses.

About two years ago I read in the Country Gentleman an article entitled "A Maker of New Roses." It told the story of the remarkable outdoor nursery of a priest who had won for himself a place in the front ranks of Western rosarians and whose work was beginning to attract the attention of rose growers in the East. The Rev. George A. Schoener, who had been stationed at Rochester, Pa., in the diocese of Pittsburgh, was ordered by his physician to go west for his health. Father Schoener was transferred to the archdiocese of Oregon City, Oregon, and became the pastor of the Church of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, at Brooks, Marion County. To get the benefit of the bracing Oregon air, Father Schoener made his sick calls and other priestly visitations on foot. In these daily journeyings, his eye was caught by the flowers of the aromatic Rosa rubiginosa or Oregon sweet brier. Later he visited the annual rose festival at Portland, the "City of Roses." This was his inspiration to cross these rugged roses of the West with the frail flowers of the hothouse so that the gardens of the many might burgeon with beautiful roses from spring to frost. His success seems to have been marvelous; the more so since he has not had any of the advantages that the rose specialist usually enjoys. He was a priest and therefore poor; his library was small; he trenched the soil with his own hands; his own fingers planted his seedlings; and his own pen kept his records. His first public exhibition was to be at the June, 1914, "Rose Festival," Portland, and he was to have had a section of the fair grounds at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco.

Thereafter, I watched for some further account of his work, but none appeared. I contemplated writing to him but was restrained by the feeling that it would be presumptuous. Father Schoener had his confessions to hear, his sermons to prepare, his sick calls to answer, and between times he had to tend his roses. What right had I to impose on him? So I waited.

A few weeks ago I received a copy of the American Rose Annual, the 1916 year-book of the "American Rose Society," in which was an article entitled "Father Schoener's Endeavors." I turned to it with pleasant anticipations, and was distressed to read that fire had in about twenty minutes destroyed his church, his house and his garden, and that with these went his plants, his seeds, his library, his notes and his records. The fire was in truth a holocaust. Think what labor was involved in the achievements thus destroyed! "Father Schoener's study of the rose has been profound, and all the experiments have been based on the strictest scientific lines," says the writer in the Annual, who quotes Father Schoener as declaring that his " work of the past year was systematically based on the Mendelian laws of heredity." To carry on experiments along Mendelian lines it is necessary that the experimentations be of such extent and in such mode as to make it possible: (1) To determine the number of different forms under which the hybrid appears; (2) To arrange these forms with certainty according to their separate generations; and (3) Definitely to ascertain their statistical relation. For if two plants, which differ constantly in one or more characters, be crossed: (a) The hybrid will not be exactly intermediate between the parental plants; (b) One of the parental characters will preponderate; (c) The characters common to each parent will be transmitted unchanged to the hybrids and their progeny, and, therefore, in themselves will constitute the character of the hybrid; (d) Each pair of differentiating characters will unite in the hybrid to form a new character which in the progeny of the hybrid is usually variable. Hence, to experiment according to Mendel's laws, one's data must be multitudinous. To conduct his experiments, Father Schoener, in 1914, harvested 120,000 rose seeds from hybridization. These being sown, some 25,000 germinated and gave about 4,000 promising seedlings; of these, seven survived the flames. Father Schoener had no greenhouse and his equipment was of the simplest. Yet, though he worked alone, he made 1,500 combinations in roses during 1914, besides experimenting with gladioli, vegetables, fruits, ornamental shrubs and corn. In 1915 the results of the hybridization of roses were greater and the combinations were such as had always been thought difficult; moreover, they were entirely new, at least so far as any pedigreed list is concerned. It must be remembered, as Father Schoener points out, that the Abbot Mendel experimented only with peas, and that with roses the differentiating characters must be predetermined. Any grower of flowers who has ever transferred the pollen from the anther of one bloom to the stigma of another will realize what Father Schoener's labor has been, when it is recalled that in hybridizing in the open each pollenized bloom must be protected by a paper bag from the danger of fertilization by bees and other adventitious agencies.

"The Rosary of a Parish Priest" is now a fire-swept waste, littered with the ashes of roses; the precious, patiently prepared notes and records of the hundreds of crossings and the resulting progeny are now an impalpable dust. And I doubt not the heart of this parish priest is heavy, as the Abbot Mendel's was heavy for another reason. There is but one man who can rewrite these notes, as there is but one man who can rewrite these experiments. And the thought in my mind is, must he do this with the same handicaps that hemmed him about when he began the design? Burbank has been capitalized, incorporated and published in an edition de luxe, yet in the Popular Science Monthly for October, 1906, it is said that he "has not formulated any new or additional laws of species-change, nor do his observations and results justify any such formulation, and we may rest in the belief that he has no fundamental laws to reveal. . . . He has at his command the knowledge of no new fundamental scientific principle." Father Schoener, however, seems to have proceeded more scientifically and to have discovered the existence, if not the exact nature, of some new laws, and at the least to have extended Mendel's laws from herbaceous to woody-stemmed plants. Are there not among our Catholic men of wealth some who, for the advancement of the scientific aspect of floriculture and to make practical demonstration of the fact that the Church is the patron of science, will furnish Father Schoener with adequate equipment to continue his work? In any event that Catholics of today may know something about Father Schoener and his work, I have written this paper; otherwise perhaps the priest's endeavors, like Abbot Mendel's, would become familiar to succeeding generations only.

FRANCIS A. MCCLOSKEY.

The Silver Wedding Ring

THE position of woman during the pre-Christian epochs of civilization has become a favorite study in our time. The conclusions drawn are mostly false or misleading. The greatest difficulty presents itself in establishing the status of the Jewish woman. Her condition in holy wedlock, regarded as the vocation of every maiden, is of particular interest. Not iron, as under paganism; not gold, as under Christianity; but silver, dimmed in its brightness, was the wedding ring the Jewish woman wore. Though robbed indeed of its jeweled preciousness of unity and perpetuity, it still retained much of the beauty God had given it in Paradise.

Woman's position was no longer what it had been from the beginning. Her place in Oriental society had been traditionally determined long before Abram went forth from Ur of the Chaldees. Even where the primal Revelation was still clearly preserved amid pagan surroundings, monogamy was in general a lost ideal in Oriental civilization. Poverty alone enforced it among the poorer classes. The fulness of time had not yet arrived, nor was a complete change in ancient customs to take place instantly. Account was taken by Almighty God of the weakness of fallen nature and of the temptations which encompassed man. Many of the accepted practices were therefore to continue as before. Woman herself may thus have been preserved from greater evils that else might naturally have befallen her. It was sufficient for God's purpose that the paths to the heights of pre-Christian virtue and holiness were laid wide open to both sexes. The fruits of sin had left bitterness upon the palate of both.

A peculiarly instructive picture of woman's condition during the early patriarchal period is given in the life of Rachel. Few women ever won from man such love and such devotion as Jacob bestowed upon her. Her memory as a model wife remained enshrined in the hearts of her people. "The Lord make this woman who cometh into thy house, like Rachel and Lia, who built up the house of Israel," was the exclamation of the bystanders at the marriage of Booz and Ruth. Even to the present day the Church retains her name with that of Sara and Rebecca in the Nuptial Mass.

The first fact impressed upon us in this connection is the righteous horror of the Jews for the marriage of their sons with the women of the heathen nations. "I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth," said Rebecca to Isaac. "If Jacob take a wife of the stock of the land, I choose not to live." This was a noble word. Like a true mother and a true wife she fulfilled her high function, gently but firmly pointing out to husband and son the evil they were bound to avoid. Woman had therefore realized her supreme power and obligation of inspiring man with noble ideals and of keeping his feet steadfast upon the path of duty. "Juda hath profaned the holiness of the Lord," was the sad wail of the prophet in later centuries, "and hath married the daughter of a strange god." Had woman neglected her task and failed in her duty of guidance?

As a shepherdess Rachel was tending her father's flock when Jacob met her. The unnatural restraint placed upon woman in modern Oriental life, because of a false religion which has robbed her of her finer sense of womanly delicacy, was then unknown. Her purity was sacred to man. "Rachel was well favored, and of a beautiful countenance. And Jacob being in love with her said [to Laban her father]: I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter." For twice seven years he was to toil before he won his bride.

Taking into account the difference of time and custom, we might almost see by anticipation a trait of Christian chivalry in the devotion of Jacob for Rachel. It is no less pure than ardent; it is no less constant than heroic. In the midst of a heathen civilization the chosen people of God were already giving proof of the power of religion to purify man's regard for woman.

But many likewise were the dark shadows in that picture which were not to be dispelled until the coming of the new worship in spirit and in truth, when woman should be raised to the summit of her dignity. The idols which Rachel stole from her father's house and hid beneath her camel's furniture when he came to search for them, were a symbol of the Babylonic abominations which still degraded woman. Such superstitions continued for a time within the heart of Rachel side by side with the pure monotheistic religion.

Seven years of hard work made up the exchange Jacob was to give for her. Finally, outwitted by Laban, he received instead the elder daughter, Lia. She had willingly, it seems, made herself a party to the deceit which strikingly reminds us of that practised by Jacob himself when he won the paternal blessing in place of his brother, Esau. Accepting Lia for wife, he consented to serve another seven years for the love of Rachel. "Make up the week of days of this match," said the unsentimental Laban, "and I will give thee her also, for the service that thou shalt render me other seven years." The bargain could not have been stated more bluntly. The feelings of Rachel were not consulted, nor did they enter into consideration on the father's part.

Not only was there polygamy, but other customs likewise survived at this period which are repugnant to our Christian instincts. The consequences were preferences on the part of the husband, disagreements and jealousies on the part of the wives and quarrels among the children of the different mothers. That such practices were tolerated by the Jewish law itself is not surprising. Referring to the bill of divorce, Our Lord said: "Moses by reason of the hardness of your heart permitted you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so." Similar reasons existed for the legal toleration of other abuses, such as polygamy.

Divorce itself was a law favoring the husband, though it could not be invoked by him except for grave offences on the part of his wife. The moral laxity we behold about us in our own "advanced" civilization was not tolerated by the Jewish code, though abuses crept in against which the prophet Malachias inveighs in terrible words. The weeping and tears of the cast-off women before the altar of the Lord, he tells his people, caused God to reject the sacrifices offered Him and to refuse all atonement: "Because the Lord hath been witness between thee, and the wife of thy youth, whom thou hast despised: yet she was thy partner, and the wife of thy covenant." Thus true religion ever protected woman.

Woman's dignity suffered sadly, yet her place among the Jews was immeasurably superior to the position occupied by her in the surrounding paganism. It was higher and worthier than in the rehabilitated paganism of our own day. There was no false liberty allowed to man or woman outside the bounds of the law. If any one seduced a virgin he was to dower her and take her to wife, nor could he ever be divorced from her all his life.

Divorce was strictly limited. The most reverential obedience was to be given to the mother as well as to the father in the Jewish household. There was even a foreshadowing of the sublime Christian conception of marriage in that union of God with His chosen people described as the union of husband with wife. Israel and Juda are the "two women, daughters of one mother," whom the Prophet Ezechiel calls "Oolla the elder and Ooliba her younger sister." The same figure is used by the Prophet Jeremias. Conforming His words to the accepted custom of His people, God thus gives sacredness to the marriage bond, and impresses upon husband and wife the duties of love and fidelity.

The pure monogamistic ideal was proposed in the book of Genesis. There is mention of only one wife in the Book of Job, who says of himself: "I made a covenant with my eyes, that I would not so much as think upon a virgin." The love of man for woman found its Divine expression in the Canticle of Canticles, symbolizing the pure love of Christ for His Church; and an inspiring picture of true wifely dignity, virtue and usefulness is given in the Book of Proverbs. A few verses will suffice to show the loftiness of the ideal the Jewish woman might attain in her state of wifehood:

Who shall find a valiant woman? far and from the uttermost coasts is the price of her.

The heart of her husband trusteth in her, and he shall have no need of spoils.

She hath put out her hand to strong things, and her fingers have taken hold of the spindle.

She hath opened her hand to the needy, and stretched out her hands to the poor.

She shall not fear for her house in the cold of snow: for all her domestics are clothed with double garments.

She hath made for herself clothing of tapestry: fine linen and purple is her covering.

Strength and beauty are her clothing, and she shall laugh in the latter day.

She hath opened her mouth to wisdom, and the law of clemency is on her tongue.

She hath looked well to the paths of her house, and hath not eaten her bread idle.

Her children rose up, and called her blessed: her husband, and he praised her.

Thus in this queenly woman, the wife of a leader in the land, we find realized all the highest aspirations of the Jewish woman's heart in the holy state of matrimony. Religion itself had not failed. Though only a preparation for Christianity, it had produced in a single small land, and among a people hard of heart, more great and wonderful women than all the rest of the vast pre-Christian civilization could boast.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

I—Irish Priests and Their Flocks

SOMEBODY once said excellently that the priest holds the secret of Irish life. I have always liked the society of priests, and some of my best friends have been of this body, but it is only, I think, when one comes to live in Connaught that one arrives at a proper appreciation of the priest. When, however, your tent is pitched at the very center of the operations of the "Congested Districts Board," which has bought up the landed properties and divided them among the tenants, thus reducing the place to a wilderness for all but the tenant farmers, it is then that the priest comes as an alleviation of your lot.

I have often observed that men who are not under feminine influence, whose society is wholly or in the main masculine, keep their youth longer than the harassed family man. Indeed, sometimes they keep it to the end. Single men in barracks are apt to be a pack of wild schoolboys. The same I have observed particularly in communities of priests. When humor has been driven out from everywhere else, she will find her last refuge in the "community room" of a Religious Order. The priests "rag" one another like schoolboys, but the ragging is humorous. A dear canon of my acquaintance holds that it is the recompense of the man who has given up the human ties that he dies young,—though he live to fourscore and more.

I have been thinking of community rooms of English monasteries. In a country where humor is by no means general,—much money-making has driven her out,—I have hardly ever met a priest who had not a quick and an overflowing sense of humor. Being of the friendship, I have been privileged to hear of the community room pranks and quips and they were of the best brand of laughter.

Here it is again among these Irish priests. All around us the little farmers are very busy making money, too busy to make a joke. The loveableness of old, the dear delightful characters, one finds now only among the old people. There may be wisdom and poetry and quaintness and gentleness among these dear middle-aged farmers and the young people growing up, but so far I have found no trace of it. I turn for it to the old, and to the priests. Perhaps the difference lies in having your horizon bounded by America and by Heaven. The Saints were, I think, nearly always gay. St. Teresa and St. Philip Neri might be cited as examples.

I have just sat an hour or two with a priest who lives sixteen miles from my place, and at least as far from any other place. His stipend amounts to about $750.00 a year out of which he pays a subscription to the Times Book Club. There is not a house in all these wide spaces to which he can go for a meal and a friendly chat, unless it be to another priest. He said to me the other day that the life made you very shy. "When I go for a holiday," he said, "I leave off where I ought to begin. When I go away I'm afraid to look at anyone, but when I come back I talk to the people in the train just as though I knew them."

Unlike the priests of the prosperous eastern and southern counties and cities, who have many a hospitable board spread for them, the western priest has only the society of his fellows. His hospitality is only bounded by his housekeeper's good-will. The priest's housekeeper may be much more tyrannous than a wife, and she may be less, very much less, efficient than any mistress of a house would tolerate. Within these limitations the priest is only too glad to be hospitable. And it may be within your own power to smooth the way for the priest's hospitality.

When the priest knows you are his friend you have only to welcome him to your hearth and let him talk, for what he has to say is vastly more important than what you have to say, and you will presently learn more about the secretive people than you ever knew before. It drops out quietly. This afternoon we were talking about recruiting.—I trust this subject remains "neutral" enough for American readers. The priest seized on a phrase of mine with an eagerness which flushed his thin face, "The joy of battle."

"Tell the boys," he said, "about the joy of battle if you go recruiting. They were always a fighting race." He was strongly in favor of recruiting, though some people have denounced it, claiming that no enemy could ever come to Ireland. I know of one case where one such person remarked that the Blessed Virgin would never permit an enemy to get so far as Ireland. I mentioned this to a scholarly, pleasant young priest. He said, "But it would be very ungallant to leave everything to a Lady!" My visitor of today says:

> The best went first, the lads from the towns. What you call "joy of battle," comradeship, appealed to them. It never gets near the country boys. Some of the wild fellows who have gone out, were always up before the magistrates for one thing or the other, they're not bad inside. It's the lonesome life that makes them break out. They make grand soldiers. You may pitch into them and abuse them, and the next morning they will meet you and it will be, "Good morning, Father." I'd rather have them to deal with than the countryside. You know what they're thinking of you.

This reminds me first of the saying of an Irish bishop, which I think equal to the finest sayings of the Saints and Sages: "I don't care what a man's actions are as long as his heart is right."

In the second place, I think of the contact between man and man which, with the townsman, is a sort of education. With people on your own level you talk as man to man. With the townsman it is much the same. You speak honestly and he hears honestly. With the country people in the changed order of things, you cannot be sure. Strive you ever so hard to convince them that you are honest, you are not sure that they believe, nor that distrust of you is not behind that barrier of flesh which is the hardest of all barriers to pass.

Perhaps it is America, those who come back having suffered a sea-change. The last ideal that they will lose is love of country, else why should they come back at all? But they bring with them a contempt for the old simple ways and they make the lot of the priest harder.

"The old people would listen," says the priest, "but the son is an American. He thought that he knew better than an old Connaught priest." The same priest said of what we are accustomed to call loveless marriages: "They are seldom what they seem to you. These boys and girls will have played together as children, gone to school together, known each other as boy and girl. There isn't the indiscriminate match-making you think."

As to Irish wit, I have not yet found a western priest who will not rock over the story I could tell about the beggar woman who said of a frugal-minded priest: "Sure, I wouldn't be wishing he was dead, the poor man, but all the same, I wouldn't be grudgin' him to his Maker. No, indeed!"

Another story they delight in is of a certain priest who said to his brother, a great man for his people, who gives and gives, and trusts in Heaven to send more: "You should save, Patrick, you should save. How are you going to provide for your old age? You might die in debt the way you're going on and that would be an awful thing for a priest."

"Ah, don't be minding that," said Father Pat, "I'll be very quiet and comfortable with the money you'll leave me!"

Here is another story, not exactly germane but full of the humor of this part of Ireland. An old Connaught peasant—the old people are really beautiful—said the other day: "I do often be thinkin' of John the Baptist and the quare thing it was that him bein' a friend of the Almighty, that He'd let the head be cut off him through a bould hussy like that. But there, sure the Almighty does quare things. Why shouldn't He? There's no man to hinder Him."

This is a story the priests laugh at, being so sure of God as Friend and Father that they forget to be afraid of Him.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Father Damien's Leprosy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a communication to the Scientific American for March 26th, headed "Concerning Leprosy," Mr. J. R. Fraser of Dayton, Ohio, has the following paragraph:

> Father Damien developed leprosy, but I have indubitable evidence that he did not do so by fair means. Father Damien's one burning ambition was to die a martyr of leprosy and become a saint in the calendar of the Roman Church. I was in the settlement at the time of his death. I was personally well acquainted with him.

I wrote to Mr. Fraser at once, desiring a brief statement of the evidence in question, and remarking that from the context I judged him to allude to self-inoculation. His reply submitted three proofs: the weight of his own article, whose very object was to show that leprosy is not transmitted by contagion; the testimony of an unnamed "Prince of the Roman Church," which, however, he does not feel at liberty to reveal; and thirdly, two public documents drawn up respectively by Dr. Strong, the resident physician at Molokai, (the resident physician's name was Swift) and Mr. Reynolds the resident superintendent. Mr. Fraser protested, moreover, that he meant no injury to Father Damien, and failed to see how his charge, even if true, could touch the real merit of his work.

Meanwhile I had looked through some dozen sketches of Father Damien, and found no mention of inoculation. So, thinking I might still be in the dark as to his meaning, in my second note I asked Mr. Fraser to tell me precisely what sort of means he referred to and what was the gist of the two documents. His answer left no room for doubt. Anent the documents he says:

> In his report Dr. Strong admits that the inoculation of Father Damien may have been quasi-accidental, in that he may have had abrasions of the skin when handling lepers through which the virus may have entered his blood, . . . but while admitting the possibility he scouts the probability; his other hypothesis being that Father Damien inoculated himself deliberately. In his report Mr. Reynolds takes the latter stand absolutely and does not admit the possibility of pure accident.

Mr. Fraser then declares: "Personally I think there can be no question that he practised self-inoculation as a result of his intense religious zeal, and after he saw the hopelessness of expecting to acquire the disease simply by living in the same community with the lepers." He goes on to say that a certain Father C., a Jesuit (sic), a friend of Damien and of himself, told him explicitly that Damien "deliberately inoculated himself," and that he, Father C., had gone there with the same intention.

My last letter to Mr. Fraser is too long for citation here. Suffice it to say that after pointing out what his accusation really involved, I took up his proofs one by one, and showed how very far short they fell of constituting "indubitable evidence." I subjoined this postscript:

> To avoid misunderstanding, I wish to insist on an obvious distinction: that it is one thing to say Damien's leprosy was due to careless exposure or lack of personal cleanliness, and quite another to say he developed it deliberately and voluntarily, as by inoculation. We of course refer only to the latter course, which alone is suicidal.

An answer has just reached me. In this communication of over twenty-five-hundred words, only four short sentences deal with my letter, the rest relating to another controversy in which this same accusation seems to have entangled Mr. Fraser. The four pertinent sentences run:

> In concluding your letter you insist on what you call an obvious distinction between "careless exposure" and inoculation. I presume that by the latter you mean by a knife or other instrument. . . . If you can bring yourself to call such conduct [Damien's toward the lepers] "careless exposure" there is no common ground for us to stand on. What I would call fair means of contracting the leprosy would be the case of a man who, in the presence of the disease, took reasonable precautions not to come in actual contact with it, and yet became a leper.

Comment seems superfluous. Mr. Fraser's "unfair means," which he explained so unmistakably as signifying deliberate self-inoculation, have suddenly shrunk and dwindled down to mean nothing more than "the case of a man who, in the presence of the disease," failed to take "reasonable precautions not to come in actual contact with it"; this too, though his aim all along was to show that "no greater mistake could be made" than to suppose leprosy contagious. I do not concede that Father Damien failed culpably to take such reasonable precautions. But in either case Mr. Fraser's imputation is a grievous injustice to Damien's memory.

St. Louis, Mo. LEO W. KEELER.

Inexcusable Mistakes

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Christian art, like many another medium for expression of Catholic ideals and spirit, offers peculiar difficulties to the present generation of non-Catholics, because of their ignorance of hagiography and their lack of sympathy with the Catholic mind. An example in point, which is the more to be regretted on account of its presumably authoritative character, is the description of some of the detail subjects of the St. Anthony of Padua Madonna, popularly known as the Morgan Madonna, and now on exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City.

The bulletin, issued by the Museum to explain this painting from the Morgan collection, states that the female figure on the left of the Virgin is Saint Anne. This is incorrect. The figure is undoubtedly Saint Cecilia, as is evident from the martyr's palm, the book and the crown of paradise roses, the emblems of Saint Cecilia. The bulletin also states that the figure on the right of the Virgin is Saint Rosalia. This is another error. The martyr's palm and the wheel on which her right hand rests, the symbol of her execution, clearly indicate that the figure represents Saint Catherine of Alexandria, the patroness of Christian philosophy. Saint Rosalia was not a martyr but a hermitess. She is the patroness of mariners and her statue stands on Mount Pelegrino.

It is not of course necessary to be a Catholic in order to discuss Christian art, but for a correct interpretation of it, some knowledge of what its Catholic patrons and the Catholic artists themselves intended to convey to the world is absolutely indispensable. On such points, however, our educators and critics seem to have little curiosity. The ignorance shown in the present instance is the more remarkable as the painting is one of such importance. The mistake should be corrected, as it makes us ridiculous in the eyes of Europe. Incidentally it should also be a warning to our non-Catholic friends to consult Catholics when they are endeavoring to identify Catholic saints. Antiquarians have long since learned the lesson of asking Catholic scholars to assist them in interpreting Catholic inscriptions and symbols on recent "finds." If non-Catholic lovers of art would avoid blunders they should do likewise.

New York. ELLEN KIRK DOWNS.

A Proselyting Scheme?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA there appeared a letter signed J. L. M., which sounded a warning against a society called "The Fatherless Children of France." The writer declared this association to be a specious attempt to rob the children of France of their faith. As a member of the general committee of the society in Boston, I have seen nothing to suggest that anyone here has any such aim in view. It is the terrible need of these helpless little ones which has touched so many hearts in the United States and in Europe. The Society states explicitly in its printed prospectus that the object aimed at is to keep the children in their own homes, and that they are to be brought up in the religion of their parents. It was necessary to obtain a legal status for the organization, and this explains why the name of the French President is at the head of the committee. The management of the association, however, is quite independent of Government officials. It was stated in the newspapers that a distinguished prelate had given his sanction to the society. I have seen no notice of the withdrawal of his name. It would be a tragedy indeed if a society founded for such a praiseworthy object should deteriorate into an anti-Catholic crusade, and I still cling to the hope that the sinister rumors concerning it, which have recently been published, will prove to be unfounded.

Boston. J. G. ROBINS.

Thrift and Extravagance

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The strikingly forceful manner in which a forlorn truth was driven home in the issue of AMERICA of April 29, prompts the question as to the amount of wholesome good which might be accomplished for all the readers of your paper, young and old, by a series of articles on the matter only touched upon in the account of the shrewd but kindly property-owner, who dissuaded a young couple from engaging a sixty-five-dollar apartment on a forty-five-dollar monthly income. In my humble opinion the writer of the comment on the extract from the Gateway, only outlined the picture, and it is a pity that we should be deprived of the benefit that would come from a series of articles on the results of the extravagance not only of the young, but also of the average Catholic. I venture the suggestion that you invite contributions from your readers on the questions of thrift and extravagance, with the purpose of calling attention to the compelling necessity of making popular and universal among our people, practices which are born of true Catholic teaching. Thrift is the handmaid of religion, for the truly religious are never extravagant.

Dorchester, Mass. JAMES D. RUSSELL.

Efficient Censorship

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Mohler's article, "Censorship Needed but Not Wanted," in AMERICA for April 8, and Mr. Murray's communication in the succeeding issue, have the right ring and should awaken echoes in many Catholic breasts. The latter contribution, especially, pleases me by its militant appeal. Evidence increases day by day of the strength of the hold that the flesh and the devil have on the theater. Meanwhile the world looks on and approves. For example, the Saturday Evening Post which boasts of two and a half million readers—among them doubtless multitudes of Catholics who never look at a Catholic paper—joins in the gibes of metropolitan journals against legislative censorship of "movie" films. In this connection it is pertinent to remark that our press as a whole is largely under the domination of its advertizers. The receipts from this source are so enormous that they exert a very powerful influence over editorial utterances, for it is a well-known fact that this class of patrons has large investments in the theaters, and is far from fastidious about the moral standards of the pictures and plays produced in them. What commercialized art seeks above all is revenue.

Many Catholics, uneasy and anxious at the growing and ubiquitous evil of licentious or suggestive motion-pictures, must, like the writer, be asking themselves why our leaders have not more positively and systematically lent the weight of their influence to the campaign against this and kindred evils, and why they have not raised their voices in favor of efficient censorship.

Clarksville, Texas. G. J. R.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Faith or Tooth-Brushes?

THE lengthy commendation of the Panama Protestant Conference, appearing in the New York Globe for May 2, is an interesting and, in some respects, an exceedingly truthful document. While the writer refers to the Conference as "a religious congress," he regards as "reactionary" the statement of "a clerical brother from Cuba," who affirmed that he knew nothing about the commerce, industries or politics of his native isle. "These things," averred the clergyman, "are none of my business. My business is to know Jesus Christ and Him crucified." This eccentric cleric must have felt as lonely as a bee on Broadway, for, comments the Globe, "the tone of the conference was against him." From the published accounts, it seems but too true that Jesus Christ crucified had very little to do with that gathering for the conversion of the "decadent Latins." There was no room for Him in discussions occupied by matters of higher import, for > Reports indicated that the Christian workers were applying themselves to the most intensely practical problems of the people throughout South America. . . . The missionaries are attacking tuberculosis, teaching the use of the tooth-brush, feeding half-starved children so that they can go to school, showing the authorities that they ought to let the little ones play in the public parks, and teaching them how to play; they have cooking-schools, sewing-schools, and type-writing-schools; they are fighting flies and mosquitoes; they have come down out of the temple and are grappling with the real needs of the people.

The high priests of the modern religion have indeed "come down out of the temple," not to grapple with "the real needs of the people," but, apparently, to teach that it is more important to know the use of a tooth-brush or a typewriter, than "to know thee, the one, true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." No paragraph could more pointedly mark the essential difference between the Catholic and the modern Protestant missionary spirit. Like his Master, the Catholic priest is mindful of the temporal needs of the people, but all his teaching is founded on the Divine principle, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his justice." If the Globe is to be believed, the Protestant missionary substitutes courses in hygiene, social science and domestic economy, for the saving truths of the Gospel. Yet what the world needs today is not more bodily comfort, but more supernatural religion. And where will the modern world find "religion, pure and undefiled," save in that Church which has never ceased to teach that man's first duty is the care of his immortal soul?

In Defense of Optimism

WHENEVER editors are at a loss for matter to fill their pages, starting a "symposium" is always an unfailing solution of the difficulty. The question chosen for discussion is a matter of only secondary importance. The prime requirement for a successful symposium is to have enough men and women of name and fame airing their views on the subject selected. Indeed, the more varied in character and competence are the parties to the discussion, the more interesting it is sure to be. A popular actress's attitude toward Anglican Orders, for example, is likely to be more entertaining than a bishop's; and a champion golfer's views on the cause of the war will probably be more amusing than a veteran diplomat's. But a living authors' symposium, held not so long ago, on the well-worn question: "Is the American novel inferior to the British novel?" resulted on the whole in the utterance of more wisdom than is common in such discussions. One American novelist yields the palm to England at once, saying: "Americans demand from writers an evasive idealism instead of a straightforward facing of realities. In England the demand is for a direct and sincere interpretation of life." Moreover, we are hopelessly addicted on this side of the water to "sham optimism." But as it turns out that the American novels most widely read in England are the very ones that are positively exuding "evasive idealism" and "sham optimism," the original assertion was warmly controverted.

Several of our clean and cheerful American writers then took up valiantly the defense of the optimistic and idealistic outlook on life, saying:

> Thus it seems to be constantly taken for granted that "sentimentalism," say, is a concrete and measurable thing, like red paint; that "truth" is as obvious and recognizable as a brown derby; that the "philosophy of life" roughly described as "pessimism" is obviously truth, and the philosophy known as "optimism" no less obviously false; that great artists are invariably "pessimistic" or "realistic," while "optimism" or "romance" is a palpable tin horn played by charlatans to tickle the poor rabble, and so on. . . . A great many brilliant men and women, whose lives are in their country's history, have been "optimists" and "evasive idealists." That is to say, they have profoundly believed that life had a meaning and a beneficent one, and they have strangely regulated their personal lives in response to an "ideal" which they never saw, took up in the hand, tasted or rang upon a counter. . . . "Idealism," true or false, seems to play a large and often a commanding part in the lives of the vast majority of Americans. Our novelists consequently seem to be quite right to represent these lives as thus influenced and, occasionally at least, thus rewarded. Whatever the commands of realistic criticism, it can scarcely be the business of the novelist, of every novelist, to invent new and original codes of morals. And while I too have been sickened by "sugary philosophies" which seemed to me to have no relation with life, I am convinced that I have read "pessimism" which was as false as any "optimism" and "realism" which traduced life beyond the dreams of romance. . . . Just why the "realities of life" should always mean the filth and brambles, sticks and stones and stumbling-blocks of our daily pathway I have never understood. But such seems to be the case. To most critics there are evidently no pleasantly agreeable, decent "realities of life." But—I believe that there are and that these pleasantly agreeable, decent "realities" may lend themselves to just as sincere and direct an interpretation of life as may—the other kind.

Well said! By an unfortunate perversion of language "realism" has come to connote in the literary jargon of the day only what is ugly, sordid or unclean. But whatsoever things are modest, lovely and of good repute, it must be remembered, are thoroughly "real" too.

The New Criminology

A HOPEFUL client of the new criminology now languishes in a Kansas jail. The recital of his misdeeds, which include the murder of a girl of ten years, so revolted the hardened inmates of the jail, that they attempted to remove him from their midst by means of a short rope and a tree. Of course, this bestial person is not a criminal; he is a victim of society, and by his own confession, poor dear, is an invalid. Years ago, he relates with composure, he was kicked in the head by a mule. Unfortunately, the discerning animal's blow was not lethal; but since that dark day, the invalid, although by no means unable to take his place in society and earn a fair living by his trade, has been quite unable to distinguish between right and wrong. In a touching letter, he prays the aid of a surgical operation, "that I may be restored to a normal state." The invalid's pitiful appeal has drawn Niagaras of tears from the weak-minded and the morbid. Why think of the dead, the innocent little one, first ruined and then murdered? For her no tears; no indignation for the outraged majesty of the law; nothing but a revolting and horrible sentimentality founded upon perversion, and poured out upon a wretch whose very presence darkens the earth.

Forty years ago, half in earnest and half jestingly, the subject was reviewed by Mark Twain:

The petition had been largely signed; many tearful and eloquent meetings had been held, and a committee of sappy women had been appointed to go in deep mourning and wail around the governor, and implore him to be a merciful ass and trample his duty under foot. Injun Joe was believed to have killed five citizens of the village, but what of that? If he had been Satan himself there would have been plenty of weaklings ready to scribble their names to a pardon-petition, and drip a tear on it from their permanently impaired and leaky water-works.

Has the humorist gone beyond the facts? Rather, he has understated them. Nor is this disease confined to Kansas; it is growing frightfully common. We have much tenderness for criminals; but we exercise our severity upon the physically and mentally afflicted, who as "wards of the State," may be freely used for vivisection and other experimental work. Thus do we preserve the threatened balance of justice.

Duties to Things

MOST people will agree that the President left himself open to very grave misconception when he said in the course of his recent speech at Chevy Chase, that "we do not owe any duty except to those things we believe in." Perhaps it would be quibbling to point out that the expression, "duty to things," is a clear perversion of the very notion of duty, for everyone knows that although we have duties concerning things, we have no duties to them. Duties are correlatives of rights, and neither rights nor duties have any place except in intelligent beings. Man has no duties save to God, to his fellow-men and to himself. This mistake, therefore, may be attributed to a slip of the tongue; it is not likely that the President's careful pen would have made it. The more serious misconception to which he has laid himself open is contained in his restriction of the sphere of duty "to those things we believe in." The editor of the New York Sun takes exception to this statement as being wanting in "accurate philosophical postulation." This characterization is rather cryptic, but it needs only a glimmering of ethics to see that the sentence is susceptible of very dangerous interpretations. No matter what thought may have been behind it, its phrasing leaves much to be desired.

"We do not owe any duty except to those things we believe in." This is obviously incorrect. Facts are not changed by any one's attitude toward them. Ignorance concerning them does not alter their objective reality. Rome exists, and the actuality of its existence is not in the least affected by refusal to believe in it. Duties spring from actually existing relations between intelligent beings. Given the relations, the duty is inevitable. One may not be conscious of the duty, if he does not believe in it, but his ignorance or his disbelief does not do away with the moral obligation. The belligerent nations do not believe in our rights to travel and trade, or at least not in the fulness of those rights as we understand them. If the President's dictum were true, we should be wrong in insisting that they have the duty of respecting those rights. If "we have no duty except to those things we believe in," it is inconsistent to hold that the nations at war have duties to things they do not believe in. This is but one example of the logical sequence of an erroneous principle. From that false principle would flow all sorts of conclusions, disruptive of social relations. What would become of law and order, if men were free to repudiate obligations because, forsooth, they did not believe in them?

Those who speak much can scarcely hope to speak on all occasions with wisdom. Therefore it is that the Scriptural classic on the use of the tongue is extremely blunt in its counsel that men be "slow to speech." Certainly in a matter of this kind there is need of tolerance of judgment, for language is at best a difficult medium for the expression of thought. At the same time there is also need of prudence and reticence, lest by inaccurate statements harm be done. This caution is applicable especially to those whose high place gives to their public pronouncements an adventitious authority quite apart from any intrinsic value. Of such men we have a right to expect that, when they treat of ethical principles that have far-reaching consequences, they phrase their thoughts in such way as to exclude the very possibility of anarchical interpretations. The expression, "we owe no duty except to those things we believe in," does not meet this requirement.

The End-Seat Catholic

THERE is a certain type of Catholic whose striking characteristics sharply distinguish him, or as often perhaps her, from the rest of the Faithful. Not that he is notably pious and devout. Indeed, when the ordinary evening services of the Church are going on, his chronic absence has been observed, and even at Sunday's Low Mass, he is often the last to enter the church and the first to leave it. Being a man of many duties and anxieties, he requires, of course, all the rest and recreation he can possibly crowd into the only day of comparative leisure the week affords him. Social engagements, moreover, of a most momentous nature have been known to make him even omit Mass on Sunday altogether.

But he is a most enthusiastic admirer withal of the Church's beautiful liturgy and is passionately fond of assisting at high functions, when the ritual is particularly splendid, when the surpliced choir has an elaborate program ready, when an eloquent preacher has been announced, when the pews are thronged with fashionable folk, and when the sanctuary is filled with clergy and the bishop is on his throne. On such occasions, particularly at Christmas and Easter, our ritual-loving friend suddenly becomes punctual and pious. Reaching the church betimes he selects a desirable pew, solemnly seats himself at its outer end and becomes absorbed in his devotions. From that moment all who essay to enter that pew, even though they be meek parishioners who have held sittings in it for years, he regards as insolent intruders. First they must undergo his angry scrutiny and then humbly implore permission to enter their own pew. On deliberately weighing the justice of the petition, he may decide that he can grant it, provided he does not lose thereby his advantageous place at the end of the bench. So he graciously allows the interlopers to pass with difficulty in front of his ample person and find narrow sittings at the other end of the pew. Each time his devotions are thus interrupted by inconsiderate parishioners, our end-seat worshiper grows more and more angry and impatient, so that his soul's peace is hopelessly gone long before the sermon begins. Indeed, so perturbed in spirit do these outrageous interruptions leave him that the splendid ritual, the soothing music, and the fervent discourse are equally incapable of restoring his wonted calm. Nay, even the "plate" passes him by unnoticed and unheeded. But all would have been so different had he only yielded to another that end seat!

Modern "Christianity"

"SIXTY-FOUR out of sixty-seven members of the New York Presbytery," writes an indignant correspondent to a New York newspaper, "admit to the ministry these young men who will not affirm the Virgin Birth, and who openly doubt the resuscitation of Lazarus and other Gospel miracles. Can we go much farther?" In common with the usual practice of the press, the correspondent utterly confounds the Virgin Birth with the Immaculate Conception; but he is surely correct in suspecting that the limits of orthodoxy have been fairly overstepped by this latest action of the always erratic New York Presbytery. Reduced to plain terms, the admission of these young men to the ministry means that, in the mind of the Presbytery, men who believe neither in the Divinity of Jesus Christ, nor in the inerrancy of the Scriptures, are fit persons to occupy the pulpits of the Presbyterian Church. John Calvin held many doctrines from which the Catholic turns with horror, but he never faltered in his belief that Jesus Christ was in all truth God, nor did he regard the Holy Scriptures as human, fallible documents. It would surely be unjust to charge the apostasy of a single Presbytery upon the whole body; yet if such authorities as may exist in the Presbyterian communion do not disavow the action of their New York confrères, the reproach of denying Christ must be visited upon the whole organization.

Here precisely is the difficulty. Logically no authority with power to speak with finality exists within any Protestant communion. The more orthodox brethren may grieve, deplore, and withdraw the good right-hand of fellowship, but these are mere external actions to which no sanction binding in the innermost conscience corresponds. If my prayerful, earnest reading of the Scriptures leaves me with the conviction that Lazarus was not dead, but merely in a cataleptic state, and if, further, I accept a philosophy which teaches the impossibility of miracles, both reason and my God-given, but Luther-won, right of private interpretation form an amply sufficient justification before God and man. "Here I stand," and, in the language of the day, "What are you going to do about it?" Practically this is the point of contention between the New York Presbytery and all Presbyterians official bodies which yet retain an unshaken belief in the Divinity of God's Son. They can do nothing but protest, and the protest can embody no obligation in conscience to submit. Only to the Church of Christ is it given to bind the souls of men.

LITERATURE

XXVI—"Father Prout"

ON Friday, May 18, 1866, in his little entresol at 19 Rue des Moulins, Paris, there died, fortified by the Sacraments of the Church, Francis Sylvester Mahony, in the sixty-second year of his age. At his bedside were his sister, Mrs. Ellen Woodlock, and his faithful friend and confessor, Abbé Rogerson, of the Church of St. Roch. Ten days later in St. Patrick's Church in the City of Cork, Bishop Delaney sang the dead priest's requiem, and he was buried in the graveyard of St. Anne, Shandon. There, from the belfry that he has made forever famous, "The Bells of Shandon" have chimed for fifty years over all that was mortal of the gifted "Father Prout." As the poet Denis Florence McCarthy sang:

> So where'er thou sleepest, with a love that's deepest > Shall thy land remember thy sweet song and thee,
> While the Bells of Shandon
> Shall sound so grand on
> The pleasant waters of the River Lee.

McCarthy was a true prophet, for together the "Bells of Shandon" and the name of "Father Prout" have traveled and still travel the world over, nor, while one lives, will the other ever be forgotten.

Regarding the rare but erratic character of this Irish litterateur's genius and personality, no one perhaps has summarized it better than has Father George O'Neill, S.J., in his admirable essay on "Father Prout." He writes:

> A clerical student obstinately bent on ordination yet early slipping into the rôle of the professional jester; a priest who shows capacity for splendid labor and self-sacrifice yet turns into an erratic combination of the dilettante and the hack-writer; a vigorous panegyrist of the Society of Jesus who is always ready for a fling at the older Religious Orders; a Roman ecclesiastic who from Rome acts as correspondent of anti-Roman English journals; an Irish priest of the Repeal days who is a violent hater of O'Connell; an Irish Catholic litterateur who delights in heckling Moore; a lover of literature equally enthusiastic about the sage Cornelius à Lapide and the frivolous Béranger: such, and yet more than these, were the antitheses combined in that remarkable man Francis Sylvester Mahony. . . . If in long distant centuries the microscopes and knives of what is called "higher criticism" ever come to be applied to him, the "higher critics" will have no difficulty in cutting him up into three or four Mahonys in addition to two or three Prouts.

One of the things which will then undoubtedly support the theory of multiple Mahonys or plural Prouts is the fact that three years of his life, from his thirtieth to his thirty-third, will seem to have contained practically all the work by which he lives in literature. His first contribution to Fraser's Magazine, "Father Prout's Apology for Lent" appeared in April, 1834. Almost every month thereafter up to the end of 1836 Fraser's contained a "Prout" paper; then they stopped and thereafter there is nothing of importance save a few scraps of verse published in Bentley's in the following two years, a poem or two a little later, and an "Inaugural Ode" for the Cornhill Magazine started by Thackeray in 1860. His "Letters of Don Jeremy Savonarola," written from Rome to the London Daily News, under Dickens' editorship, are of little more than slight literary interest, which is true also of his correspondence from Paris to another London paper in the closing years of his life (1858-1866) a part of which has been collected. In those three short years (1834-1836 inclusive) he published that amazing and utterly unique collection now known as the "Reliques," the perpetual joy of those who in these days can appreciate a type of scholarship and culture which, as Father O'Neill says, "was one which flourished in the schools and in the choicer society he haunted, but which has quite passed away from schools and society since his time."

When Mahony was a boy, education began early and was a serious matter. At eleven he entered Clongowes Wood College, a Jesuit school which reeked so of the classics that he learned there to write Latin verse that Blackwood's was glad to print. At fifteen he went to St. Acheul near Amiens and at sixteen he entered the Jesuit novitiate in Paris. Two years of probation being completed the young Jesuit was sent to Rome for his "philosophy." I need not enter here upon his "vocational" difficulties; suffice it to say that he spent several years in Rome in study of a most varied kind. Father O'Neill writes:

> Rome indeed seems to have been Mahony's Capua; where the delights of desultory reading and the charms of light verse-making destroyed his power of serious application, and where discipline lost the power of controlling his whimsical instability. The peculiar type of litterateur he afterwards became was forming itself on a multifarious diet assimilated by a rarely-gifted memory; but his priestly ideals, his power for definite usefulness were being frittered away. He became master of a wealth of classic and neo-classic poetry and prose; of the pearls and sediment of Horace and Béranger; with jewels from many an Italian lyrist; of scraps of solid gold from the Fathers and later divines.

Of these things are made the "Reliques." It was, in fact, in those Roman years which preceded his ordination at Lucca in 1832, that he filled his chest with the treasures which he afterwards scattered with so lavish a hand in the pages of Fraser's. Thus it is easy to account at one and the same time for the rapid succession and early cessation of the "Prout" papers. Some years before becoming a priest, it should be said, Mahony ceased to be a Jesuit.

Now it would be a hopeless task to attempt anything like a description of the "Reliques," as hopeless as to attempt describing the flavor of good tobacco, the scent of a rose, the "bouquet" of "Margaux, 1870." But whoever is competent in Latin, French, and Italian,—I will not say Greek, but there is also Greek!—whoever likes English verse of the kind that sings itself, and is rich in the assonances, alliterations, and infallible precision of rhythm so characteristic of all Irish versification of the nineteenth century, whoever can appreciate English prose of a singularly elegant character, exhibiting a marvelous delicacy of balance in the construction of sentences, will find infinite enjoyment in Father Prout. Of such a one it may be said, as I once ventured to inscribe in a copy of the "Reliques" presented to a young lady who was so qualified: Felix quæ potuit Prouti diligere versus.

Let us at once concede all the faults that may be proved: a careless ease in his handling of Latin and a deliberate sacrifice of "classical elegance" to "rollicking gaiety and go," together with utter impatience of the polishing file and an inordinate fondness for rhyme and "jingle"; an utter defiance of the rhyming laws in his English verses and a lordly disdain of meticulosity in the choice of words save in the matter of their sounds; a profligate waste of talents upon common material and occasional descents into ordinary buffoonery and something not far removed from what in these days might be called scurrility; yet there remains a feast of incomparably varied richness, to which one can return again and again and never exhaust. "Caviar to the general" it undoubtedly may be, but it is the very best caviar made of Volga sturgeon as served at the table of the Czar himself!

Mahony wrote in four languages with complete facility; whatever criticisms can be brought against the elegance of his Latin verses fail regarding his Latin prose, as Abbé Rogerson testified to Charles Kent. His French and Italian have been pronounced good by Frenchmen and Italians; "very good for a foreigner" is the faintest praise that they have elicited. No one will claim for his English verse that it is "great" poetry, but one has only to read it aloud and the music and the rhythm in it will stifle the impulse to criticize almost before it is born. For myself, I own to a growing appreciation of his prose. The following quotation from his paper on "Dean Swift's Madness," is an excellent specimen of Father Mahony's prose style:

> There is a something sacred about insanity: the traditions of every country agree in flinging a halo of mysterious distinction around the unhappy mortal stricken with so sad and so lonely a visitation. The poet who most studied from nature and least from books, the immortal Shakespeare, has never made our souls thrill with more intense sympathy than when his personages are brought before us bereft of the guidance of reason. The gray hairs of King Lear are silvered over with additional veneration when he raves; and the wild flower of insanity is the tenderest that decks the pure garland of Ophelia. The story of Orestes has furnished Greek tragedy with its most powerful emotions; and never did the mighty Talma sway with more irresistible dominion the assembled men of France, than when he personated the fury-driven maniac of Euripides revived on the French stage by the muse of Voltaire. . . . But let us look into our own breasts and acknowledge that with all the fastidious pride of fancied superiority, and in the full plenitude of our undimmed reason we cannot face the breathing ruin of a noble intellect undismayed. The broken sounds, the vague intensity of that gaze, those whisperings that seem to commune with the world of spirits, the play of those features, still impressed with the signet of immortality, though illegible to our eye, strike us with that awe which the obelisk of the desert with its insculptured riddles inspires into the Arabian shepherd.

It seems to me that it is in passages like these that one may find the truest measure of the man and of his thoughts; the words seem to move with solemn step in stately procession with grave music to their cadenced close. I counsel lovers of the "Reliques" who know by heart their favorite verses to take the book down again and see if they cannot find a new thrill in some of the prose.

In January, 1841, when he was thirty-seven years old, Mahony wrote "The Redbreast of Acquitania" and he has left us in no doubt at all of the sad personal significance that lies in the closing stanzas of the poem describing the death of the robin in the waters of the Garonne. I cannot quote it all here, but as the quaint marginal summary says, "Old Father Proutte sadly moralizeth anent ye birde—Ye Streams of Life—A younge man of fayre promise—Hys earlie flight across ye streame," and then follow these verses:

A newe object calleth his eye from ye maine chaunce

But while thus he flew
Lo! a vision new Caught his wayward view
With a semblance fair,
And that new-found wooer
Could alas! allure
From his pathway sure
The bright child of air.

Instabilitie of purpose a fatall evyll in lyfe

For he turned aside,
And adown the tide
For a brief hour plied
His yet unspent force.
And to gain that goal
Gave the powers of soul
Which, unwasted, whole
Had achieved his course.

This is ye morall of Father Proutte's humble ballade

A bright Spirit, young
Unwept, unsung,
Sank thus among
The drifts of the stream;
Not a record left,—
Of renown bereft,
By thy cruel theft
O Delusive Dream!

THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

REVIEWS

England and the Catholic Church Under Elizabeth. By ARNOLD OSKAR MEYER. St. Louis: B. Herder. $3.60.

Father J. R. McKee of the London Oratory has here given us a good translation of a valuable work written by a professor of the University of Rostock. In his preface is expressed what will doubtless be the verdict of every judicious reader: "That Dr. Meyer's work should contain views which a Catholic historian would reject, and should pass over considerations which he would emphasize, goes without saying, but no one who reads it can fail to be struck with the author's endeavor to be always fair and impartial." Dr. Meyer gives accurate information from the best sources, studied at first hand, and interpreted correctly. With German thoroughness he has sifted the evidence found in the Vatican archives, in those of Venice, in the British Museum, the Bodleian, etc., and in the records of the Society of Jesus. On some points the Lutheran professor has had the aid of an English Jesuit, Father J. H. Pollen, who according to Dr. Meyer, is hardly surpassed as a specialist in Elizabethan Catholic history.

The Rostock historian's views of the great religious and political struggle under Elizabeth do not solve all the difficulties of the subject, but they shed considerable light everywhere. The many pages where Philip II of Spain and his policy are described do not fully unravel the very tangled skein of his rather tortuous policy but they give a fair insight into the complexities of that puzzling individuality in which piety blended with an iron harshness of temper, and in which grandeur of conception and ideals was too often marred by imprudent and unpractical policies. Dr. Meyer feelingly denounces the barbarities of the torturer Topcliffe. "No blot," he says, "is more foul on the history of Elizabeth's later years than the name of Topcliffe." And he concludes his indictment with these words: "Had he not been sure of the Queen's approval, the wretch could not have plied his trade." Of Blessed Edmund Campion he draws a sympathetic portrait, saying he "realizes our ideal of what a missionary and a martyr should be." As a pendant to Campion's picture, the historian places that of Father Robert Persons of whom he writes: "The conception of Persons as a political intriguer, . . . does not give a true idea either of the depth and earnestness, or of the brilliant gifts of this richly endowed man." But he passes a rather severe judgment on Father Persons and Cardinal Allen for their advocating a Spanish succession, although he admits that Persons had no idea that in doing so and in planning an invasion he was acting unpatriotically. Dr. Meyer has brought a very important document to light by publishing a letter of the Cardinal of Como to the Nuncio Sega at Madrid. It will be the duty of Catholic theologians and apologists to solve the difficulties which it presents. Dr. Meyer has tried everywhere to be objective, and just, and has written a work of great interest, and of permanent historical value. J. C. R.

Shakespeare's Theater. By ASHLEY H. THORNDIKE, PH.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.50.

A Book for Shakespeare Plays and Pageants. By O. L. HATCHER, PH.D. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.00.

Neither of these volumes is intended primarily for the general reader, unless, happily, the historical sense of that worthy individual has been notably stimulated by the Tercentenary celebration. Each work is a specialized monograph, clearing a way of approach for a better understanding of Shakespeare's times and Shakespeare's theater; they are of value, consequently, chiefly as works of reference and sources of authoritative information. Dr. Thorndike presents a comprehensive and scholarly survey of the beginnings of the modern English stage, dating his history from the year 1576 when James Burbage leased ground to the north of London for the first permanent playhouse in that city. The author then traces in detail the evolution of the Shakespearean theater, and as the drama of Elizabethan England was the transition from the medieval to the modern stage, the narration reflects much of the popular life of the times as well as the literary and historical environments of the century in England. There are chapters on Shakespeare's London, the playhouses, the material stage, the court theaters of Elizabeth, of James I, and of Charles I; interesting lights on governmental regulation of drama, histories of the leading companies, actors and producers, together with an intimate sketch of that clamorous rabble, the Elizabethan audience: all being profitable reading and absolutely necessary for students of English drama. The character of the subject-matter demands a rather formal and scientific presentment; chapters, therefore, dealing with the human elements, such as those on "The Dramatists," "Actors and Acting," "The Audience," give most scope for pleasing writing. Sources and documents are copiously indicated both in the footnotes and in the two appendices. The bibliographies are extensive and will be of great directive value to research students desiring more detailed information on any subject treated in the respective chapters. These bibliographies are an acknowledgment of Dr. Thorndike's indebtedness to the remarkable achievements of German scholars in the matter of historical criticism of Shakespeare and his age.

Dr. Thatcher in his book treats the same subject and covers much the same ground as Dr. Thorndike, but from a slightly different viewpoint. His purpose is not only to unearth facts about Elizabethan drama, but to aid, in a practical way, reproduction by modern plays and pageants. He presents to his readers a vivid pen-picture of the man Shakespeare and his contemporaries, set against the ornate background of his age. The treatment falls into two parts. Part I is a treasury of Elizabethan and Shakespearean detail describing the life and customs of the period, its sports, buildings, court festivities, its stage and drama, the dances, songs, music and even the food and drink that satisfied Elizabethan appetites. As is evident, the author's field is much wider than Dr. Thorndike's, hence the treatment of similar topics is necessarily more summary. The text is illustrated by some 200 portraits and pictures, mostly from contemporaneous sources; there is even musical notation for the songs and dances. Part II proposes plays and subjects for Shakespearean celebrations, describes settings, simple Elizabethan structures, costumes, gives directions for dances, games and other forms of Elizabethan amusement. It is, in a word, an instructive, literary "prompt-book," half-historical, half-practical, edited to encourage accurate presentation of Shakespearean dramas and true pageantry. There are several appendices, a bibliography, a glossary, and an alphabetical index; all of these enhance the usefulness of the book. The author has succeeded in uniting erudition with practicality.

E. A. W.

The End of a Chapter. By SHANE LESLIE, M.A. Cambridge. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

As the note of pessimism that is sounded in the preface of this charming collection of anecdotes, epigrams, and reminiscences does not recur in the rest of the book, we may attribute to the fact that the author was at the time "invalided in hospital" his somber conviction that he had "witnessed the suicide of the civilization called Christian." Non-Catholics may, perhaps, be pardoned for thinking that the preservation of Christianity and culture altogether depends on the success or failure of this or that belligerent, for Protestant Christianity is necessarily national. But a Catholic like Mr. Leslie who believes that the Church is indefectible, and who knows her history, must be well aware that Christianity has already survived worse cataclysms than the present one. This war has wrought nothing like the moral upheaval that attended the French Revolution, for instance, or the Revolt of Luther. While the Church endures, Christian civilization is safe.

Being an enthusiastic Eton and Cambridge graduate, the author has a wealth of pleasant recollections of both places. "The Headmaster of Eton," he writes, "has more to do with the soul of England than the Primate of Canterbury. . . . The cry of Floreat Etona! is the Ave Maria of the devotion of all who have been there." As "Eton contemns other schools just as England despises the rest of the world," a football challenge from Beaumont "the Jesuit Eton," was received with a scornful "What is Beaumont?" The noble answer promptly came: "Beaumont is what Eton was—a school for Catholic gentlemen." Mr. Leslie's chapter on "The Religion of England" is full of clever Chestertonian epigrams: "Anglicanism spells an ideal of temporal followed by eternal comfort. It is the historical attempt to combine the advantages of the Catholic and the Reformed faith. It implies tradition without mystery, bishops without authority, an open Bible and a closed Hell." When the Anglican Bishop of Gibraltar, "whose see was Southern Europe," was having an audience with the Pope, his Holiness remarked, says Mr. Leslie, "I believe I am in your Lordship's diocese." The benediction the same merry Pontiff gave Anglican bishops who asked one of him, is said to have been "the formal blessing reserved to incense before burning."

W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

With Prospero, Miranda, Ariel, and Caliban as central figures, Percy MacKaye has written and prepared as a Shakespeare Tercentenary celebration an elaborate masque called "Caliban by the Yellow Sands" (Doubleday, Page, $0.50). Ten scenes from the tragedies and comedies are introduced and the interludes give glimpses of the dramatic art in antiquity, in medieval times and in Elizabethan England. The vast scale on which the masque is to be presented at the City College Stadium, New York, beginning May 23, is described in detail, so that other communities purposing a similar entertainment should find the book just what is wanted. The stage pictures the author has devised ought to be very striking, and his musical verses give adequate expression to the various characters' emotions.

"The shocking immorality that prevails in Latin American countries is largely due to the exorbitant marriage fees the clergy demand. Being quite unable to pay the unreasonable sums required, the poverty-stricken people dispense with the marriage rite altogether." That is the calumny that often falls from the lips or the pen of the Protestant proselytist who is ready to neglect his countless backsliding brethren in the United States provided he can collect the money that will enable him to flash the "gospel light" into the darkened minds of Mexican and South American "Romanists." The current Catholic Mind is well filled with authoritative refutations of Latin America's calumniators. Father John Navarette, a Mexican priest of wide experience, contributes a paper on "Marriage in Mexico"; Mr. Edward Eyre, an English Catholic who has lived many years in South America, critically examines Lord Bryce's much vaunted "Observations and Impressions" of that continent; there is a short paper on the alleged "Failure of the Mexican Church" and the number concludes with Dr. Walsh's convincing article on "The Re-Re-Discovery of the 'Dawn of Man.'"

It is hard to know just what to make of John Oxenham's new story, "My Lady of the Moor" (Longman's, $1.35). "Beatrice Chase," the "Lady" in question, is the author of a book on Dartmoor, favorably reviewed in our issue of October 9, 1915, but she also seems to be identified with a well-known English Catholic writer who has the high privilege of being the "Lady-Guardian of the Blessed Sacrament" in a little chapel she takes care of on Dartmoor. This novel, which the publishers state has been "written with her full consent and approval" is largely concerned with the life-story of "Beatrice Chase's" two lovers, one a would-be murderer who has served a term in prison, and the other a well-born profligate, whom she reluctantly dismissed because he proved to be only a "Lancelot," though she thought him a "Galahad." "How much of this book is biography and how much fiction?" perplexed readers will ask. Then if they are Catholics they will exclaim: "What a lamentable want of prudence and good taste, to take no higher ground, the author betrays! That lonely little chapel seems to need a new 'Lady-Guardian.'" There are many fine descriptive passages in the book.

Thugh numerous books of sermons are based on the Sunday Gospels, there is a dearth of good homilies on texts taken from the Sunday Epistles. To fill this want the Rev. Edmund Carroll prepared a good volume of "Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles" (Peter Reilly, Philadelphia) which has been edited by the Very Rev. W. M. Cunningham. These well-sketched discourses will be welcomed by busy priests.——The Rev. Ferreol Girardy, C.SS.R. in his volume on "The Mother of My Lord" (Herder, $0.75) gives simple meditative commentaries on the Hail Mary which aim at bringing out Our Lady's chief prerogatives and at holding up her life and virtues for her clients' imitation. The author supplements his own work by selections from Bossuet's sermons, from Bronchain's meditations and from ecclesiastical history. The book ends with some considerations on the Divinity of Christ and will afford suitable spiritual reading for the month of May.——"The Passion and Death of Jesus," (Benziger, $0.75) by Philip Coghlan, O.P., is a continuous narrative, told in clear and simple language, of the tragedy of Calvary. The Evangelists are followed closely and the reflections are not too long.

Mr. Louis Heft, in "Holders of Railroad Bonds and Notes: Their Rights and Remedies" (Dutton, $2.00), has afforded the general public an intimate knowledge of bonds and notes, and an understanding of the nature of securities. Prospective investors in railroad bonds and notes will find here a careful and accurate analysis of their rights, and the relation that exists between them and other creditors of the road. The simplicity of the author's language and the minute table of contents for each chapter make the book easy to read.—— In view of the various investigations going on at the present time regarding the administration of public monies, "Bankrupting a Great City" (Published by the Author, Tribune Building, New York, Cloth, $0.75), by Henry H. Klein, will be found of value to those interested in public utilities and their management. The author examines the disbursement of the city's wealth, and gives startling illustrations of how waste and misuse lead to financial disaster. He contends that our cities must recover the bulk of the profits made on public franchises by private individuals, otherwise taxes will become uncollectable. The book sheds light on economic conditions in New York City, and offers arguments for municipal ownership.

As Mr. J. E. de Hirsch-Davies is thoroughly acquainted with the Welsh vernacular records, he presents in "Catholicism in Medieval Wales," (Washbourne, 3s. 6d.) the very words of bards, chroniclers and ecclesiastical writers as proofs that the religion of Christian Wales was the religion of Rome. So he easily refutes Mr. Willis Bund's assertion that Welsh Christianity resembled modern non-Conformity. The author shows that in the early Church of Wales, Mass was celebrated, the Sacraments administered, the Blessed Virgin honored and the Pope acknowledged.——Roscoe Lewis Ashley's text-book of "Medieval History" (Macmillan, $1.10) is hardly a work that the Catholic teacher will find of value. The Protestant theory of the Pope's primacy is adopted, the Church is called a medieval religious empire, Innocent III is represented as desiring universal temporal dominion, "Bloody Mary" is prominent in these pages, and Gairdner could have given the author considerable information about the suppression of the English monasteries.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Abingdon Press, New York:
The Church in the City. By Frederick de Land Leete. $1.00.

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
A New German Grammar for Beginners. By Paul Valentine Bacon. $1.25.

Gabriel Beauchesne, Paris:
Dictionaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique contenant les Preuves de la Vérité de la Religion et les Réponses aux Objections tirées des Sciences humaines. A. d'Alès. Fascicules I–XII. 5 fr. le fascicule.

The Cosmopolitan Press, New York:
The Rational Memory. By W. H. Groves. Second Edition. $1.35.

Dodd, Mead & Company, New York:
G. K. Chesterton: a Critical Study. By Julius West. $2.00.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Old Judge Priest. By Irvin S. Cobb. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
Under the Country Sky. By Grace S. Richmond. Illustrated by Frances Rogers. $1.25.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Thinking as a Science. By Henry Hazlitt. $1.00; Studies in Seven Arts. By Arthur Symons. $2.50; Stars of Destiny, the Ancient Science of Astrology and How to Make Use of It To-day. By Katherine Taylor Craig. $2.00.

D. C. Heath & Company, New York:
Freshman Rhetoric. By John Rothwell Slater, Ph.D.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Counter-Currents. By Agnes Repplier, Litt.D. $1.25; Canoeing in the Wilderness. By Henry D. Thoreau. Edited by Clifton Johnson. Illustrated by Will Hammell. $1.00; Blackfeet Tales of Glacier National Park. By James Willard Schultz. With Illustrations. $2.00; Those Gillespies. By William John Hopkins. Illustrated by Lester G. Hornby. $1.35; Union Portraits. By Gamaliel Bradford. $1.50; The Life of William McKinley. By Charles S. Olcott. Vols. I and II. $5.00; The Proof of the Pudding. By Meredith Nicholson. With Illustrations. $1.35.

B. W. Huebsch, New York:
How Diplomats Make War. By a British Statesman. Introduction by Albert Jay Nock. $1.50.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
Four Dimensional Vistas. By Claude Bragdon. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Life of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson. By C. C. Martindale, S.J. In Two Volumes. With Illustrations. $5.00; American University Progress and College Reform, Relative to School and Society. By James H. Baker. $1.00; Adelicia of Louvaine, the Rose of Brabant. By M. D. Huger. With a Frontispiece. $1.00.

Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., Boston:
That's Why Stories. By Ruth O. Dyer. Frontispiece by John Goss. Decorations by Lester M. Chace. $1.00.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
The Centennial History of the American Bible Society. By Henry Otis Dwight. Two Volumes. Illustrated. $2.00; Commencement Days, a Book for Graduates. By Washington Gladden. $1.25; The Ideal Catholic Readers. Third Reader. By a Sister of St. Joseph. $0.40.

John Joseph McVey, Philadelphia:
The Mystery of the Holy Trinity in Oldest Judaism. By Frank McGloin, LL.D. $1.00.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Conscript Mother. By Robert Herrick. $0.50; The Stories of H. C. Bunner. First and Second Series. $1.25 each.

EDUCATION

The Kindergarten

GRADUALLY and persistently the kindergarten has achieved its present place in the modern field of education. The validity of its principles and the efficiency of its methods are now recognized by most educational leaders. Indeed, if the ideals and aims of the kindergarten were thoroughly understood, I believe that all opposition to its further extension would surely cease. Froebel, who has given the world so much knowledge of child-nature, believed that education was "the effort to lead and guide man to a clear knowledge of himself, to peace with nature, and to unity with God." At the foundation of Froebel's philosophy of life is his concept of man as a member of a whole, bearing within himself the full potentiality of that whole, but able to make it actual, only in and through his cooperation with the whole body. Man, he held, is "a conscious, realized, thinking activity"; an immortal being, made to the image of God, and possessed of intellect and free will.

The First Steps

This individual member, thus perfect in his kind, can achieve his destiny only by the exercise of his intellect and free will, working in accordance with the plan revealed by God to the human race. The complete union of intellect and will with this ideal plan, brings the individual to the fulfilment of the end marked out for him, his own perfection, and as far as in him lies, the perfection of the whole of which he is but a part.

The kindergarten, then, undertakes primarily to develop, the child's unfolding powers of thinking and willing. The method by which it proceeds has been termed the Genetic Development Method. The point of departure is the act of the child. "From the deed," teaches Froebel, "true education must proceed; from the deed it must germinate; out of the deed it must grow." The child's conscious deed, his spontaneous reaction against his environment, gives an initial view into his nature, and the kindergartner must now stimulate the child to reflect upon his act. If the act is positive and constructive, she encourages him to repeat it; if it is "negative," she will strive to suggest its positive counterpart, i. e., the positive act which he might have performed.

Presenting Ideals

The presentation of high and noble ideals is intimately connected with Froebel's methods. To put the child in possession of the best traditions of the race, he considers the task of education. Race ideals have come to us, as adults, largely through literature; therefore in the kindergarten, Froebel would present daily, simple, childlike stories, embodying ideals of truth, sincerity and bravery. The human race has gone through many experiences of a "negative," or worthless nature, has followed and is still following many a "wandering fire." The kindergarten, would embody only those ideals that are of positive constructive value, and for this purpose Froebel has planned a series of typical experiences, called "Mother-play," to be presented through play and symbol. By play, the prerogative and necessity of childhood, he would lead the child to discern worthy ideals and imitate worthy deeds, that through this contact and imitation, he may grow into a practical realization of truths of universal application and value.

"Mother-play"

The Mother-play sequence, therefore, includes games illustrating ideals of family life, of the trade world, of the State and of religion. Kindergarten songs and plays are selected and organized with regard to church festivals, national holidays, and the phases of nature revealed in the change of the seasons. The ideals of religion are approached in a series of plays, "the Light Songs," dealing with that majestic wonder of nature. The commentaries on these songs, for the kindergartner, deal with the awakening of the child's spiritual nature, while the songs used by the children are of the vast heavens and the heavenly bodies.

The hand, Froebel tells us, is a gift of God, an instrument of the soul, to be used for creative activity. God is act, the Creator; man in some measure rises to a further likeness to God, by becoming in a limited sense, a creator. Now as is well known, the child first shows his desire to transform matter by destructive impulses. The ascent from destructiveness to creative activity begins when the child uses matter to accomplish a conscious ideal, which is to issue in some definite and worthy result. To foster this creative power Froebel has organized certain materials known as "Gifts" and "Occupations." The Gifts are planned to illustrate as far as possible, the geometric magnitudes, solid, surface, line, and point. Blocks, square, circular, and triangular, counters, sticks, and rings, lend themselves, first to the teaching of geometric forms, next to exercises in rhythmic and symmetrical arrangement, and finally, to architectural work of an elementary nature, and "pictures" of familiar objects. The Occupations are concerned with more plastic forms of material, and include pricking, sewing, weaving, folding, cutting, and pasting, and cardboard modeling; while an effort is made to illustrate the Gift Work and to encourage free artistic effect.

Misconceptions

Kindergarten songs, games, and work are not planned simply to amuse the children, to keep them occupied and out of mischief. This is a very common objection based upon an absolute misconception of Froebel's work. All are the result of careful thought. They are systematically and logically arranged to lead the child to true self-expression by making use of the child's spontaneous activities.

Kindergarten means the "children's garden." The true kindergartner has the nurturing attitude toward each individual child committed to her care. They are as seeds which may afterwards bloom as flowers in God's presence:

> . . . Good ye are, and bad, and like to coins
> Some true, some light, but every one of you
> Stamped with the image of the king.

In a garden, not turmoil and license, but law and order must reign. And the law upon which Froebel lays greatest insistence is the new law of love and redemption; "This do and ye shall live."

Ilse Bosch.

SOCIOLOGY

Paganizing Charity

MANY years have passed since God was thrust triumphantly out of the schools, and the door locked against Him. The expulsion was effected without much of a struggle; the revolt against God in philosophy, literature, science, and history, had done its work well. With the wise and the learned, religion was a matter of opinion; with the great ones of the earth, morals had become an affair of convention. Rousseau ruled the political thought of the country; wherefore politics, once a noble branch of human knowledge and research, became in practice a name of malign omen, signifying selfish plans and sordid schemes in which neither God nor His law nor common honesty had part. Ours, we said, is a non-sectarian government, or something of that nature; and we concluded that the smaller the place of religion in public life, the better for the ultimate peace of the commonwealth. With these principles premised, it became plain that there was no room for God in the schools of the community. We stamped "In God We Trust" on some of our coins, and denied the declaration in our educational system. It was a conventional statement; no affirmation of a fact, or even of a principle.

GOD IN THE SCHOOL

Here and there, in some little school maintained by "Papists," or "Romanists," a low, ignorant people for the most part, God was allowed some jurisdiction in the process of education. But persons of this tolerated class were not to be considered in the public or social life of the country. They were hewers of wood and drawers of water; they swept the streets, and digged the sewers, and graded the railways; in the estimation of certain lovers of American institutions, they were the helots existing in the bosom of a higher civilization and no more. But history must reverse the judgment. With a magnificent spirit of sacrifice which only heroes know, they founded the American parochial school, the noblest monument ever erected in any land, in defense of the principle that God must have the first place in the mind and heart of the child. Themselves, for the most part, sons of men despised for their ignorance, after the means of education had been wrested from them by social and governmental persecution, in the sweat of their brow they saved and labored that their sons and daughters might enjoy advantages they had never known; and that, above all, with secular knowledge, their children might imbibe the most excellent knowledge and love of God.

Meanwhile, city outvied city in erecting temples of primary and secondary education in which no knee might be bent, nor head bowed with reverence, at the sacred name of Jesus Christ. Education, or whatsoever passing fad laid claim to the name, became an American god. We cried out that our work was good, that great was our new god, enshrined in the little red schoolhouse.

THE NEW PHILANTHROPY

Generations were gathered to their forefathers. God was out of the schools, hopelessly out, with no chance of a return, for by this time it was admitted by the many that education pertained primarily and immediately, if not exclusively, to a State which recognized no God. But there was still some place for Him in the hospitals, orphanages, and other refuges of the broken and desolate. Catholics, at least, were not prepared to agree that either charity or education was the exclusive function of the State. They thought that they might, without leave and sanction of a salaried official, give a cup of cold water in the name of Christ, and not lack a reward. With the schools, therefore, the Catholic institutions for the care of dependents, increased year by year.

They were, it now appears, mistaken. Events have moved swiftly in the last decade. To the omnipotent State the philosophy of revolt has extended the right of life and death over the private institute of charity. The cup of cold water may indeed be given, but only after investigation, and only in the name of the State. For modern sociology has arisen to teach that the whole system of charity, individual and collective, founded on the precepts and example of Jesus Christ, and elaborated through the centuries by the Catholic Church, is essentially wrong. And why? The reason is at hand. Every human being is a ward of the State. The physical and mental welfare of the individual is the exclusive concern of the State. Therefore, if in need, he must be succored by the State, nor may any aid be given, without the consent of a strictly-supervising State.

Further, the private charity, especially as fostered and governed by the Catholic Church, is anti-social, since it will not recognize the complete supremacy of the State. It resolutely opposes race-suicide, divorce, lawless marriages, sterilization, and such like evils, suggested by modern sociology to the consideration of man's supreme guardian, the State. In other words, the Catholic Church insists on the inclusion of God and His law in the consideration of every phase of life. Modern sociology regards this insistence as a relic of superstition, akin to the tabu of Tahiti.

THE OMNIPOTENT STATE

It is true that certain private charities may, in the opinion of modern sociologists, be permitted a temporary existence, provided that they engage in work which, for the present, the State cannot conveniently assume, and provided further, that they act purely as agents of the State. This, however, argues no right of existence for the private institution, but merely the toleration of the civil authority. Following Aristotle, Catholic philosophy holds that the State is bound to assist the citizen in those necessary activities which the individual cannot conveniently secure for himself; today, however, the principle has been reversed. Modern sociology proposes to suppress legitimate individuality, by merging, as far as human nature will allow, all activities in the State. "It is no part of its (the State's) function," wrote an English publicist, Mr. W. S. Lilly, some years ago, "to do for them (the citizens) what they can do for themselves better, or even as well."

> The false paternal theory of the State's functions makes it not merely a high, but the only factor of human development, as the creator and arbiter of the rights of its subjects. . . . This school (Rousseau's) insists that man belongs wholly to the State. . . . Statolatry is a barbarous word which I write with reluctance. It expresses, however, an indubitable fact. The falsely democratic State, exalting itself above all that is called God or is worshiped, is exhibited as an earthly Providence, and the only real one; the sole object entitled to man's reverence and awe. . . . It is merely a revival of ancient Cæsarism. . . . It is a negation of that fundamental truth that human authority is limited and fiduciary, and subject to the eternal, imprescriptible, and indefeasible laws of ethics. ("First Principles in Politics," Chapter iv, passim.)

In the view of modern sociology, these reflections merely prove the "reactionary" character of Mr. Lilly's principles. But the attempt to establish "statolatry" in American life is "an indubitable fact." It is also an indubitable fact, that we Catholics must arouse ourselves to the importance of employing every legitimate means, to overthrow this return of paganism, if we wish to remain secure in the exercise of our right to conduct institutions of education, charity, and reform.

"CHILDREN OF THE STATE"

"The time will come," said Rabbi Stephen Wise at the Free Synagogue on April 30, "when the State will suffer no subsidized institution, and perhaps least of all, no sectarian institution, to stand between it and its children." In this significant statement, Rabbi Wise who, it may be believed, does not speak for the great majority of his co-religionists, openly declares the modern sociological tenet that children are the immediate wards or property of the State:

> The moment the State begins to support child-caring institutions, that moment it must become not only a partner in the enterprise, but the dominant partner, not the silent or absent partner as has largely been true of it during the last decade, but a partner dominating by virtue of its wisdom and its devotion to the well-being of the child.

Here we have the ultimate aim of the modern philanthropy, aggressive, plausible, and thoroughly pagan. So far as the recent New York inquiry is concerned, even those in the least acquainted with the situation, Rabbi Wise among them, must know that the Catholic charitable institutions were never opposed to the most thorough investigation on the part of city and State officers, and that they were never, in any ascertainable meaning of the word, "subsidized." They rendered certain services to the city, for which an inadequate recompense was duly paid and gratefully received. All resulting financial deficits were made good by the charity of the Catholic citizens of New York.

A PLAN OF PREPAREDNESS

It will hardly be denied that the plan proposed by the modern sociologist, contemplates the withdrawal from the private institution of the legal right to exist. While it is not probable that this plan will be quickly realized, we must not be lulled into a false security. Our enemies are many; their methods, as recent events in New York have proved, are dark, devious and unscrupulous. Possibly the following suggestions may pave the way for a more effective program of "preparedness":

(1) Let no calumny against our Catholic institutions remain unanswered. Unless dealt with summarily, the modern sociologist will set no bounds to his policy of lying. (2) Every legitimate means must be used to prevent the appointment or election of pagan sociologists to public offices exercising supervision over institutions of charity and reform. This is no question of petty politics. It is a question of whether paganism which regards man as a ward of the Cæsarized State, or Christianity which holds that he is made to God's image, shall prevail in this country. (3) Catholics must show a deeper practical interest in their local institutions, by visiting them and learning of their splendid work. The religious men and women who conduct these homes of mercy, have given up all to follow Christ, but they are still human. Intelligent interest on the part of Catholics will stimulate them to even greater efforts. (4) Few if any Catholic institutions are endowed, even in part. Not one has at its disposal the millions lavished upon secular institutions. For themselves, the religious ask not one penny. But sympathy and indolent interest will not buy food for the little ones who have asked for bread, nor shoes for the bare-footed boy, nor a gingham dress for little orphan Annie. She has come to their house to stay, and they must provide for her. Or rather, you must. The Catholic flock is not wise in the wisdom of this world, but it has a heart for giving, when its attention is properly directed. Are you going to do your share, contributing in full measure, pressed-down and overflowing, to the poor and afflicted who represent Jesus Christ Himself; generously, out of your poverty, as did your forefathers in this country? "Suffer the little ones to come unto me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." That is the issue at stake.

THE VALUE OF SYMPATHY

There can be no doubt as to the answer. We have our traitors and our weak-kneed brethren, who with a penny's worth of help or none at all, contribute volumes of criticism. Happily, these are few, and some of them are now known. But, measured in legal tender, how much is your undoubted sympathy for the calumniated Catholic institution worth? The destiny of immortal souls, for whom Christ died, may hang on your answer.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The clergy of the Hartford diocese recently celebrated the sixth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Nilan. During the brief period of his episcopacy the Catholics of the diocese of Hartford have increased from about 400,000 to over 500,000, and now number some forty per cent of the inhabitants of the State of Connecticut. A little less than three-quarters of a century ago, according to the Catholic Transcript, the Bishop of Philadelphia wrote to the Irish College at Rome, regretting the establishment of the Hartford diocese: "The unfortunate haste with which Little Rock and Hartford were made sees in a former Council should make us pause when a new see is to be erected." Less than thirty years later it was found necessary to divide the latter diocese, taking from it one of the two States which it originally embraced. Today but two dioceses and five archdioceses of the country exceed it in population. When in 1844 Bishop Tyler was made the first incumbent of the see, which then included Rhode Island and Connecticut, the total number of Catholics in both States was 9,937. Today, under its seventh bishop, the Catholic population of the latter State alone is 503,498.

So long as secular or operatic music is offered to our people in the Masses selected to be sung for them, says the Catholic Choirmaster, there will always be danger that the sacred functions may be regarded as an accompaniment to the music. Remarks like the following need not then surprise us:

> Wasn't Miss Q. in good voice today, and didn't her duet with Mr. Doe in the "Credo" remind you of "Cavalleria" a little?
>
> How thrillingly Mr. X. sang the tenor solo at the Offertory; I couldn't help but think of De Reszke, and the way he used to sing that aria in "Lohengrin."
>
> I like the Dona nobis pacem of that Mass, it is so lively and bright, and seems so appropriate for the "closing number"!

The official bulletin of the Society of St. Gregory sees hopeful signs for the development of liturgical music in the patronage given it by many of the higher dignitaries of the Church, "who neglect no opportunity to forward the cause." It quotes with great satisfaction the words recently spoken by one of our bishops: "One thing I miss greatly, and that is Gregorian Chant. When I go to administer Confirmation or preside at other functions I rarely hear Gregorian Chant. I am a lover of the Chant and nothing would please me more than to hear those wonderful melodies. I prefer the Chant to the modern compositions, for it is so prayerful."

As doubtless the most suitable place for such a venture, the stockyards district in Chicago has been chosen for the site of a birth control clinic to be established in that city. Mrs. Margaret Sanger, the propagandist of this unclean paganism of our day, expresses herself as delighted both with the reception accorded her and the interest manifested by people of all classes. She finds herself "fairly swamped" with letters from women eager to receive practical information on this subject. No less significant was the demonstration given in New York's largest hall to the anarchist agitator, Emma Goldman, on her release from prison, where she had been incarcerated on account of her birth-control propaganda. In open defiance of the authorities of the city, as well as of public decency, Mrs. Rose Pastor Stokes, wife of the Socialist millionaire, J. G. Phelps Stokes, distributed on that occasion sheets containing forbidden information. Men and women, boys and girls, struggled to obtain them. Chairs were overturned and property damaged in the scramble. "Capitalist society has not succeeded in making me bitter, but it has succeeded in making me unafraid," she said, "therefore, be the penalty what it may, I here frankly offer to give out these slips."

No attempt was made by "the gentlemen of the club," as she politely termed the police, to interfere with her. Thus all reticence is cast aside and the law of God is publicly flouted. Noted journals even fling their defiance to heaven and proclaim the rule of license and voluptuousness, free from obligations. Passion has become a god once again; the result will be as ever, decadence, if not entire ruin.

Shakespeare Tercentenary Celebrations have been a feature of this year in many of our Catholic colleges and academies. Historic presentations of the plays after the Elizabethan style have likewise been attempted. A varied program of this nature was prepared by the College of St. Teresa, Winona, Minn. The celebrations began April 29 with a reproduction on the college campus of the peasant and court revels of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and with pastimes of an earlier date. On the morning of May 1, after an academic procession, lyrics from the poet's dramas were sung after the manner of his day. The program of Shakespearean music was followed in the evening by a presentation of "As You Like It," after the historic fashion of the Elizabethan stage. The following day Doctor James J. Walsh delivered a Shakespearean Lecture. Although this closed the commemoration exercises, yet five more Shakespeare events are to follow before the scholastic year closes: the acting of "The Merchant of Venice" and the monologue recitals of "Hamlet," "King Lear," "Macbeth" and "Midsummer Night's Dream." A prize commemorative address, written by one of the students, was likewise part of the Shakespeare celebration.

For the first time in the history of the American nation violence and assassination were openly justified upon the floor of the House of Congress. The speaker was the Socialist Representative, Meyer London, and the occasion was the discussion of the Porto Rican Bill. That the denial of the right of franchise to "three-fourths of those people" would lead to organized insurrection, was his first contention. He then proceeded to lay down the following principles as stenographically reported:

> Three-fourths of the working people who will be disfranchised will have the right to use the revolver and will have a right to kill Governors. Do you deny to a man the right to his views through civilized methods? He has the right to use every weapon at his command and every protection. The man whose vote you take away will have the right to put the knife of an assassin into the heart of any man who attempts to govern him against his will.

A doctrine similar to this had been as clearly proclaimed in writing by his Socialist predecessor in Congress, but had not been made within the House itself. It is a doctrine common among Socialist agitators even of the more conservative kind. Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh. Mr. London, however, found to his cost that the American people are not yet socialistically educated to admit the right of cold-blooded assassination. He was interrupted by Representative Austin who demanded that his words be taken down. "They are a disgrace to the American Congress!" he shouted. White and shaking, Mr. London realized he had overshot his mark, and sought to offer an explanation; but the members of the House had distinctly heard what had been said, and Representative Mann demanded a withdrawal of the offensive remarks. "I ask to withdraw them," Mr. London replied, "and I am heartily sorry if I offended the House." The impression created will, however, remain, and the incident should be a lesson to American voters. Mr. London had merely repeated what many other leaders of American Socialism have just as plainly said before him and deliberately expressed in cold print.

The fear of disease communicated by dust from books is one of the latest inconveniences of our library-building age. To investigate this subject Yale University instituted a chemical analysis of book-dust and found that its constituents are mineral matter, paper fiber, wood fiber and molds. No dangerous bacteria were discovered, nor is their presence to be feared unless the books have been used by persons having infectious diseases. The Christian Herald moralizes on this subject and suggests that such germs are rather to be found in the interior of the books. They may often be far more numerous and fatal in the latest "best sellers" than in the ancient moldy tomes that have gathered dust for centuries upon the shelves of neglected libraries:

> There is a good deal of dust, and dangerous dust, too, on the inside of many books. The bacteria of moral smallpox, yellow fever, cholera, and bubonic plague are there; some of them easily seen, others concealed in hint and insinuation, all so fascinating and damaging to character, and all so easily and widely disseminated. A number of modern writers have dealt too boldly with the diseased, the lawless side of human life.

If we would escape these dust germs of moral infection and spiritual death we must turn to the literature which deals with those things to which the Apostle St. Paul calls our attention as the fit subjects of study and thought: "Brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever modest, whatsoever just, whatsoever holy, whatsoever lovely, whatsoever of good fame, if there be any virtue, if any praise of discipline, think on these things." Surely an ample field of reading and speculation!

Bigotry has reached its climax in Florida. On Easter Monday three Catholic Sisters were marched as prisoners through the streets of St. Augustine. Their crime was that they had taught colored children to read and write and to worship God. There is a law in the enlightened State of Florida forbidding white people to teach the colored children in schools erected for them. The law, though held to be unconstitutional, was placed upon the statute books of Florida. It was not, however, applied until in 1916 the "Guardians of Liberty" came into power. They have now given the entire country an illustration of the liberty and enlightenment they have pledged themselves to secure for our land. The conditions existing today in the State of Florida are thus described by the New Orleans Morning Star:

> From one end of the State to the other paid vilifiers of everything Catholic are abroad preaching a gospel of hate. Discarded preachers, itinerant Socialist operators, scoundrels, caring nothing for God or man, are now paid salaries by the bigots of Florida to shower pornographic filth against the small Catholic population of the State. And, be it said, to the eternal disgrace of the men in high office, that they who were elected to represent a whole people and whose oath of office binds them to measure out justice to all citizens of the State, regardless of class or creed, are now self-seeking bigots, tools in the hands of the State's worst enemies—the vilifiers, misrepresenters, hate-preachers. Florida invites settlers. But it is no place for men who love fair play and justice, who stand squarely on American principles of liberty, so long as the State is controlled by so-called men who hate justice and trample on the rights of fellow-men. Here and there some individual or some journal may utter a word of condemnation, but the manhood of the State seems to be paralyzed by fear of the banded, blind bigots. Hence the silence, in the face of the injustice and violation of American principles.

Six poor ignorant negroes were urged to petition the Government to enforce the law against the Sisters teaching in their negro parochial school. It was stated by them that some Protestant children were likewise being taught the catechism in this school. Whether true or not, the statement is entirely irrelevant. The law which is violated by the State itself in its "Institute for the Blind," is in no way concerned with the teaching of Protestant children by Catholics. The Sisters were made victims at the instance of religious bigotry. Such bigotry must defeat itself when brought to the public notice.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

WHOLE No. 371
VOL. XV. No. 6

MAY 20, 1916

PRICE, 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 9, p. m.-May 16, a. m. —The German Note. France: Courageous Catholic Senators and Deputies. Germany: Dr. Delbrück's Resignation. Great Britain: The Mystery of Conscription. Ireland: Results of the Uprising. Mexico: Attacks on Religion—International Relations. Rome: Will the Vatican Council be Reopened?.....121-124

TOPICS OF INTEREST
III–The Charities Investigation: The Hearings —A Plea for Novel-Reading—The Boys of Our City: St. Louis—A Venture in Church Music—Irish Priests and Their Flocks.....125-131

COMMUNICATIONS
A Good Old Custom—From "Androcles" to "Marie-Odile"—National Greatness—The First St. Patrick's Church—Consumers' League Garments —Catholics and Public Libraries—Catholics in Prisons — A Correction — Proper Ecclesiastical Titles 131-133

EDITORIALS
Investigators and Persecutors—Peace and the Sword—The New York Post and the Philippine Bill—The Audibly Devout—Working Conditions and Accidents—The American Bible Society Centenary 134-137

LITERATURE
Robert Hugh Benson.

REVIEWS: Leçons de Logique; Leçons de Morale; Leçons de Psychologie et de Theodicée—Histoire de la Philosophie—Counter-Currents—Songs and Satires—London, One November—Verse—The Onion Peelers.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith"—"Essays and Literary Studies" — "Oliver Cromwell" — "The Best Short Stories in 1915"—"Roberta of Roseberry Gardens"—"Viviette"—Heimatgrüsse an unsere Krieger — "Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflege" — Some Little Books of Devotion — "Learning to Earn" — The Irish Republican Poets 137-141

EDUCATION
I–Going to College.....141, 142

SOCIOLOGY
The Way of the Good Shepherd.....142, 143

NOTE AND COMMENT
Catholic Journals in Catholic Schools—"Love Me, Love My Dog"—Stupendous War Debts—Relative Healthfulness of City and Country—Prohibition and Religion—The Catholic Education Convention—Protestant Theologians on Purgatory. 143, 144

CHRONICLE

The War.—On the outskirts of Dixmude there have been violent but unsuccessful artillery duels between the Belgians and Germans. Northeast of Vermelles, the Germans succeeded in capturing 500 yards of the British trenches, some of which were lost the next day. At many points of the line between Loos and Verdun there have been minor engagements, which have not altered the general situation. In the Verdun district, early in the week, the offensive passed from the French to the Germans, who, after bombarding with great violence the French positions south of Haucourt, on the west side of the Meuse, made a series of seven infantry attacks on the sector between Hill 304 and Hill 287. The only result of their efforts was to extend somewhat their trenches on Hill 304. East of the Meuse, both French and Germans have been on the offensive along the Douaumont-Vaux line, but without notable success for either side. Nothing of importance has been reported from the Italian fronts. In Albania there are signs of renewed activity on the part of the Austrians. Near Pinsk, and in the Pripet region, the Austrians have been on the offensive, and in Galicia they have been attacked by the Russians, but these operations have not been on a great scale.

Bulletin, May 9, p. m.-May 16, a. m.

In Armenia the Russians have made progress. Along the Black Sea coast, they have advanced more than twelve miles, and are now south and southeast of Platana. Further south the Turks report two successes, near Baschkjoel, southeast of Mamahatun, and at Bathli, northeast of Mount Kope; but neither seems to have been of a decisive character, for the Russians claim two subsequent victories in the same region and have now reached a point about thirty-five miles east of Erzingan. Northwest of Musch a minor engagement has ended in favor of the Turks, but southwest of the same city the Russians have driven the Turks back in the direction of Diarbekr. In Persia, the Russians have advanced from Kirind, and have occupied Kasr-i-Shirin, at the headwaters of the Diala River, close to the Turkish frontier. They are now about 100 miles from Bagdad. A Russian army has entered Mesopotamia from the north and has taken Rowanduz, sixty-two miles northeast of Mosul.

The only development in the submarine controversy between Germany and the United States has been the admission by Berlin, in an official note, that a German submarine torpedoed the Sussex. This conclusion was reached partly on the basis of the facts, submitted by Washington, and partly on additional evidence which has come to light. The note declares that although the submarine commander acted in good faith, believing the Sussex to be a war vessel, he did not exercise the particular care which his instructions called for:

The German Note

> In view of these circumstances, the German Government frankly admits that the assurance given to the American Government in accordance with which passenger vessels were not to be attacked without warning has not been adhered to in the present case. As was intimated by the undersigned in the note of the 4th inst., the German Government does not hesitate to draw from this, resultant consequences. It therefore expresses to the American Government its sincere regret regarding the deplorable incident and declares its readiness to pay an adequate indemnity to the injured American citizens. It also disapproved of the conduct of the commander, who has been appropriately punished.

A similar note, deploring the incident, and promising to compensate the families of the Spaniards who were lost in the attack on the Sussex has been sent by the German Government to Madrid.

France.—In a timely and eloquent letter published in La Croix, the fighting Catholic senator, M. de Las Cases, answers a critic who says that the Catholic senators and deputies "are doing nothing" and are as "dumb as milestones." "J. B." in an editorial of the same paper, after paying a well-deserved tribute to the keen logic and orderly presentation of facts offered by the great Catholic senator in refutation of the charge, states that the accusation itself is, especially at the present time, a downright insult. It is made at the very moment when M. de Las Cases himself, and MM. de Lamarzelle and Jénourier are fighting so sturdily in the Senate, and not without success, for freedom of education and the protection of the rights of the family over its children. And while in the Upper Chamber this splendid work is being done, Catholic members in the Lower House are doing their share also. "J. B." cites as a striking example the energetic and courageous conduct of the delegation made up of members of the Right, "Action Libérale" and the Independents who recently protested in a body to the Prime Minister against the anti-clerical campaign waged in certain influential journals. The delegation which called upon M. Briand was headed by M. Piou and was composed of the following Catholic deputies, whose names deserve to be remembered: MM. de Gailhard, Bancel, Groussau, Joseph Denais, V. Rochereau, Admiral Biendimé, Galpin, Ferdinand Bougère, De Baudry, D'Asson, Jules Delahaye, and De Kernier. The protest has had its salutary effect. M. Briand's favorable answer was chronicled in last week's AMERICA.

Courageous Catholic Senators and Deputies

Germany.—The resignation from office of the Minister of the Interior and Vice-Chancellor of the Empire, Dr. Clemens Delbrück, has given rise to considerable comment. At the beginning of the war he found himself confronted with the complicated food problem. His success in dealing with this, though not complete, was such as to merit the highest admiration. Free to issue laws and ordinances he was hampered by the fact that he did not control the executive power which alone could make his regulations universally effective. This complicated the situation still further until, through illness and overwork, Dr. Delbrück has been obliged to retire from an office which, like all others previously occupied by him, he administered with great ability. The Tageblatt says of him:

Dr. Delbrueck's Resignation

> He leaves office overworked and a sick man. The tasks imposed upon him were too much for him. Most of those who criticize would have met the same fate. The only conclusion to be drawn is that there must be a complete separation of all food questions from the Interior Department, already over-burdened in peace times. When this, to which Dr. Delbrück himself in the last days gave the initiative, is accomplished, one ought to be able to judge the parting Minister more justly. He was a Prussian official of splendid capabilities, whom a chain of coincidences placed in one of the most difficult posts in the complicated transition period.

The food problem confronting Germany is not a question of insufficient supply, but of adequate distribution. Such minor disturbances as have arisen because of food difficulties were due to the conviction of the people and of the press that in view of the existing supplies, prices were so unreasonably high that the masses were subjected to unnecessary hardships. It is not certain that anything in the nature of a food dictatorship, such as Maximilian Harden suggests, is contemplated by the Government. Although no immediate appointment is looked for, it is thought that the great Catholic statesman, Count von Hertling, President of the Bavarian Ministry, will be chosen to succeed Dr. Delbrück.

Great Britain.—Despite the fall of Kut and the recent troubles in Ireland, the Coalition Ministry remains in power, and although an apparently suspicious Parliament has ceased to be a mere machine to register the wishes of the Ministers, no present indications point to the dissolution of the Cabinet. The Nation states its belief that while the motives of the "crisis makers" may not be uniformly selfish and unpatriotic, yet "it is manifest that their cooperation is a national peril in war time." Quoting the same journal, the Catholic Times writes that "Mr. Asquith has been evilly handled. He has had enemies at his own board. And chief among them is Mr. Lloyd George." Discussing Mr. Asquith's change of opinion in regard to the question of conscription, the Times outlines a puzzling state of affairs, which has mystified more than one student of current English events:

The Mystery of Conscription

> We shall not know until the war ends, perhaps not even then, the real reason for Mr. Asquith's decision on the question of conscription. Yet some things are clear. We have huge numbers of men under arms, literally millions. We have great forces in France and Flanders, at Salonika and in Egypt, and a host of men at home. Why so many men are being kept in Egypt nobody professes to know. Why, if our navy is sufficient security for our coasts, we need so many troops in England is a problem. And report describes our front on the Continent as being amply furnished with men and munitions. Yet the War Office people demand more men, and help to precipitate a political crisis by their demand. Is there some mystery?

The Times does not answer this question, but after pointing out that since the industries of England must be maintained if the war is to be won, and that compulsory conscription will necessarily cripple these industries, already suffering from a serious shortage, proceeds to advise the Premier to "face his enemies boldly, stick to his position, exert his power, choose, if need be, fresh colleagues from the popular sections of Parliament, and he will have the country at his back." As to the "crisis makers" whom the Times believes backed by "the ambitions of politicians who aspire to posts of the highest importance: Until they are dealt with sternly by the authorities or the people, it is vain to expect that we shall have a stable Government, whatever may be the ability and efficiency of the Ministers."

All this discussion emphasizes the main difficulties connected with conscription in England: the elimination of the selfish politician and the proper staffing of the industries.

Ireland.—During the past week events moved rapidly in unfortunate Ireland. Dispatches of May 8 announced the execution of Cornelius Colbert, Edmund Kent, Michael Mallon and J. J. Houston; those of May 10 made known the execution of Thomas Kent, at Fermoy; those of May 12 announced the death of James Connolly and John McDermott, after sentence by a court-martial. Arrests and imprisonment are too numerous to record. It is known that the number deported from Ireland for trial is 1,706. Among the more prominent people arrested were Count and Countess Plunkett, whose three sons were tried for complicity in the uprising; one of these was executed, the other two were sentenced to penal servitude. Up to May 10 seventy-nine prisoners had been tried; twelve of this group were shot, four were sentenced to imprisonment for life, twenty-one to ten years in jail, and forty-two to shorter terms. On April 26, F. Sheehy Skeffington, the editor of the Irish Citizen, was executed apparently without just cause and certainly without proper trial. On April 7 he wrote a letter to the New Statesman, declaring that trouble was brewing on account of the overbearing attitude of the "military authorities" in Ireland. The last sentence of his communication was: "I write in the hope that despite the war fever there may be enough sanity and common sense left to restrain the militarists while there is yet time." His fate became known through this letter written by his wife:

Results of the Uprising

My husband was arrested on April 25, when returning home on the second day of the rising, was tried (charge unknown) and shot forthwith. He was unarmed and a non-combatant, being well known as an earnest pacifist, but also as an Irish Nationalist. I would take it as the greatest favor to his memory that you would see that these facts are known at once in England to prevent further tragedies while there is time. I have these facts from a most reliable source, but I have had as yet no official information and have not been allowed even to see my husband, receive his message or take away his body for burial.

Later Mrs. Skeffington gave details of her husband's death, asserting that not even a priest was allowed to attend the condemned man. The British Government declined to assume responsibility for this execution and promised to court-martial the officer who had commanded it. Two other journalists, it is said, met the same fate as the editor of the Irish Citizen. Meanwhile feeling was running high. Mr. Dillon asserted in the House of Commons that there appeared to be a "roving commission with authority to carry out these horrible executions." The speaker continued:

If Ireland were governed by men out of bedlam, they could not pursue a more insane policy. You are letting loose a river of blood between two races, which, after three hundred years of hatred, we had nearly succeeded in bringing together. You are washing out our whole life work in a sea of blood. . . . In my opinion the present government of Ireland is largely in the hands of the Dublin clubs. What is the use of telling me that the executive authorities acted in close consultation with the civil executive officers of the Irish Government? Who are these officers? There are none; they have all disappeared. There is no government in Ireland except Maxwell and the Dublin clubs. Everybody in Dublin knows that. Before the civil officers took flight the military officers treated them with undisguised contempt, and from the day martial law was proclaimed the civil government came absolutely to an end. The men of the old "ascendency" party are going about the streets of Dublin today openly glorying in the rebellion; they claim that it brought martial law and real government into the country. That is what makes the situation so terrible. If that program is to be enforced in Ireland you had better get ready 100,000 men to garrison the country. And then what sort of appearance will you make as the champions of small nationalities?

Following in the same strain, Timothy Healy declared that the death of Skeffington "would never be forgotten while the years grew and water ran." The English press is not very sure in its treatment of the problem. However, the Manchester Guardian recently called the executions "an atrocity" and demanded for the untried Irish leaders the same treatment as that freely accorded to Casement, a public trial. George Bernard Shaw, in a letter to the Daily News, stated that Until Dublin Castle is superseded by a national parliament and Ireland is voluntarily incorporated with the British Empire as Canada, Australia, and South Africa have been incorporated, an Irishman resorting to arms to achieve the independence of his country is doing only what Englishmen will do if it be their misfortune to be invaded and conquered by the Germans in the course of the present war.

During all this agitation the country remains under martial law. Wimborne and Nathan have resigned and civil government has been abolished. A commission headed by Lord Hardinge has been appointed to investigate the causes of the uprising, and Asquith has hurried to Ireland. Apropos of the commission the Irish Parliamentary Party passed the following resolutions:

That any inquiry into the Irish situation must, if it is to be of any value and satisfy public opinion in Ireland and Great Britain, satisfy two conditions: 1. The personnel of the commission must be in touch with and satisfy the public of its impartiality and capacity to conduct an Irish inquiry effectively and without favor. 2. The terms of reference must allow of full investigation of all circumstances which led up to the arming of large sections of the people of Ireland and the recent insurrectionary outbreak, the nature and extent of the outbreak, the fitness of the present form of execution in Ireland to deal with such troubles, and actual steps taken by the Irish executive during the last three years to deal with conditions which led up to the outbreak and with the outbreak when it came.

On May 15 Casement was brought from the Tower to the Bow Street Court for a preliminary hearing on the charge of high treason. Up to the time of this writing the only evidence of importance adduced indicated that Casement, out of a desire to set up an Irish republic, had planned to land several expeditions on the coast of Ireland and elsewhere in the British Isles.

Mexico.—Many problems harass unfortunate Mexico: villages are in ruins, disease and famine are doing a deadly work; but despite all this the so-called rulers of the unhappy country find time for robbery and religious persecution. Their present attitude is illustrated by the following citation taken from the Carranzista organ, La Vox de la Revolucion, dated April 21, 1916:

Attacks on Religion

Good Friday: This is a day on which that farce, the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion, celebrates one of those pompous feasts which are such an insult to civilized humanity.

Science, the goddess of truth, teaches that a lie in religion has prevailed ever since the foundation of the Church, that it is through ignorance priests captivate their followers, an ignorance that has covered up odious robberies. Throughout the whole narration of the life of Christ, from His birth to His Passion, we come across statements that are physically and scientifically (sic) impossible. An effort is made to prove certain physical facts, of the impossibility of which we are convinced. Yet in spite of the proved truth of this impossibility . . . in spite of the glorious Mexican revolution . . . here in Progreso all work was stopped on Good Friday. Thus we are face to face with a psychological phenomenon as curious as it is difficult to study. The toilers who quit work today are the very ones who of their own accord rushed to destroy the idols of the Catholic reactionaries of Merida, the very workmen who constituted the liberal and revolutionary vanguard in Yucatan. . . . How, then, can they celebrate today a feast of the Church which they destroyed, when they burned its saints, threw down its altars and changed the muffled knells sounded by the priesthood into gladsome and sonorous peals that herald liberty? But let no priest or his followers boast of victory. No, the workmen of Progreso are not celebrating Good Friday; no, a thousand times no. We are convinced that it is only a mad and insane atavism that has induced them to suspend labor. They no longer feel in the depth of their hearts the respect, much less the veneration, felt some years ago for a bit of wood more or less painted, a bit of wood that was made to pass for something sacred and miraculous. Those workmen have said to themselves: "Let us suspend work in order to rest and because our rules order it, and for no other reason."

The article cited ridicules those who are "not advanced enough" to dishonor Good Friday, characterizes abstention from work on that day as a "farce," "ignorance," "a backward movement," advocates anti-religious societies and calls upon all to do away with religious sentiments, as they would expel "venomous rattlesnake poison from their bodies." The same paper grows ecstatic over the feasts given to school children on Good Friday and finds especial pleasure in the fact that images were smashed in the presence of the children: "which being interpreted" is the religious liberty promised by Carranza.

The Mexican bandits still continue their forays into the United States; Villa is still at large; dispatches place him now north of Pershing's line and now south of it. Nothing definite is known about him, and in fact little is known about the general situation. More troops have been hurried to the border and the President has called into service the National Guard of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico, so that the total number of men now under Funston's command is about 38,500. The conferences between Generals Scott and Obregon have been discontinued, and General Scott has been called to Washington to report to the Secretary of War. Before he left El Paso the following statement was issued:

International Relations

After several conferences, marked throughout by conspicuous courtesy and good-will, at which conferences mutual impressions were exchanged and information was collected upon the military situation upon the frontier, it was agreed upon by the conferees to suspend the conferences and report back to their respective Governments in order that these may be able, through their respective Foreign Departments, to conclude this matter. The ending of these conferences does not mean, in any way, the rupture of the good relations of friendship between the conferees nor between the respective Governments.

A. OBREGON,
H. L. SCOTT,
FREDERICK FUNSTON.

Despite these fair words there is a general feeling that at present the relations between Mexico and the United States are very strained indeed.

Rome.—The Cittadino of Genoa, quoted by Rome in its latest number, says it learns on good authority that there is no truth in the rumor that the Vatican Council is to be reopened shortly after the war. Reports that it would be reconvened have been widespread for the last ten years. One of the chief reasons assigned for the necessity of a General Council is the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law. This argument, however, does not seem absolutely convincing. After twelve years of preparation, the new Code is now practically ready. It has been elaborated by Cardinal Gasparri, by a commission of cardinals, by a body of about fifty consultors including the most learned professors of canon law, and by over a thousand bishops assisted by as many canonists in every part of the Catholic world. The Code, it is thought, will be promulgated by a Pontifical Constitution. A second reason advanced for the reopening of the Vatican Council is the alleged necessity of settling many difficulties connected with the Holy Scriptures. But the Biblical Question, in the opinion of many, forms a reason for deferring rather than hastening the reopening of the Council. For the Holy See, realizing that this is a period of active Biblical study and research, has made ample provision for collecting, collating, and sifting results. This explains the establishment of the Biblical Commission, consisting of a number of cardinals and a large body of learned consultors; of a Vulgate Commission formed of Benedictines under the direction of Cardinal Gasquet to restore the text of St. Jerome's version; and of a Biblical Institute entrusted to Jesuit professors and scholars, whose aim is, not only to train teachers of Scripture, but to register and analyze the latest results of Biblical research and scholarship. Just where the present rumor about the reopening of the Vatican Council arose, it is hard to say.

Will the Vatican Council be Reopened?

TOPICS OF INTEREST

III—The Charities Investigation: The Hearings

THE record of the hearings of the Strong Commission is perhaps one of the most voluminous of modern times. It begins at page 1534 and ends at page 8763, excluding hundreds of "exhibits." To gather the "testimony," picked investigators, acting under instructions, were engaged in inspecting the child-caring institutions; their "findings" were whipped into elaborate reports which excluded nothing, however small or untruthful, provided it would serve to injure or discredit the private institutions. The charges were filed, the stage set, the Commissioner appointed from a list submitted by Mr. Homer Folks, whose pet aversion is the private charity, and with an atmosphere of hostility created, the enemies of the private institutions, were ready for the public attack.

The quiet and sober rooms of the New York Bar Association were selected for the hearings which began on Monday, January 31, and continued with interruptions until April 24. The Department of Public Charities, led by Messrs. Doherty, Kingsbury and the astute W. H. Hotchkiss, began the attack. As "experts," backers, aiders and abettors they called Messrs. Reeder, Bernstein, Devine, Folks, Bruère, Canfield, Moree, Miss Katherine B. Davis, Miss Madeline Doty, Mayor Mitchell, and a few lesser lights.

Dr. Reeder attacked the "shut-in schools" and the "shut-in staffs" of the child-caring institutions. His specialty was retardation; but incidentally he spoke of the "scramble for children" and the "profit accruing from their care." When asked on February 9, by Commissioner Strong, "Why the scramble?" he hesitated, and Mr. Hotchkiss encouraged him by saying, "State it Doctor." "Well," replied Dr. Reeder, "they are a sort of revenue to the institution." Commissioner Strong inquired where the revenue went; Dr. Reeder enlightened him. "It might be to sustain, or to continue, or to build up a Religious Order" (page 2587 of the record). Dr. Reeder admitted that he too had assisted in the "scramble"; but the Commissioner, solicitous for his reputation, asked "Just what do you mean, that you helped the institution in the scramble to get children? It seems to be a reflection upon your own character, does it not? I don't want you unintentionally to leave the testimony in that condition." What kindness! Dr. Reeder was well able to take care of himself, but if he limped now and then, Mr. Strong was ready to help him over the difficult places.

Dr. Bernstein attacked the social activities of the institutions. These had to be according to his standards or fall under his condemnation. Mr. Brooke criticized the plant, buildings and equipment; while the social service inspectors from the City Department of Charities had each his or her own line of work, which made the testimony given about food, clothing, physical conditions, bathing and lavatory facilities, tooth brushes and towels, most illuminating.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Strong did not act on the writer's suggestion, and go to the institutions to see for himself the actual conditions. This, however, would not have suited the purposes of the prosecutors. It would be a short cut to the truth, and the enemies of the institutions had no stomach for the truth. There were twenty-six institutions on the controverted list. Some are so small, both in population and plant, that they can be inspected in half a day and the charges against them disproved. As a rule when disputants meet to talk over their differences, much, if not all of the ground for dispute vanishes. Messrs. Kingsbury and Doherty had no desire to adjust differences or bring about improvement of conditions in the institutions in a quiet, orderly manner. Since taking office they have hungered and thirsted for publicity. A quiet adjustment of difficulties would not suit their purpose; hence the defects found or alleged were not brought to the attention of the institution managers with the idea of bettering affairs. The public must be made aware of the alleged shortcomings, the public appetite for scandal must be satisfied, the press of the city must be set in motion in such a way that the newspapers would select the "high spots" and such items as were most striking and startling. In this way public sentiment would be aroused and the enemies of the institutions could carry on the propaganda for the secularization of all the private charities of the State. No plan was ever more wickedly conceived. The testimony of Madeline C. Doty, on February 15, (record 3112 to 3125), makes these methods manifest. This lady has a mania for publicity. She went to jail for a month some years ago, to get first-hand experience, so as to add value to her magazine articles. While on the stand she testified that her investigations showed that an enormous number of criminals in our State Prisons came from child-caring institutions. She declared that she examined the record of twelve hundred convicts, and found two-thirds of them had been in some childrens' institution; she asserted that many of these men attributed their down-fall to the fact that they had been brought up or lived for a time in a child-caring institution. No proof was offered for this: no names were given, no effort was made to check up her data. She herself said that she was an expert in penology. That was sufficient. Who could doubt her?

Let us hope that Mr. Strong will visit many, if not all the institutions criticized before he sends his report to the Governor. As an intelligent man, he should be able to see whether or not our institutions are recruiting stations for prisons. It will not take him long to discover that our institutions are making strenuous and successful efforts to train their charges for decent citizenship. "By their fruits ye shall know them." If some of the former inmates of the institutions fall by the wayside and become criminals, this is the fault of the individual and not of the institution.

The "over-lords" and the "experts" in the field of charity and philanthropy were called in turn, and were listened to with bated breath. For two whole weeks after the hearings began, the entire press of the city gave full publicity to this campaign of vilification and abuse of the institutions, their management, methods and motives. Nothing was left untouched. No gibe was too bitter. Not one good word was said for them, nor the slightest effort made by Commissioner Strong, to curb the defamation which, as the Commissioner well knew, was based on mere hearsay or opinion and did not conform to the rules of evidence, but was nevertheless cloaked under official sanction. Messrs. Doherty, Kingsbury, or some of their "expert" witnesses said it. That was quite sufficient. During this time, while the institutions and their friends writhed under the sting and humiliation of false imputations and slanderous charges, the "atmosphere" of the hearings and the attitude of Commissioner Strong, were, to our mind, openly partial to Mr. Hotchkiss and his clients who were using the "institutions that were not on trial" as a battering-ram to beat down their opponents in the State Charity Board. Under the circumstances, Commissioner Strong should have quickly discovered the parties to the quarrel, and the first elements of justice should have dictated that he protect the rights of non-combatants. Did the Commissioner do this? He did not. A reading of the record will show how the Commissioner and his attorney, Mr. John Kirkland Clarke, constantly collaborated with Mr. Hotchkiss and his clients. During the early days of the hearings, which were a time of great suspense for the institutions and their friends, the Commissioner must have been aware of the irreparable harm done in poisoning the public mind, but he never made a vigorous effort to set the public right. He did mention once or twice that "the institutions were not on trial," but it was done in so feeble and half-hearted a manner that no one paid any attention to him. "Murder" was being done, the reputations of honest men and women were being assassinated, their motives and work misrepresented, and it was high time to call a halt. A distinguished citizen has remarked that, "When a man's wife is insulted, it makes little difference what he does six months afterwards." It was no time to consult the niceties of language, to resort to paper diplomacy or to indulge in "watchful waiting." It was an occasion that called for action. Then began the battle of the pamphlets. This opened the whole situation to the public in a manner that had not been possible before. It smoked out the sinister allies of the interests of the State Charities Aid Association, the Russell Sage Foundation, the Charity Organization Society, the City Club, the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, Homer Folks, John A. Kingsbury, Alfred T. White, and their activities with the Governor and his Commissioner. After the publication of the pamphlets the atmosphere at the hearings changed, although even then Commissioner Strong could not altogether smother his solicitude for one side of the issue. When a subpœna was requested for Mr. Canfield of the State Charities Aid Association, the Commissioner demurred, stating that a request for his presence would be sufficient. But, after that, subpœnas were issued by him for Mgr. Dunne; Father Dineen, Bishop Hayes's secretary; Father Farrell; myself and others. I do not believe that Commissioner Strong has any religious bias, but his associations and contact with one faction made him a decided partisan in spite of himself. In a future article we shall consider certain phases of the testimony and the effects the testimony was intended to produce.

JAMES J. HIGGINS, D.D.,
Secretary, Catholic Charities Bureau, Brooklyn.

A Plea for Novel-Reading

THERE has always been a certain odium attached to the idea of novel-reading. In the eyes of some good people it is to be classed with bear-baiting and other Puritanic aversions of Cromwellian days; in the view of others it is held not so much a reprehensible fault, but as an unimportant work of supererogation, deserving of no merit. A few years ago a popular professor at a large American university read in the journals of the day a hundred jesting jibes directed at a new college course on the contemporary novel which he was about to offer. Only a few months since certain critics of life with perhaps rather unromantic views on living advocated that the novel be banished from the New York public library. Well, the course on modern novels is being given, and the fiction shelves of the library are still intact; and it is difficult to measure the harm or benefit that has resulted from the innovation at the university and from the unchanged custom of the city library.

That there are good grounds for criticism of the novel from the moral standpoint it is needless to dispute. Everyone who does not take a thoroughly hedonistic view of life knows that many novels have done and are doing incalculable injury. Novelists there have been who have not left their native air sweeter for their words. Balzac was one, though a man of rare talent; de Maupassant was another; such was Smollett and such was Laurence Sterne. Today too there are writers who have given their souls away, men who have sold their knightliness and women who are glancing back toward the unholy cities. Noblesse oblige as a heraldic device seems to have been blotted from their escutcheons; it is indeed hard to be noble, and it is extremely easy to write in one of the fashionable modes of the twentieth century. It is an occasion of regret that the fallen ideals of so many readers allow them to taste the fruit of the forbidden tree and call it good.

There is, moreover, another danger from novel-reading beside the moral harm. A person may grow so fond of novels that he may wish to read nothing else. Novels are easy to read; the plot keeps us to the task, the development of character holds us rapt, the element of uncertainty makes us certain to keep awake and alert until the tale is told. If a person allows himself to read nothing but novels, he will often, as we have just said, find himself in the position of not caring to read anything else; for he will find the other species of reading too quiet, too dull, too devoid of action. Only the novel will stimulate, only the plotted story will make the heart glow, and the nerves tingle, and the brain work like a tireless thrall. And so the devoted novel-reader will become very one-sidedly romantic, or idealistic, or quasi-realistic, without winning the saving grace of intellectual balance, which a variety in his reading would have given him. To draw so close to the creation of Cervantes is rather too much of a luxury, and perhaps it is a little hard on the windmills.

Reading certain novels may injure the soul; reading nothing but novels may dissipate the mental powers and seriously impair ability to do intellectual work requiring a more concentrated effort. But the individual reader must refrain from these follies, just as he refrains from bearing false witness against his unpleasant neighbor or from turning a deaf ear to the church bells on a rainy Sunday morning. It is unreasonable to ask the decent and prudent people to forego the happiness that comes from the novel simply because there are other people who are forgetful of propriety and wisdom.

It is quite impossible to measure the gladness and good cheer and general well-being that the novel has brought into the world. It is idle to fancy in how many ways the nineteenth century gave joy to millions of souls that would have found the eighteenth an age of commonplace. Scott gave the first real bloom of color and fragrance to the romance of the Middle Ages; Dickens revealed the humbler class of Victorian England in a semi-realism of humor; Thackeray, in an easy, familiar tone, told the story of the world's drama, following the actors through war and peace, depicting in a mellow wisdom the weaknesses and stupidities and kindnesses of the lowly and the great; George Eliot, in a fine, feminine analysis of character, showed the psychology of the human soul's decadence, or of its rebirth through suffering and sorrow; Meredith presented his philosophy of life by a similar psychological method, subtler and less easy to follow; Stevenson unfolded in exquisite prose the magic glamor of the lands and seas of adventure; only Mr. Hardy, of the greater English novelists, has touched life's sinister chord unhopefully, and sounded the note of gloom, a long, dirgeful song of man's inability to placate the stars that have fated his fall.

In glancing over the ranks of the American novelists, one may count Cooper, with his tales of the sea and of frontier life; Hawthorne, the supreme artist of the lights and shadows of New England life; Marion Crawford, whose novels of many lands have been more widely read than the works of any of his contemporaries; Mr. Howells, who has written rather fully the record of American life; and a writer who was American so long that we forget to acknowledge his British citizenship, Henry James, whose recent death has given to his varied work an added interest.

Let any one who has read the chief novels of British and American authorship say whether or not they have made his life happier, or better, or fuller of meaning. Let him bear witness who has read, we shall say, the following books: Jane Austen's "Pride and Prejudice" and "Emma"; Scott's "Ivanhoe" and "The Talisman"; Disraeli's "Coningsby"; Bulwer-Lytton's "The Last Days of Pompeii"; Dickens' "Oliver Twist" and "David Copperfield"; William M. Thackeray's "The Newcomes," and "Henry Esmond"; Trollope's "Barchester Towers"; Charlotte Bronté's "Jane Eyre"; Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford"; George Eliot's "Adam Bede" and "Middlemarch"; Meredith's "The Egoist"; Stevenson's "Treasure Island" and "The Master of Ballantrae"; Wilkie Collins's "The Woman in White"; Blackmore's "Lorna Doone"; Miss Mulock's "John Halifax, Gentleman"; J. M. Barrie's "The Little Minister"; Rudyard Kipling's "The Light That Failed"; Cooper's "The Spy" and "The Last of the Mohicans"; Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter" and "The House of the Seven Gables"; Holmes's "Elsie Venner"; Eggleston's "The Hoosier Schoolmaster"; Lew Wallace's "Ben Hur"; Helen Hunt Jackson's "Ramona"; Mark Twain's "Adventures of Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn"; Henry James's "Daisy Miller" and "A Portrait of a Lady"; Marion Crawford's "Saracinesca" and "Katherine Lauderdale"; W. D. Howell's "The Rise of Silas Lapham" and "A Hazard of New Fortunes."

Or again, let him answer who has read some of these, for the most part a galaxy of lesser luminaries: Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Marcella"; Mrs. Craigie's "The School for Saints"; Canon Sheehan's "My New Curate"; Henry Harland's "The Cardinal's Snuff Box"; John Ayscough's "San Celestino"; Joseph Conrad's "The Typhoon"; Benson's "By What Authority?" Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's "Great Possessions"; Lucas Malet's "The Far Horizon"; William de Morgan's "Joseph Vance"; Richard Harding Davis's "Soldiers of Fortune"; Edward Noyes Westcott's "David Harum"; Paul Leicester Ford's "The Honorable Peter Stirling"; Miss Mary Johnston's "To Have and to Hold"; Winston Churchill's "Richard Carvel" and "Coniston"; Booth Tarkington's "The Gentleman from Indiana"; Owen Wister's "The Virginian"; Mrs. Edith Wharton's "The House of Mirth"; Weir Mitchell's "Hugh Wynne"; Thomas Nelson Page's "Gordon Keith"; Miss Frances Little's "The Lady of the Decoration"; W. S. Harrison's "Queed"; and F. Hopkinson Smith's "Felix O'Day."

Banish the novels? As well ask for clouds in exchange for blue skies, tears for laughter, old lamps for new. Many a man has found in the novel his only romance in life, his only sweetheart, his only riches, his only home; many a man before the novel's sway has faltered at the pathway of dishonor, and turned away, back from shame, to the ideal enshrined within the pages of a book; many a man and many a woman have found there the sympathy they have sought elsewhere in vain, the friendship they have wished for, the delights of far, unvisited cities, with all the beauty of God's world; some have even found God. Novel-reading should indeed be reckoned an act of virtue, or at least of worldly wisdom, which may often lead to supernal merit. The world for most people is too real and too earnest, and the gateway to a happy sanity lies open in the pages of romance.

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM.

The Boys of Our City: St. Louis

THE city of St. Louis, with a population of some eight hundred thousand, is the fourth in size in the United States. Of these, nineteen per cent perhaps consist of foreign-born, transplanted sons and daughters of Europe: Jews, Russian and Polish, Magyars and Croatians, Syrians and Serbs, Poles and Rumanians. Fully twice that number are native-born of foreign parents. Another six per cent are of the negro race. It is an old city, with many dilapidated dwelling-places; there is too great congestion in certain districts. Because of these important factors—the city's size, the complex character of its population, and the unhealthful environment in particular neighborhoods—there is a boy-problem of some magnitude. A populous city always puts difficulties in the way of the boy. The lure of its lights, the restlessness and unnatural desires of its life, the ease with which a young person can be lost in its vast labyrinth, the temptation which its amusements offer, make the situation one which demands the most careful attention and the most vigorous methods.

A metropolitan city has always a great army of juvenile street-traders, newsboys, bootblacks, sellers of flowers, fruit-venders, whose occupation, at least for those of a very tender age, spells immeasurable dangers, moral, mental and physical. In St. Louis there are almost two thousand newsboys alone; the number of lads in other occupations is much more difficult to estimate. Other American cities, for instance, Milwaukee and Boston have endeavored with the best success to regulate these young merchants through a license system, prescribing the age at which they may engage in this work, the school conditions which they must have fulfilled, and the number of hours they may be on the streets and in other public places. St. Louis has done nothing as yet in this regard. In 1912, as a result of a survey of conditions among newsboys carried out by the St. Louis School of Social Economy, an effort was made to have the scheme at work in Boston introduced there, but it failed of adoption. Another attempt at street-trade regulation is now on foot, under the particular auspices of the Catholic District League, the local Federation of German Catholic societies, and the Social Service Conference. The difficulty is to frame an ordinance which can be enforced. At the same time a Commission working on the revision of the State laws so as to provide a children's code such as exists in Ohio, is considering the amendment of laws to meet the perplexing exigencies. The present regulation on the Missouri statute books sets down ten years as the minimum age for street-traders. Seven o'clock is the hour at which all children should cease work, and this applies to those engaged in independent activities as well as those employed by another. Adequate machinery for the enforcement of these laws is not provided, so that they are practically unenforced, despite the efforts of the State Factory Inspector. While the old picture of the boy rising from his job on the streets to a place of prominence and power may be still true in certain instances, it is much less so than its exploitation in the public prints suggests. The majority of street-trades are "blind-alley" jobs, with no opportunity for advancement. The work in public places, often necessitating contact with forces far from elevating, with many sources of temptation, is not a work for the boy of tender years. Regulation of these occupations and their prohibition to boys of certain ages is necessary.

Poor housing, too, has its vital effect on the lives and welfare of the children living in the objectionable quarters. Two and three rooms, sometimes only one, in buildings in which are to be found other families, cannot afford proper play space for the growing boy; the street and alley, as a consequence, become his playground, unless other places are provided where play can be carried on in an organized way. The widespread movement for public playgrounds has arisen in response to this need. In St. Louis eighteen of these playgrounds are maintained at the present time. It is the immigrant child who is most affected by congested home conditions. He has come to be called the "child of the city streets." Because of the fact that he is in many instances wiser than his parents as to the language and customs of America, and acts as their interpreter, transacting much of their business with the outside world, he presents a special problem of his own. The independence which this advantage gives him and his misunderstanding, on certain occasions, of the liberties allowed by American life do not always work for his good. It is a common assertion of social workers that the second generation in this country furnishes a higher ratio to the ranks of delinquent children than their proportionate numbers justify. If this be so, the latest report of the Probation Department of the Juvenile Court of St. Louis does not bear out the contention. The child of the immigrant compares more than favorably with other classes of children. There is no doubt, however, that in many ways, because of his peculiar environment, he is deserving of our first attention; particularly when we as Catholics remember that he is so often of our Faith.

The Catholics of St. Louis have not been indifferent to their duty in regard to the boys of their city. They have made several attempts, perhaps somewhat too spasmodic and not well enough organized as yet, to meet the situation. Father Dunne's "Newsboys' Home," no longer dedicated to the service of that particular class, but to dependent lads in general, is a permanent institution with a systematic program of activities. A "Big Brothers" organization among Catholic men, established some time ago, has recently been resuscitated, and is now working in conjunction with the probation officers of the Juvenile Court. Among the Italians of the downtown districts a division of the Boy Scouts was formed by the Jesuit Fathers there, but it has not fared as well as it might have done. Out on "Dago Hill," where the Jesuits have conducted their splendid catechism classes with a membership numbering fully six hundred children, some sodality work has been carried on. The St. Elizabeth's Settlement of the Central Verein, in the south part of the city, has done much for the Hungarian lads there, though the organized work which is to be done for them by that institution has not been fully developed. The Polish boys need a great deal of attention, more than has so far been given to them. Crystallization and systematization of the activities in this field is perhaps the greatest need of the present time.

The proposed Sodality Union, now in the process of formation in St Louis, will contribute both toward this effort at systematization, and to the wider extension of the work among the boys, if it realizes its opportunities. The sodality, properly conducted, can be made an instrument of social effort in almost any quarter and with any class. There can be attached to it any form of organization which any specific locality may require. The ordinary American boy of native parents of the middle class can be reached by it as well as the immigrant youngster in the foreign quarter. Those who are members of a branch in a comparatively wealthy section of the city can lend their aid to the endeavors of a sodality in a less favored neighborhood. They can furnish recruits, for example, for "Big Brother" work.

The sodality members can most effectively carry on this work, if they learn to view the boy as he really is. His environment, inherited prejudices, and beliefs must be understood. This does not require any great effort at study or analysis, but it does demand patience and appreciation of those things with which the boy comes in contact and which serve to influence his actions. Above all, the fact that he is a boy must be understood, that though he has a desire for vigorous play, he is capable withal of education in higher things, intellectual and spiritual. Apropos of this it is well to remark that sodality members or voluntary workers of any class should not ignore the co-operation and advice of those Catholic men who are devoting all their time and energies to the solution of these problems. While there is without doubt such a thing as becoming too "expert" and "systematic" in these matters, there are certain problems whose solution requires more than good will and patience.

Our boys certainly deserve the attention of the Catholic people. They are to be the men of the next generation. It is most imperative that we devote our attention to them and to the peculiar problems and difficulties which are theirs. There could be nothing more profitable for well-disposed and intelligent Catholics at the present time than to spend some of their leisure in working in this field. A splendid opportunity is here offered to our Catholic men. A great city gives them hosts upon hosts of chances to do something effective for the boys. Their assistance in this matter would be productive of great and beneficial results.

LOUIS BUDENZ.

A Venture in Church Music

AN event of unusual interest and importance to musicians was the Missa Solemnis which opened the first annual conference of the Auxiliary Committee to the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music. The Mass was sung at the Church of St. Francis Xavier, in New York City, on May 10, and invitations were sent to many of the prominent musicians, Catholic and non-Catholic, of the city and the surrounding districts. The program was admirably planned to illustrate the three types of church music approved by the Holy See, and to give some sense of the relative prominence attached to each by the Motu Proprio.

The impression produced may well have been that which the Committee intended when it placed the three styles of music side by side. Those parts of the Mass which stood out, both for their incomparable beauty and sublime devotional quality, were precisely those which were sung in Gregorian chant, that music which the Holy See has always held up as the "supreme model" for use in the ecclesiastical services of the Church. Those free and soaring melodies seemed to the listener to convey the full savor of the liturgical prayers themselves and to embody the beauty, free from all complexity and mannerism, which makes them so sincere an expression of the thought. Here indeed the inspired prayers seemed to find full expression in music, in an art alight with the same holy flame, giving forth the deep, brooding spirit of the Church's prayers, the soaring flight of her love and the tender depth of her humility. All other music, "human music," as Huysmans calls it, seemed earthy when compared to these inspired melodies.

At the conclusion of the Mass, the Rev. John J. Wynne made an eloquent address giving a historic outline of the development of the Church's official music from the days of the Old Dispensation, when "the choirs of the Temple chanted in numbers which sometimes exceeded five thousand." He traced the development through the period when the early Christians, the persecutions having ceased, renewed the custom of singing holy songs and canticles, down through the fourth and fifth centuries illustrated by the zeal for hymnology, displayed by St. Ambrose and St. Hilary respectively. In the sixth century, the great promoter of Christian chant, St. Gregory, arranged in the form of his antiphonary all that was considered most devotional and most proper and most enduring of the chants in use up to his day.

Father Wynne described the spreading of the Gregorian chant by the missionaries, by St. Augustine in England and St. Boniface in Germany; its installations by the emperors of Gaul in their court and cloistral school on the model established in Rome, so that the knowledge of it became so common, both to monks and pupils, that all the people could join in it. So, for a thousand years from the time of St. Ambrose, and eight hundred from that of St. Gregory this form of music obtained in all the churches and was considered just as much a part of Divine worship as the words of the prayers. Then there followed a succession of abuses and corrections until finally the growing taste for a mere worldly type of music which invaded the sanctuary became a cause of perplexity and grievous sorrow to the Pontiff and Bishops of the Church, who had the decorum of public worship so much at heart.

But, in the middle of the last century, a renewal of Christian fervor took place. Pious-minded men returned to the monasteries, and began to study the past and to restore this lost art of church music. At Solesmes, Mechlin and Ratisbon, men were found studying in their own way the notations of the Gregorian chant, endeavoring to reproduce its practice, as best they might, in order to exemplify the dignity and stateliness of this music and win the people back to it. Regulations were issued by the Popes, by Pius IX, by Leo XIII and finally, in our own day, by the great Pius X, who made the very second message of his fruitful Pontificate an earnest exhortation for the restoration of the Gregorian chant to its own place in the worship of the Church.

At the time that the Holy Father's "code of the laws of liturgical music" was published, various opinions were expressed. "All agreed with the motive."—How could they differ?—when he said that he wished to restore all things in Christ. Among these were the dignity of Christian worship, the decorum of the House of God where, as he told us, the people were to gather to perform the sacred mysteries and to receive the grace of the Sacraments, to partake of the Body and Blood of their Saviour, to adore Him in the tabernacle, to take part with the ministers of the Church in the solemn liturgical functions. He remarked that whilst there were everywhere churches of great beauty, ceremonies of remarkable precision, and ministers of great fervor, there was this one thing lacking. Every other form seemed to be observed. But that which most helps priests and people to utter the praises of Almighty God worthily seemed to have been lost forever, until by the patient efforts of men who had been studying it for nearly a century, it was possible to do what an ordinary mind might consider impossible: to restore a lost art, the Gregorian chant. Pope Pius X had confidence in the power of the tradition of the Church. He knew that it was just as forceful and living, and as capable of restoring what was befitting Christian liturgy as the power of the graces animating the Church, because the Church lives by this tradition.

"Events have justified the Holy Father's faith." Despite conflicting opinions and prejudices and wretched customs, the laws of Pius X are being established and put into effect. No longer, nowadays, do we hear from any one who is familiar with the subject, that restoration of the chant is impossible, that the music itself has no beauty; seldom, if ever, do we hear, what was once common, a theatrical performance in the organ-lofts of our churches, or if we do hear it, priests and people remark it as something that is fast becoming antiquated.

Pius X did not think that by the mere utterance of his Motu Proprio, he could reestablish a lost art. He was not a reformer, but a restorer. He did not work by agitation, by arbitrary mandates, but by the patience of wisdom, and he knew that the abuses that had taken four centuries to gain a hold in the Church, might take at least one century to eradicate. In his message on this subject, although he speaks of it as code, he did not say, "I hereby command and enjoin." In his paternal manner he called upon the Cardinals, and the Hierarchy, the heads of seminaries and Christian schools everywhere, to help him restore this beautiful treasure of the Church. His standard was that every form should be truly religious, truly artistic and as universal in its appeal as the liturgy itself.

Now, what is most encouraging about this movement within the Church, for the restoration of proper music in its liturgy is this: It is twelve years since Pius X issued his code of laws on liturgical music. There has been time to air all objections, there has been time to show reluctance to such a restoration, and the objections day after day disappear, and the reluctance disappears. Everywhere respect is shown for proper music, and no one any longer says that such music is impossible or undesirable. In Rome there is a Pontifical school of music and it is one of the significant signs of the heart of the present Pontiff that, when he first ascended the chair of St. Peter, he took care to state that he wished the Motu Proprio of his predecessor, Pius X, to be considered the code of laws of church music, and he gave his blessing and hearty support to this school. Throughout Europe, and this country, there are priests, and with them a number of the laity, endeavoring to fulfill the wishes of Pius X. We are fortunate in having a number of the laity, who have the sanction of the Pope, and many prelates through the land, joined in an endeavor to increase the interest of the laity in the matter of proper church music, and with great success.

First of all, they are calling attention to the chant, they are bringing numbers to see that not only is it the sincere wish of the Sovereign Pontiff and of the Hierarchy, but that in itself, apart from any mandate coming from higher authorities, it is the only true form of music for the Church. They are obtaining support for the Pontifical school of music in Rome, support for various musical enterprises that are being attempted here in our own country, and they are providing the means, above all, by which the complete restoration may be brought about. As Pius X foresaw, it is very difficult to cultivate singers, organ masters, directors and composers, above all. But he counseled that a beginning be made with the children in the schools, remarking that this chant is soft and sweet and easy, and when the young really are made to appreciate it, they become enthusiastic over it and learn it without difficulty.

We already have vocal training in our schools, and therefore it is easy to provide methods for training in the knowledge of Gregorian chant. This fact will really bring about a restoration. What was it, after all, that first propagated Gregorian chant? It was the school of singers and cantors in Rome under the immediate attention of the Holy See. The school was famous; out of it came at least five Popes within a century and a half. The schools of St. Gall, Metz, and those established at the Courts of Pepin and Charlemagne, and, in England, by Gregory and his successors in the various sees created there, were all modeled on this Roman school.

Here is something worthy of our deepest interest and attention. This service of the Church, the Mass, is the Divine drama of our Redemption. It is something that must be worthily performed, or not at all. Pius X established the fact in our mind, that this music is not merely an accessory and an attraction but that it must be treated as an integral part of human worship, just as necessary as the form and ceremony in our public liturgical service.

These words of the preacher at the Missa Solemnis express the motive which prompted the committee to request that such a Mass be sung, and that motive is a desire to hasten the day when the Faithful will once again break into Gregorian song in response to the priest, thus taking their part in the august Sacrifice of the Altar. A. L. M.

Irish Priests and Their Flocks

WHAT is it in these men that differentiates them from their kin? Very often they come from peasant or farming stock. Occasionally they have relatives who are an affliction to them. The last thing one would think of doing would be to unburden one's soul to these people, the kinsmen of the priest. Yet every priest is a man or honor. It is a happiness to sit down by the fireside with one of these priests and talk freely, knowing that you are as safe as in the confessional, and that the priest gives you honesty for honesty, friendship for friendship, that you may say everything without being misunderstood. It is good faith. None of the queer barriers, which remind us that Ireland was once a country of warring tribes, come between you and the faithful priests.

Before we came west one or two southern men said to us as a speeding: "Never trust a western man." Doubtless the western men would speed us south with the formula reversed. The thing is always cropping up. The Galway man has no liking for the Mayo man just across the invisible frontier. The Mayo man will explain of an unattractive group of peasants: "They are Kerries. They made a plantation here about three generations ago." Of another part of the country: "They've mixed Tyrone and Kerries there." And again explaining a certain cupidity of a class: "They're Welsh. Are not the two commonest names in the country, Welsh? You remember 'The Vengeance of the Welshman of Tirawley.' They were planted on us. The whole west of the county carries their traces." In the same way they will tell you in the east: "A Wexford man will never look the way of a Tipperary man, because Tipperary did not rise in the Rebellion." And one remembers the battle of New Ross which decided the fate of Ireland in 1798, that while the battle raged one side the Barrow River, on the other side the Kilkenny peasants peacefully tilled their fields. It was Wexford's battle, not theirs. And, again, one remembers how Con of the Hundred Fights

> Pillowed his head o' nights
> On the corpse of a Connaught man.

In the priest one finds none of these warring elements. Be he Ulster, Munster, Leinster or Connaught you can trust the priest. True religion is, after all, the sense of honor. The priest has it in perfection. An Irish Protestant, realizing the great restfulness of having to do with a body of men entirely trustworthy, asked me: "What is it?" I answered, "Divine grace."

This is a country where a priest's head fetched twenty-five dollars in the Penal Days. There is a long story which I might tell you some day of the Shawn-na-Sagart and how he met his end, and of the heads that hung in the cellars of a mansion not far from where I write till the price was paid and they could be buried.

One of my friends among the priests referred to this picturesquely in a sermon. "It isn't a hundred years," he said, "since the priests were running over the hills and valleys of Ireland with five-pound notes on their heads."

This priest is full of quips and cranks and oddities. He serves his Master so merrily that it took us some considerable time to recognize the man as he is. He has been to America and back, so he is a man of the world, and he sits on certain boards, so that he has influence beyond the priestly. He has trained a good many young priests, and as one knows him one comes to recognize why he was chosen. I wonder what he lives on. There is no such thing here as a seat-rent. His little church is as free as air. He will not even read from the altar the list of his "dues," lest those who gave little or not at all should be ashamed. He troubles himself with neither scrip nor purse. One remonstrates with him that he spoils the people. They throng his confessional on Sunday morning after he has sat all day Saturday, and he will not send them away. "Ah, well," he says to the person who asks why they do not come on Saturday, "you see they might be from a distance." While he waits in the confessional he bursts into impassioned prayers, as he does sometimes kneeling before the altar like an old peasant, such an old peasant as was heard to say leaving the church, "Goodbye, Mavourneen, till I can come back again."

You might live here a long time and know little of the ways of the people if it were not for the priests. They are a very secretive people to the outsider. Once in Tyrone I thought I traversed a desolate country and discovered later that in all kinds of hidden dips and folds of the bog country there were tucked away little farms.

In this part of Mayo at least, the land teems with life. The small farmhouses have a stack-yard of ricks which would not disgrace an English farm. I did not think that there were as many pigs in Ireland as I have seen going to the monthly fairs. There is little laughter among the owners. I have seen none of it. If there is an incident for laughter it has a somewhat sardonic humor. Once we stopped a man coming home from a fair who was striking his donkey with his stick, rhythmically and not reasonably. He was hardly in a state to argue the matter, but his helpmeet dropped a curtsey: "It's very kind of your Honor to instruct us," she said. "Sure we're only poor ignorant people that couldn't be expected to know any better." "Turning the other cheek," commented the parish priest when I told him the story. "With her tongue in it," I added.

I pricked up my ears at a phrase in the curate's sermon. The curate is a very lonely person except for his dogs. To catch a sight of him on an upland against a splendid wintry sky, his black cassock with the wind in it, tall and somewhat gaunt, with the two half-breed dogs at his heels, is to savor the loneliness of these parts and his life. The phrase was: "It is not keeping the Sabbath holy to go to Mass in the morning and to spend the night drinking at balls."

"Drinking at balls!" It was worth inquiring about. I found that it was possible for those outwardly-seeming dour peasants to dance not only Sunday night, but other nights of the week. Inquiries of the priests told me more. They visit one another of evenings, play a game of cards, and are home by eleven o'clock. You have only to read the country newspapers to discover for yourself how much histrionic ability there is in the country. Every village and town seems to have its dramatic society. It is musical as well. People who think of Connaught as lonesome bogland where a vexed peasant farmer strives to wring a scanty substance from an arid plot are mistaken. The people dance and sing and play.

Their standard of living has been greatly raised of late, since they became proprietors of their own farms. They have learned to beautify their own cottages, or perhaps they beautified them long ago, for the really pretty cottages, of which one sees a good many side by side with hovels, are not new cottages. The naked new two-story houses of what they call the "Congested Board" do not show in my experience any attempt at beautifying. So, perhaps, the pretty cottages for which I was hardly prepared, belonged to the days when Mayo had landlords.

The emigration, the priest will tell you, will start again after the war with a tremendous rush. Where there are three or four boys in the family the land will not support them. There are no manufactures, few and small industries. "If there was a peat industry now. . . ."

The priest who has neither scrip nor purse made a personal effort to stop the running away because of the fear of conscription. It was, by the way, the mothers' panic not the boys.' But, after all, the priests, too, turn a face which tells you nothing if you are not a friend, and they only smile at the presentation of them in such a book as "Father Ralph," by one who was long one of their number. KATHARINE TYNAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

A Good Old Custom

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the course of a meditation given to the Xavier Alumni Sodality during a recent retreat in New York City, Father Campbell, S.J., spoke very feelingly of the custom that used to prevail among lawyers and judges of attending in a body the Mass of the Holy Ghost, in order to prepare and fortify themselves for the ensuing year's work. It occurred to me, and the same thought must have struck others also, that it would not only be possible to revive such a laudable practice, but that it would be highly desirable and practicable to do so. There is no doubt that the proposed project is feasible. A conveniently situated church could be selected, and the date of the Mass fixed sometime toward the end of September or the beginning of October, when the lawyers are not too busily engaged in trial work. Other difficulties also could be easily removed. Success would be assured if the lawyers would only decide to carry out the plan. Why can we not make such a Mass an annual event in each of our large cities?

New York. A SODALIST.

From "Androcles" to "Marie-Odile"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

While I have no desire to enter upon a controversy, certainly not to utter any note of personal censure, I hope it may be permitted me to offer some points for the consideration of your correspondent who, in connection with an article on the Drama League, addressed a communication to AMERICA, mainly referring to "Androcles and the Lion." I do not know to what degree this writer shared in the Catholic agitation over "Marie-Odile," but, in view of the comparison suggested by him between that play and the others he mentioned, I judge he has no excuse to offer for "Marie-Odile." I happen to know of a Catholic scholar and gentleman, highly esteemed in educational circles, who, with his family, saw "Marie-Odile" and came away impressed only with the beauty and artistry of the production. This gentleman was astounded and abashed when made to realize that his fellow-Catholics, in every class and condition of life, throughout the whole country, were profoundly disturbed over what they considered a base intrusion upon their most intimate and sacred beliefs. Not so much anger but a sharp pang of consternation and sorrow pierced the very heart of these Catholics, oppressing them with forebodings as to the next assault which might be made upon all they held sacred, even to the extremity of an attack upon God's altar itself. The instance of this educator I have cited may seem an extraordinary one, and yet it can be understood that an easy tolerance for, and positive enjoyment of, such dramas as "Androcles and the Lion," "Pygmalion" and "Fanny's First Play" can, in many cases, make for a complacent and admiring acceptance of "Marie-Odile." As to "Fanny's First Play" it need only be noted that the one sensible and attractive personality, as drawn by the author, is that of an abandoned woman. In "Pygmalion," we are asked to laugh, and we are so inoculated with a poisonous virus that we do laugh, at one Alfred Doolittle who, to quote Shaw, "seems equally free from fear and conscience"; one called by his dutiful daughter an old liar "touching" people for money to get drunk on. This reprobate, who is made to say he can't afford to have morals, offers to sell his daughter for £50. Instead of being kicked down stairs he is treated with mirth and banter, the audience obligingly contributing to the effectiveness of the situation which Shaw has contrived their quota of unrestrained laughter. It was not alone a Jesuit Father who took exception to "Androcles and the Lion." The Parents' League, an influential body of society people whose children attend the fashionable private schools in this city, recalled a bulletin commending this play, and for reasons as applicable to older folk as to their children. The Sun and Evening Post, neither to be accused of pro-Catholic, not to say pro-Christian, proclivities, had in their issues of January 28, 1915, these respective comments:

> If Christianity's most solemn legends are not openly ridiculed as the martyrs await their appearance in the arena, it would be difficult to decide what the sense of the act is.
>
> It is full of humorous ideas and sparkles with many felicitous phrases, but, much of the humor is of the cheap kind, associated with irreverent and exceedingly obvious mockery.

Shaw has published one of his interminable prefaces to "Androcles and the Lion," punctuated here and there by a blasphemous utterance. I use the word "blasphemous" in the old, literal, Catholic sense though it may seem rude and blunt to the ears of the more sophisticated. Finally, may I direct the attention of the correspondent to AMERICA and of all Catholic students of the drama to the quotation which I again find in the Catholic World, in an article on "The Faculty of Moral Indignation" by Dr. Kerby of the Catholic University of America?

> The baneful extremes to which the sense of humor has gone in American life, helps to paralyze the sense of moral indignation against evil. All forms of it which take on the appearance of humor and offer occasions for a smile, seem to escape condemnation for the sake of laughter. Our sense of humor respects neither the elementary decencies of life nor the finer loyalty to high ideals that reconciles us to life. A cursory examination of much conversation and of the literature of humor will show us how far we have gone on the way of laughing at evil instead of weeping for it. Nothing enjoys the right of sanctuary against the spirit of our humor. It inundates our souls, breeds indifference to ideals, disintegrates convictions, destroys moral sensibilities and makes us flippant to a degree.

This is well worth the consideration of all students of the drama.

New York. ALFRED YOUNG.

National Greatness

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You printed, in AMERICA for April 8, a portion of Cardinal Luçon's Pastoral Letter, in which he calls upon the French episcopate to unite in a "national crusade of prayer" in order to bring France back to the Faith. In his Lenten Pastoral, Monseigneur Marty, Bishop of Marseilles, also speaks of the need of restoring in France the rights and privileges which have been lost to the Church. He says:

> In order to restore the rights of God in our country, it is necessary to believe literally in the words of the Lord's Prayer, "Thy Kingdom Come." We must believe that the reign of God should extend as a supreme dominion over all created things upon the earth, but especially over mankind; we must believe that a nation lives, prospers and grows greater in the measure in which it accepts the reign of God; that it degenerates and dissolves according as it rejects Him, and dies when it has banished Him altogether.

These words express the spirit and almost repeat the text of a similar warning of General Washington who refers to "the Divine Founder of our blessed religion without an humble imitation of whose virtues we can never hope to be a happy nation."

Cincinnati. M. L. S.

The First St. Patrick's Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of March 25 there appeared a communication from J. D. H., in which the writer said that to his native Baltimore belongs the distinction of the first St. Patrick's church in America. The date he assigns in proof of his statement is 1809. In his own words I will say that, "this is not correct history," for to the diocese of Portland, Maine, belongs the honor. The Rev. Father Cheverus, afterwards Bishop of Boston, celebrated Mass in a lumber-shed owned by Matthew Cottrill, the first Catholic settler of Damariscotta, Maine, in 1797, which shed or barn, was transformed into a well-appointed chapel and served as such, under the name of St. Patrick, until 1803, when it was replaced by the present beautiful brick church, St. Patrick's, in which Mass was said by the Fathers Cheverus and Romagné in 1804. It was not dedicated until 1808, but it bore the name of St. Patrick from the first. Having attended the place over thirty years ago and as I was pastor of the church for six years a quarter of a century ago, I know whereof I speak, both from documentary evidence and from living tradition, for I conversed with those who knew the first settlers and the history of the place. See also John Gilmary Shea, Vol. II, pages 437-612 and following. St. Patrick's, Damariscotta, has also the distinction of being the oldest standing Catholic church in New England.

Orono, Me. J. M. H.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The little Pennsylvania town of Carlisle challenges Baltimore's claim to the honor of having the first congregation in the United States organized under the patronage of St. Patrick. This claim also is founded on the authority of Dr. John Gilmary Shea, who in his "Life of Archbishop Carroll," (p. 292) says:

> At the old Catholic center, Conewago, the energetic Rev. James Pellentz was still laboring. . . . Writing to the Prefect-Apostolic, he mentions that he had aided the Rev. Mr. Geissler to purchase a house in Carlisle, "to keep service in." . . . This was the foundation of the mission at Carlisle under the Rev. Lucas Geissler. The first chapel is said to have been a log-house on Pomfret Street, and it was used by the Catholics till the present church of St. Patrick was completed in 1806.

Fathers Pellentz and Geissler were among the zealous pioneer Jesuit missionaries who worked among the Catholics of Western Pennsylvania and followed Father Wapeler who began his labors at Conewago in 1741. Evidently the log-house chapel at Carlisle was used for a sufficient number of years before 1806, the local tradition is from the year 1779, to entitle us to claim seniority over Baltimore. Father Pellentz erected also the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Conewago, the first, according to Dr. Shea, of that title in the United States. Its cornerstone was laid in 1786, and the structure was finished the following year.

Carlisle, Pa. F. X. W.

Consumers' League Garments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If shoppers would demand garments bearing the Consumers' League label, they would greatly help the cause of poor factory girls. This label guarantees that the garment, to which it is attached, was made under sanitary conditions, and that in its manufacture State Factory Laws in regard to wages, etc., were complied with. If enough people could be induced to refuse to accept any garments except those bearing this label, a great step would be made toward the disappearance of the sweat shops, with their menace to health through infection by contagious diseases and their many other evils. The good that the Consumers' League is doing is not generally known.

Pueblo, Col. CLAIRE GALLIGAN.

Catholics and Public Libraries

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Much has been written and said of late on the dissemination of Catholic literature. My experience leads me to believe that Catholics are very wanting in interest in the matter. As librarian of one of the public libraries of the Middle West, I have an opportunity of knowing how wide is the circulation of Catholic books in most communities, and my deliberate judgment, based on a good deal of observation, is that Catholic literature is not read to any great extent by our people. In fact whatever demand there is for it comes, for the most part, from our Protestant friends and patrons. The fault does not lie with the library officials. The public library in the city, from which I write, is governed by a board, composed of nine members, of whom eight are Protestants and one a Catholic. We have a very fair collection of Catholic books, besides the "Catholic Encyclopedia" and publications such as AMERICA. To this collection additions are constantly being made, and the new Catholic books are advertised like others. My position enables me to recommend them to our people, but I must confess that in nine cases out of ten my efforts to get them read prove unavailing. Many of our Catholic young people know nothing of the works of such persons as John B. Tabb, Francis Thompson, Robert Hugh Benson, Agnes Repplier and Alice Meynell; and what is more, are not even aware of the fact that they were or are Catholics. This is a shame. Our Catholics should read them. Why is it that they do not? Where does the fault lie?

Iowa City. M. M.

Catholics in Prisons

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A recent issue of AMERICA dealt with the religious census of Joliet Prison. It appears that publications hostile to the Church tried to make it out that the vast majority of the inmates are Catholics. I should like to say something of the conditions prevailing in the penitentiary at Frankfort, Kentucky; for having been connected with the institution in an official capacity for the past four years, I am in a position to state facts. On May 1, 1916, there were 1,512 names on the prison list. Of these not a single woman was a Catholic, and only twenty of the male prisoners were Catholics, one-half of this number being negroes. Among the white Catholic inmates one never finds, to use the term employed by reformers, "an habitual." The Catholic prisoners are generally men who have held good positions, and have had a good education and considerable training. Extravagance frequently has led them to embezzle. As a class, they are very tractable and truly penitent. The negro Catholic inmates are also far above the ordinary prisoner in conduct and intellect, and this is especially true of those who have attended the parochial schools. The one bright light in the prison gloom is the weekly visit of the nuns who come every Sunday to instruct inmates and to distribute Catholic literature. Copies of AMERICA, even when old, are read with avidity. Readers of Catholic publications would greatly help their unfortunate coreligionists, if they would give the papers and magazines they have read, to the societies that see to their distribution in various institutions.

Frankfort, Ky. P. J. MULKEM.

A Correction

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to call your attention to a misstatement in the review of Dr. Badé's book, "The Old Testament in the Light of Today," which appeared in AMERICA for May 6. The book has not been introduced as a text-book in the University of California.

Berkeley, Cal. THOMAS LANTRY O'NEILL, C.S.P.

Proper Ecclesiastical Titles

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The ecclesiastical documents published by the Catholic Record Society of Ireland under the name of "Archivium Hibernicum" show that the title "Father" was not unknown in Ireland as early as the seventeenth century. Thus in "A Particular Acct. of the Romish Clergy of the Diocese of Dublin, March 2, 1697-8" we find that "Father Dempsey, Parish Priest of St. Michan's, is said to be a Titular Bishop and lodges at my Lady Clanmaluras in ye said parish" (A. H. iv, 80n). In a "Report of the State of Popery in Ireland in 1731," the term is applied to both regulars and the secular clergy (A. H. iii, 156). It occurs also in the wills of Bishop Theophilus MacCartan of Down and Connor, dated Sept. 20, 1777 (A. H. i, 175), Archbishop Francis Burke of Tuam, August, 1723 (A. H. ii, 220), and twenty-five times in that of Dr. James Phelan, Bishop of Ossory, dated July 1, 1693 (A. H. iv, 85).

New York. ANDREW A. MACERLEAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 8d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Investigators and Persecutors

ON the morning of April 28, 1916, Dr. J. N. McCormick, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Western Michigan, M. W. Jopling, W. H. Loutit, Mayor of Grand Haven, and Stewart Hanley, formerly Judge of the Probate Court of Detroit, appeared "without previous notice" at the gate of the Detroit House of the Good Shepherd. These gentlemen, of whom but one, Mr. Hanley, is a Catholic, constitute the Michigan State Board of Correction and Charities. Their purpose was to make, by request of the Rt. Rev. John Foley, D.D., Bishop of Detroit, "a thorough examination of the institution," which for some years has been the object of a vicious persecution, engineered by certain ignorant or malicious inhabitants of the Michigan metropolis. "Full and complete opportunity was given," reads the official report of this visitation, "to inspect the records, examine the inmates, and visit all the buildings and departments. A score or more of the inmates, chosen at random, were examined privately, and apart from anyone officially connected with the institution."

The results were distinctly disappointing to the misguided individuals who, with rare and unsuspected bravery, had openly preferred charges against the institution before the State Board. Two recommendations of a minor character were made by the investigators; one regarding a single room which was not well ventilated, the other, directing that fire drills be held more frequently. Other results are thus recorded in the official report:

> Every room in the institution was carefully inspected and found to be almost immaculately clean.

This comment would not please certain New York "investigators." It would merely prove that the rooms were never used.

> The discipline was excellent, while the attitude of the girls was most cheerful. There is no corporal punishment of any kind. . . . The girls all appeared healthy and well-fed. None, upon inquiry, had any complaint to make about either quantity or quality of food. The storerooms and kitchens verify this. . . .

The banal charge that Houses of the Good Shepherd are "nothing but jails" is thus disposed of by the State Board:

> The spirit of the place is remarkable. There is nothing that would indicate to a stranger a reformatory. During the recreation periods the girls enjoyed themselves in much the same manner as girls outside. Upon inquiry the only complaints made by the inmates were from some there under commitment who expressed a desire to return home. In the laundry many were singing while at work. During the recreation periods, we found groups around several pianos, one of the number playing, the rest singing. The younger children were engaged in the usual childish games. There appears to be the greatest affection between the girls and the Sisters.

In conclusion, the investigators write their unanimous opinion:

> The Board is unanimously of the opinion, after a searching examination, that the charges and complaints are unfounded, that the institution is doing a most commendable work and is conducted in a praiseworthy manner. The Board does, therefore, express its approval of the purpose of the institution and its methods of operation.

The document is merely another proof that Catholic institutions have nothing to fear except from pagan sociologists, the evil-minded, and "investigators" with an axe to grind. Further comment is superfluous, except to remark that there is an essential distinction between a persecutor and an investigator. In New York, for instance, the difference is not universally understood.

Peace and the Sword

THAT the Catholic Church is a sower of discord, is a reproach as old as Christianity. It is a reproach deserved, but a reproach that is her glory. Not to all is the Cross of Christ, a symbol of peace; to the Jew it is a stumbling block, to the gentile, foolishness. "Think not," proclaimed the Prince of Peace, "that I am come to send peace upon the earth. I came not to send peace but the sword." In the moment when like wild dogs His enemies encompassed Him, He who had refused twelve legions of angelic defenders, again opened His mouth in Divine contradiction. "He that hath not," said Christ, who had called peacemakers the children of God, "let him sell his coat and buy a sword."

Even in apparent contradiction, the Church follows her Master. She sanctifies the tenderest relations of man and woman, and about the home she casts the glory and the strength of love. But she recognizes that there is a higher ideal, for which they who are called, must leave father, mother, and all that in imperfect human hearts is made beautiful by the throbbing of noble affection. Because of this yet more perfect way, discord, like the sword which Christ urged upon His followers, has cut across the peace of countless homes. "I will go forth from my father's house into a strange land," says the young man, accepting the call of Christ. "The spirit and the bride say: come." And though the invitation may "make tender Aprils" of a daughter's eyes, yet "Surely, I come quickly" is her answer as leaving all she turns to Christ: "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus." The sword of Christ has fallen again. For the Catholic Church that would lose a kingdom to defend the sanctity of even one poor home, counsels the breaking of all home-ties, if by the breaking some chosen boy or girl may more securely walk with Christ.

It is all a kind of Divine paradox. He who came to draw all men to Himself was likewise a sign of contradiction, a scandal and a failure. His dwelling with us should have been the dawn of spring in all hearts, yet to many it has brought the chill winter of discontent. But to men of good will, it is not a paradox that mocks. There is a peace that is of God; there is a peace that is not of God, but of the world. Christ scorned the peace that the world giveth; against it, He set the sword of truth and justice. God's peace brings with it the sword that pierces many hearts, but the peace of the world, for comfort's sake, makes compromise with error and injustice. Herein is the paradox made clear. Peace must spring from truth and justice. Else it is not the peace that through many tribulations binds the heart to the feet of God, but delusion.

The New York "Post" and the Philippine Bill

AN excellent example of indirect accusation occurs in the New York Evening Post for May 8. The Post is a frequent sinner in this respect, especially whenever the Catholic Church is concerned. The subject was the Philippine Independence Bill, and in headlines as glaring as this somewhat stodgy publication permits on its inner pages, the Post solemnly informs its pantalooned and bespectacled readers that "Catholics Helped Kill the Philippine Bill." With this statement no fault is to be found. Certain members of Congress who are Catholics did, it appears, help to kill the bill; Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and members of "the Big Church," also participated in the slaughter. Nevertheless, the reader is prepared for a development of the insinuation contained in the headline, and he finds it quickly, "Leaders Warned Beforehand of Church Opposition." The emphasis has shifted from "Catholics" to the Church; logic of a piece with the conclusion, that the Post would be guilty of treason were its cubbiest reporter to adhere to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort. Of course, the Post offers proof in the body of the article, and it may be conveniently arranged under three heads:

(1.) Of the thirty Democrats who voted against the bill, twenty-eight or twenty-nine were Catholics.

(2.) Of the 164 Democrats who voted for the bill, only two or three were Catholics.

(3.) "One member of Congress," religious affiliation not stated, "who voted against the bill, in a moment of indiscretion remarked that certain Church dignitaries wanted the bill killed. He mentions names, too"; the estemed Post does not follow this praiseworthy example.

The conclusion to be drawn from this weighty mass of evidence, is that twenty-eight or twenty-nine Catholics voted against the bill, and that two or three voted for its passage. In the logic of the Post, this Falstaffian army of twenty-eight or twenty-nine, flanked by the hidden battery of "certain Church dignitaries," marshaled by an unknown but indiscreet Congressman, constitutes the Catholic Church, and speaks for it with authority.

The Post needs either a new headliner or a new Washington correspondent. More than either, it needs a sense of humor.

The Audibly Devout

"REAL fervor in prayer is so rare a grace," the sapient Abbot Smaragdus once observed, "that those who have merited it should in all charity and lowliness conceal their good-fortune from their less happy neighbors. For when cold-hearted, worldly-minded men, who go to church merely from a low sense of duty, are forced, while there, to be ear-witnesses of a fellow-Catholic's tender devotion, such a throng of wicked, envious thoughts surge up in the hearts of these graceless wights that the audible fervor of the worshiper actually becomes to his weaker brethren a proximate occasion of sin."

Thus far Smaragdus: and how just the cenobite's observation is let those patient thousands judge on whom the audibly devout have unwittingly inflicted suffering. For who has not encountered at Mass and Benediction the noisily fervent Catholic? She is equipped as a rule with a rosary bearing divers unmelodious medals that rattle in her nervous fingers. She is so fond of emphasizing the S's in the words of the prayers she repeats that the sound of sibilation suggests serpents being driven out of Eden by her strong petitions. Or perhaps our audibly devout neighbor, out of a praiseworthy ambition to accompany the sacrificing priest, feverously turns over the crisp pages of her Missal in a mad search for the Collect or the Secret of the day, and when she at last finds it, widespread is the congregation's rejoicing.

Fervent worshipers who give audible and visible expression to their contrition by thumping their chests right soundly when the sanctus-bell rings out have been known to awake thereby the wrath of less demonstrative but more rubrical fellow-Catholics. Perhaps a place in the catalogue of the audibly devout should also be found for the numberless members of the venerable order of "shinglers." So eager are they to have their petitions reach Heaven before those of others, that in reciting even the Church's public prayers fervent shinglers easily outstrip both priest and people, and where congregational singing is practised they are generally two notes ahead of the other men and women.

It is not at all clear, however, just what can be done to ameliorate the condition of those ill-starred Catholics whose hearts the audibly devout have filled with envy and bitterness. Perhaps the latter could be brought to realize practically the superior advantages of mental over vocal prayer, or they could even be taught an orthodox and innocent kind of quietism. Old-fashioned courtesy and consideration for others should lead some of the offenders, no doubt, to moderate in public their transports of devotion. But for chronic cases there would seem to be no effective remedy save the revival of the obsolete Order of Anchorites and Anchoresses. Then all who cannot pray quietly in church could perhaps be induced to seek the solitude of a hermitage and send up from thence their sonorous orisons without disturbing their less fervent neighbors.

Working Conditions and Accidents

THE annual number of industrial accidents in our country has often been compared to the casualty lists of the war. Dr. E. R. Hayhurst, a specialist on accident statistics, rates the number of deaths from preventable causes at 250,000 yearly; the California Industrial Accident Commission places the total of industrial accidents in that State, during the year 1914, at 62,211, and according to official reports three persons are killed and 150 injured every day in the State of Pennsylvania. Many of these accidents are evidently due to employees themselves, though we can hardly suppose that these hundreds of thousands of persons who can least afford to lose time and money rush blindly into serious danger. Yet even where they are actually guilty of negligence it is to the interest of employers that occasions of such mishaps, as well as of all others, should be carefully removed. A conviction is gradually growing that sound economic principles, no less than charity or philanthropy, dictate that the workingman be kept in good condition. Thus, after introducing into his mills the best possible machinery, the General Manager of the Ray Stocking Mills Co. of Manchester, N. H., urges the necessity of caution upon his men, in language that might have been inspired by the oriental imagination of a Rabindranath Tagore:

> Be careful. The most important safety device is care. I can replace broken machinery but I cannot replace you. Nothing on earth can smile but man. Gems may flash reflected light, but what is a diamond-flash compared to an eye-flash and a mirth-flash? Flowers cannot smile; this is the charm that even they cannot claim. It is the prerogative of man; it is the color which love wears, and cheerfulness and joy—these three. A face that cannot smile is like a bud that cannot blossom, and dries up on the stalk. Laughter is day and sadness is night and a smile is the twilight that hovers gently between both—more bewitching than either.

In itself this effusion is laughable, but it bears with it the significant and consoling fact that workmen have begun to count for much with their employers. There was a day when this was not true; output at the least possible expense was the only concern in many shops.

Cheap labor was a sure consequence of such a policy. And in the end cheap labor under untoward conditions proves most expensive. Unskilful men, tired men, sick men, who work long hours over rickety machinery cannot be a source of lasting profit. Their work will be inferior, accidents will be frequent, and the greedy employer will find his coveted gold slipping rapidly through his fingers. A recent issue of the Square Deal emphasized this fact when it declared that "advanced superintendents are now beginning to realize that the workmen are just as important as the equipment, and everything which will keep them in top-notch condition is provided." This is economic wisdom: done from a high motive it becomes Christian charity, a saving virtue which alone can solve the numerous problems arising out of our industrial life.

The American Bible Society Centenary

THE American Bible Society has just completed a century of endeavor, and throughout the country there has been ringing a chorus of congratulation. Almost the only voice not heard is that of the Catholic Church. As a consequence many have been wondering why it is that the Church, which has devoted and is devoting the best talent of its members to the preservation and diffusion of the Word of God, has been so conspicuously silent on the success which has attended the efforts of so many clergymen and laymen to put the Sacred Text in the hands of the nations of the world. Not only this. In addition to its silence, which under the circumstances, is naturally and properly construed as disapprobation, the Church has frequently expressed its opposition to the Bible Societies. What is the reason for this attitude of hostility?

The first reason is that the American Bible Society, from its very inception, has raised the standard of revolt. The Church, from the time of the Council of Trent, has repeatedly forbidden that any versions of the Sacred Scriptures should be printed without the sanction and approval of the Bishops or the Apostolic See. As the Divinely appointed custodian and interpreter of revealed truth, she has striven to keep the Word of God pure and undefiled, and has accordingly jealously guarded it from change, interpolation, omission and mistranslation. In order to attain this purpose she has insisted that all translations be submitted to her tribunal for approval. The American Bible Society has refused to recognize the existence of this law. Unauthorized and unguided by an authoritative teaching body this association has during the past century, promoted the translation of the Scriptures into 164 languages and has, also, distributed 119,000,000 Bibles. And in every copy, thus translated or distributed, there have been passages more or less tinctured with dogmatic error; from every copy, too, whole books of the Sacred Text have been omitted. How then could the Church congratulate any society on such an achievement?

Besides the Church wishes by her opposition to emphasize her entire disapproval of the underlying principle which is the motive force of all the activity of the Bible Societies. It is a cardinal Protestant principle that the Scriptures are the one and all-sufficient rule of faith, that the individual reading of the Bible, without assistance from notes or commentaries, is the sure guide to revealed religious truth. Not such is the doctrine of the Church, which has always held that the Scriptures are a supplementary, not the primary, and much less the exclusive, source of Revelation; that Christ's doctrines, in the economy He Himself established, were to be conveyed to the world by the preaching of the Apostles and their successors; and that Holy Writ is to be interpreted, not at the individual reader's pleasure, but strictly, in accordance with the sense of living tradition which has come down unbroken from the Apostles. This doctrine the American Bible Society denies; in its opinion each reader may interpret the Bible as he thinks best. Such a process gives rise to wrong conceptions of the meaning of the Bible, a result which is the more inevitable because of the false interpretation of passages concerned with important dogmas. In a word, the activity of the American Bible Society, by its very nature and of set purpose, spreads heresy. Such a movement, as is clear, the Church cannot in any way approve.

LITERATURE

Robert Hugh Benson*

MONSIGNOR ROBERT HUGH BENSON was unusual progeny for an Anglican Primate, as Father Martindale in another way is an unusual son of St. Ignatius. The combination makes a distinctive and fascinating book. Father Martindale has worked out the multi-colored patterns of this Life rather like a beautiful Turkey carpet—in compartments. The woof is stuffed and illumined with bright critiques, pleasant padding, exciting excursions, quaint undertones and no slight psychological insight. It is the most refreshing Church literature the reviewer can remember.

As a variant to the subject, we glean a great deal from the biography which is on a very high level of Catholic writing. In fact the contrast makes one feel regret that Benson so often wrote second-rate. Father Martindale brings out his literary defects as gently and properly as he sifts and excuses the weaknesses of his temperament. But his touch is velvet. The work is not so much a record or dry summary of Benson's life as a series of excursions into literature and temperament.

Not unpleasant are courtierly letters of Randal, Archbishop of Canterbury. Like many Anglicans he looked on Hugh Benson as a spoilt child and possibly as a prodigal son for whom the fatted calf might one day steam the Lambeth chimneys. In early days, when Hugh wished to become an Anglican monk, the Primate was "keenly interested," and in a typical sentence speaks of the correspondence of Ritualist training with his own views as "really a minor though a most important subject"! So also in the Anglican compromise is the Virgin Birth or the Divinity of Christ "a minor though most important subject."

Benson's life was always sheltered: as a child behind the walls of Lambeth Palace, as a scholar in the Eton cloisters, as his father's son at Cambridge. Guarded he was but not always guided. He was liable to behave as he was treated: like a child! There was just a touch of boyish wilfulness in his becoming a Catholic. He must have enjoyed the situation and apparently the Anglican Church forgave him. There is no bitterness in the book, except some anti-Papal hysterics from Bishop Wordsworth. There was no home break for Hugh. His bibliofusive elder brother Arthur, an incomparably charming old mother, and a tedious nurse follow him through the whole two volumes of biography. Like an ecclesiastical Peter Pan, he never seemed to grow up.

Father Martindale restrains himself from painting the situation of father and son in comic relief, content to notice that there was no "radical and total schism of temperaments" between them. But Archbishop Benson reminds one of a dear old fussy Anglican hen, who took a duckling down to the shallow waters of Ritualism to sip, and who, had he survived, would have been aghast to see Hugh swim away Romeward. Hugh, it is interesting to learn, always said Mass for his father's soul and in a frank moment gave him about five minutes purgatory!

It was to the Dominicans that Benson turned to pull him aboard the Church. There followed a period of hectic study and mental convalescence at Rome, and after being priested within a year of his reception into the Church, the neophyte returned conquering and to conquer! But a severe check was imposed. His new Archbishop simply forbade him to exercise his ministry publicly for a year. It was a discipline better and wiser than the hairshirt. At Llandaff House he learnt to restrain and equally to express himself. Here Benson received full liberty, silent meals, severe criticism for immature writing, and a sound working idea of what the Church can do and cannot do in England. Here he conceived his mission to combat the conventionalism, pharisaism and materialism of the University. When the year was up, he entered the pulpit and, with biretta perched on his boyish brow and gaudy stole about him, he railed and ridiculed, mystified, stupified, pleaded and wept. But he made the University listen, and Llandaff House became a hive of Bensonians, who looked to him to found a new Order. The Order of Friar Novelists was at one time suggested.

Father Martindale is wise in not proving his hero a saint, for he leaves him no less lovable. He picks out "a certain basic weakness" and tenderly develops his theory as to the Bensonian temperament. Even his loneliness was never "the solitude of the Saints." He lived nearer to excitement than to ecstasy. A "certain externality of mind," while it made him a novelist, prevented him from becoming a Jesuit or a contemplative. He was too buoyant and artistic ever to become meditative or mortified in the uttermost sense. He struggled fiercely for self-expression and felt all the joys of artistic creation. Father Martindale even detects "a layer of hardness" which he used in self-protection of his delicate and sensitive gifts. He was troubled between his sacerdotal duty of being all things to all men and yet keeping his artistic soul alive.

Besides his priesthood he felt a real call to write books pro Ecclesia. He was deeply fond of colors, vestments, sunsets, fancies, flowers and all that make the artist's heaven, though not the ascetic's. In fine, he cared intensely for many things—call them his whims, his toys, his hobby-horses—for he brought them like a child with him into the Church. "At the foot of Peter's throne he plays like the Innocents on the altar steps," says his biographer.

*The Life of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson. By C. C. Martindale, S.J. 2 Vols. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $5.00.

Hugh Benson was no saint, and to spite the ladies who insisted on his supernatural piety, and proved such a trial to him, and doubtless to his biographer, he slipped the word peccator into his epitaph. He could not be a saint because he got too much fun out of life, but he was the next best thing, a child! He always remained afraid of the dark and the dentist. He preferred ghosts to scholastic logic to buttress his belief in the unseen. His was "the summons of the weird." But in hilarious moments the universe seemed a Divine "movie-show" as of God at play with himself. He cried out: "Oh, my dear, isn't it all tremendous? Isn't it sport? Isn't it all huge fun?" So it is sometimes. During the years of his Cambridge apostolate he would seem as radiant as an orthodox Apollo one moment and like a petulant boy the next, when a favorite toy goes wrong. An incident not in the book gave us great amusement. Hugh had once solemnly blessed the new house of a Catholic pair in order to impress a Protestant neighborhood. Soon afterwards they left, incidentally leaving the "blest" furniture unpaid for! Benson was hugely mortified, but the Bensonians agreed that it was "somehow all very Roman Catholic."

There is very little omitted from the book, though Benson's relations with his Archbishop are barely touched upon. It would have been interesting to bring out the contrast between the fervid and emotional dreamer and the keenly logical (may we say artistically ascetic?) Cardinal who still rules Westminster. The discipline the Cardinal laid on him was galling, but it was wise. The Bensonians felt sore that "Archie" (Bensonian for Archbishop) was warring against converts, but in the end all came to recognize a keener-sighted and more generous man than they thought. If Benson and his Cardinal did not always understand each other, it was typical that Benson should leave him his house and playthings in his will, and that the Cardinal should go a long journey in order to bury him in the rose-garden where he would lie, for of such is the Catholic religion.

And Hugh Benson dying at the outbreak of war was as sudden, symbolic and sympathetic as his whole self. Perhaps it was a little careless to his friends and perhaps it was not altogether inartistic. But before the blasts of Armageddon he flickered out like a sanctuary lamp, and neither he nor his friends could be really ungrateful to Death, the Snuffer. To follow death must have been far sweeter to him than to follow the war. And the quest of the supernatural, which he had followed all his life—and been so disappointed at never seeing a ghost or finding a stigmatic—was fulfilled as he died. The very night that he passed away in the grimy Midlands it befell that the Bishop of Menevia slept in the bed wherein Hugh was accustomed to sleep at the Benedictine monastery of Caldey, and behold it was revealed to the Bishop in a dream that Hugh had died that night, all of which was a sign and a symbol to the good monks. And so, like a figure of the medieval ages, which he had wished to re-live in modern England, passed away Robertus Hugo Benson, sacerdos Catholicæ et Romanæ Ecclesiæ, Peccator Expectans ad Revelationem Filiorum Dei. SHANE LESLIE.

REVIEWS

Leçons de Logique; Leçons de Morale; Leçons de Psychologie et de Theodicée. Par ABBÉ A. ROBERT. Quebec: Imp. de l'Action Sociale Limitée. $0.50 le volume.

Histoire de la Philosophie. Par ABBÉ A. ROBERT. Quebec: La Flamme & Proulx. $0.75.

These four books or manuals of Catholic philosophy are commendable from many standpoints, but chiefly because they have popularized and show how to popularize in other languages the essentials of the system of rational and practical thinking of which the Church can boast she has been the custodian throughout the centuries. They are not treatises but simple lessons of philosophy adapted to the capacity and the needs not of graduates from the college or of students of the university, but to those of youths still in the high school or academy. Statistics will doubtless show that at most, only a small percentage of those who are graduated from secondary schools continue their studies in the college. Of the other large proportion many go to schools of medicine or of law, while all have been sufficiently educated to take an interest in all subjects that are current in magazines or newspapers. In most if not all of our high schools these graduates receive no inkling of the laws of logic except through the medium of a debating society, and their training in ethical thought or in the elements of psychology is limited by the covers of a catechism. By such manuals as these under review, much could be done in the formation and the information of high-school students along lines of simple and practical philosophy. Though complete treatment of the different subjects is, of course, beyond the scope of these manuals, yet clear and positive assertion of the essential tenets can be supported by sound and convincing reasons, and the pupils can be fitted to meet with a critical and discerning mind many philosophical questions that come up in their reading.

One particular quality in these books should be emphasized; it is their condensation. This has been brought to the perfection of an art and of an art that conceals itself, for while the author has omitted the pursuit of the useless and the urging of the obvious, yet every topic of worth seems to be adequately treated. The Catholic doctrine on suicide, for example, is not only set forth clearly, but all of the popular fallacies frequently urged in favor of suicide are fairly exposed and then convincingly demolished. All of these manuals with the exception of the volume "Histoire de la Philosophie" have reached their second edition and that one will doubtless share the same good fortune, for it bears the marks of clarity, practicality, interest and proportion that are evident in the other manuals. J. P. M.

Counter-Currents. By AGNES REPPLIER, Litt.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

In this attractive volume, Miss Repplier has gathered up, lest they be lost, nine essays that appeared in the Atlantic Monthly during the past three years. In these essays we see the kindly, witty and cultured spirit of the author cropping out at every turn, but it is when she is thinking least of the present European conflict that she is at her best. Though advertised as a book giving Miss Repplier's "impressions of the war and of issues arising from the war," most of the essays have to do with conditions that have little or no connection with the war, for they ante-dated it, and in part, at least, bid fair to be corrected by it. In the "Cost of Modern Sentiment," "Our Loss of Nerve," "The Repeal of Reticence" and above all, "Popular Education," the author lays bare in her genial but incisive way, some of the fallacies and follies that have been afflicting the so-called thinking circles of America. Parents and school teachers will applaud many of her strictures upon the prevalent educational policy of "molly-coddling" and enfeebling our youth. "The Modest Immigrant," while containing much that is incontrovertible, leaves one wondering just to which Indian tribe Miss Repplier belongs. The essays touching on the great conflict, which are supposed to give the volume its timeliness and chief spice, many will probably find the least-convincing pages in the book. The dozen or more volumes of high literary value which Miss Repplier has written during the past thirty years have deservedly won for her a distinguished place in American letters. To her fellow-Catholics especially, this should be very gratifying.

J. F. X. M.

Songs and Satires. By EDGAR LEE MASTERS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

London, One November. By HELEN MACKAY. New York: Duffield & Co. $1.25.

Verse. By ADELAIDE CROPSEY. Rochester: The Manas Press. $1.00.

In the chorus of praise that greeted the appearance of "The Spoon River Anthology," it would be hard to find a single voice, outside a certain set, that called the author a poet. "Powerful," "vitriolic," "kaleidoscopic," "tragic,"—and let us add, "indecent,"—all that those sketches might have been; but "poetry" they were called by very few. In his new book, however, Mr. Masters has definitely challenged the world as a poet, for here we have between two covers both forms, the "legitimate" one of poetry, and some vaudevillian vers libre. What are their qualities? A mediocre sense of poetic values, and among their positive defects, poor rhymes, frequent bathos, halting lines and a "realism" that verges constantly on the ugly—physical and moral. He has a genuine power, however, of satire and invective, a gift for dramatic character-sketching, and he can rise occasionally to pure passion. Pessimism, black and unrelieved, stalks through Mr. Master's pages, and lewdness is depicted in all shades of suggestiveness, from the vague to the vivid. His cynicism will be taken by the shallow-minded as something deep and new, whereas it is only the oldest of sophisms, and when he touches a sacred subject he become blasphemous.

In her new book, Helen MacKay offers a series of pictures of varying merit, wholly in vers libre, of London and Paris in war-time. Using her form skilfully, she gives the reader vague sensations of the changes in the two cities. As to the form itself, clearly it cannot be judged by the usual standards of poetry. It has without any doubt, the form, rhythm and often the thought of prose. Call it poetry, if your theory permits it, but by no stretch of imagination can it be called verse, the essence of which is meter, or at the least, recurrent rhythm. But there is absolutely no meter, and what rhythm she affects, is essentially the rhythm of prose. For example:

> The white arc-moons showed the houses asleep, > and made them very strange,
> as if they could not be houses that people lived in.

Save for the purely accidental and artificial form of short and long lines, this is prose; poetry prose, if you will, but still prose. But even in this broader sense of the word poetry, vers libre frequently falls short, it seems cursed with a fatal tendency to bathos. Thus at the end of "Things in Paris," we find:

> The children romp at recess in frozen gardens.
> The old crones go into the churches, > where it is warm, and there are candles.

The vers libre writers will probably go down in history as a set that rediscovered the rhythm of prose, and mistaking that for poetry, cut it up into lines with plenty of libre, and precious little vers.

The little posthumous book by Adelaide Cropsey, much too high-priced, by the way, for its worth, is chiefly remarkable for "an original verse-form," the "quintain," consisting of five lines of two and three feet, encasing thoughts for the most part trivial and obvious. The other verse in the book is delicate and gently turned, far removed from the "passionate revolt" announced in the foreword.

J. W. P.

The Onion Peelers. Being the Early History of Sir Albert Jenkins, Kt., One of His Majesty's Judges of the Court of King's Bench. By R. P. GARROLD. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.60.

Under this rather unenlightening title, the Rev. Richard P. Garrold, S.J., the well-known author of a triad of superior boy-stories, has again entered the literary field. "The Onion Peelers" is the tale of a poor boy with a foolish, fond mother and a vain, drunken father, and of the various vicissitudes that mark his career from early school life until, despite his unpromising start, he achieves an Oxford education. Though the setting of the story is completely English, the author has such a grasp of boy-psychology that he has been able to produce a book that, notwithstanding the strangeness of its machinery, will hold and interest the American no less than the British reader. One excellent feature of the book, an excellence it shares with the author's previous stories, is its appeal to the adult as well as to the juvenile mind. Father Garrold's books are written not merely to amuse and benefit the boy-world; they have as an equal aim the opening of the eyes of parents and schoolmasters to the true inwardness of boy nature, a thing of the utmost importance to those who deal intimately with boys, if good influences are to be exerted. The fact of the author's being detailed for duty as a military chaplain with the British forces and of his consequent inability to revise the proof-sheets, will excuse the few blemishes of the book.

J. F. X. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who have the praiseworthy custom of practising mental prayer find it stimulating to change their meditation book occasionally. Such persons will be interested in the new two-volume work entitled: "Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith, Together with a Treatise on Mental Prayer, Based on the Work of the Venerable Father Louis de Ponte, S.J." (Benziger, $3.00), which the Rev. C. W. Barraud, S.J., has written. The well-known division of the purgative, illuminative and unitive ways which the great Spanish ascetic follows is adhered to, but no attempt has been made, of course, to imitate his fulness of treatment. The author furnishes considerations for the use of priests, religious, and laymen while on retreat and adds for "colloquial" purposes a collection of hymns and prayers for some of which, notably the Stabat Mater, it would seem that better translations could have been found. A courageous publisher ought to bring out in English a new and complete edition of Father De Ponte's admirable work on mental prayer. For unction, learning, and thoroughness it stands alone.

Stephen Leacock entertainingly discusses in his latest book, "Essays and Literary Studies" (Lane, $1.25), important questions of the day. Our educational system he calls "the golden key which will unlock the door of the temple of learning—not to let the student in but to let him get out." We are anxious to turn pupils out, not careful to educate them. The old traditions handed down from Padua and Bologna when a professor wanted to teach and pupils wanted to learn are gone. "We find saturating our literature, the new worship of the Strong Man, the easy pardon of the Unscrupulous, the Apotheosis of the Jungle, and the Deification of the Detective. Force, brute force is what we now turn to as the moral idea and Mastery and Success are the sole tests of excellence." All this happens too because "the Devil is passing out of fashion."——Taking a Protestant's point of view Estelle Ross contributed a well-written biography of "Oliver Cromwell" (Stokes, $0.75), to a children's "Heroes of All Time" series. The author does not minimize the horrors of the ruthless Puritan's invasion of Ireland but her high estimate of his character is not borne out by the deeds of his life. There is the usual cant about Cromwell's devotion to religious liberty. We are told that he received "with tears" the news of the massacre of the Vaudois, but he seems to have had his emotions under better control when the slaughter of Catholics was going on at Drogheda and Wexford.

Mr. Edward J. O'Brien prepared himself for the publication of "The Best Short Stories of 1915" (Small, Maynard, $1.50), by reading "over twenty-two hundred stories in a critical spirit." Surely, then, criticism has had its due, and the present volume should be reviewed in the spirit of wonder, and with a charity which heralds a virtue while it barely hints a fault. Mary Synon contributes a Lincoln story which is above the average, and in a brief two-hundred words, Mary Boyle O'Reilly vignettes war's ruthlessness and hidden sorrows. Mr. O'Brien's introduction is excellent.——Frances Duncan's novel, "Roberta of Roseberry Gardens" (Doubleday Page, $1.25), raises the question: Are the "Gardens" because of "Roberta" or is "Roberta" because of the "Gardens"? You move among flower-beds through all the seasons of the year and learn much about plants and the culture of nurslings. Two caretakers are at Roseberry: Trommel, whose German philosophy is wicked, and the Dooley-like Michael, who can bud and prune but cannot graft love for his client on the heart of Roberta, for she, as simply as buds to the warmth of spring, responds to another.——In "Viviette" (Lane, $1.00), William J. Locke has written a long short-story with a familiar triangle plot. A coquette keeps two brothers dangling after her until matters come to such a pass that to save the situation she is ready to accept a third suitor she does not love. Even Mr. Locke's pot-boilers have an artistry about them, however, that many a novelist might envy.

During the year 1915 1,500,000 copies of the Catholic Heimatgrüsse an unsere Krieger were sent to the front, the barracks and the hospitals by the War Committee of the Charitas League for Berlin and its suburbs. All the year's numbers are now bound into a single volume (M. Gladbach: Volksvereins-Verlag, M. 4), which is no less interesting than edifying. It is filled with instructive articles that have helped to quicken the faith of the Catholic soldiers. Countless details are given about the war and the nations engaged in it, and special Scriptural prayers are suggested even for the U-boat sailors and the airmen. The former can appropriately use the invocations of Jonas in the belly of the fish; and the latter are offered ejaculations from the Book of Psalms: "O Lord, thy mercy is in heaven, and thy truth reacheth even to the clouds. . . . The children of men shall put their trust under the cover of thy wing."——Another volume of considerable sociological value from the same press, is the practical "Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflege" (80 Pf.) by Johannes Schäfers. It is an outline of welfare work in country places and is intended in particular as a handbook for women's colleges and similar institutions.

Here are some booklets and pamphlets that have lately come to the reviewer's desk: "At the Feet of the Martyrs" (Benziger, $0.35), is a collection of short meditations which "A Nun of Tyburn Convent" has compiled from the devotional writings of the English martyrs. "The Happiness of Duty" (Christian Year Pub. Co., Fort Thomas, Ky., $0.15), is a translation, edited by the Rev. J. M. Lelen, of Bishop Gay's excellent "Treatise on Obedience." From Our Sunday Visitor Press, Huntington, Ind., comes a new and revised edition of Father Noll's valuable pamphlet on "Defamers of the Church" ($0.10), and "The Mass: the Eucharistic Service of the Catholic Church" ($0.15), by the Rev. George Moorman, who explains the Catholic doctrine of the Mass, describes everything used at the altar, and expounds the meaning of all the ceremonies and the prayers that are prescribed by the Missal. A similar little work is Abbé Hallet's "Explanation of the Prayers and Ceremonies of the Mass" (Catholic Truth Society, Brooklyn, $0.15). "The Holy Sacrifice of the Altar" (Pustet, $0.10) is a pamphlet teaching school children methods of hearing Mass, and Father Joseph J. Baierl of St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, has out a new edition of his little book on "The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass Explained in the Form of Question and Answer" ($0.50 and $0.25).

"Learning to Earn" (Bobbs-Merrill, $1.25), by John A. Lapp and Carl H. Mote, is a purely radical and utilitarian work. The authors hold that "the first problem of man's existence is self-preservation," physical, of course, and they postulate as a basis that "education be an adjustment of the individual to his environment," nor does this environment include God, religion or morality. In spite of repeated protests against the too broad curriculum of our elementary schools, the joint authors would have all children attend school between the years of six and twelve or fourteen, during which time "all youth becomes acquainted with its environment [past? present? future?] and acquires the simple elements of chemistry, physics, biology, business practice, art, music, physical training, civics, social economy, agriculture," and of course the R's, three of them but not the fourth. Then on to a vocational school, where anyone may learn nearly everything about anything. Girls, for instance, need a broader training, for "building material, plumbing fixtures . . . and the ingredients of paint properly belong to the wife," besides "Mother, as a source of information on babies, is unreliable and inadequate." Toward the end of the book we are told: "It becomes the duty of the public to take charge of the entire educational system," based of course, on "the activities which essentially make up life" as arranged by Herbert Spencer. The day is coming when the private school will have to fight and fight hard to preserve its autonomy.

In a paper contributed to last week's Ireland, Mr. Shane Leslie remarks that "of those who signed the proclamation of the Irish Republic no less than three were true poets." He quotes in proof the following passage from P. H. Pearse as the "words of a poet, not of a president": "Freedom is so splendid a thing that one cannot worthily state it in the terms of a definition; one has to write it in some flaming symbol or to sing it in music riotous with the uproar of heaven." He then cites these fine stanzas of Joseph Plunkett:

The stars sang in God's garden,
The stars are the birds of God;
The night time is God's harvest.
Its fruits are the words of God.

God ploughed His fields in the morning;
God sowed His seed at noon;
God reaped and gathered in His corn
With the rising of the moon.

The sun rose up at midnight;
The sun rose red as blood.
It showed the Reaper, the dead Christ,
Upon His cross of wood.

For many live that One may die,
And One must die that many live.
The stars are silent in the sky,
Lest my poor songs be fugitive.

And from Thomas MacDonagh this little poem:

What is white?
The soul of the sage, faith-lit!
The trust of Age,
The infant's untaught wit.
What more white?
The face of Truth made known,
The voice of Youth
Singing before her throne.

Mr. Leslie observes in conclusion: "If the British Empire is to be saved . . . it will not be by shooting dreamers and poets against the feudal background of the Tower of London, with the whole sea-sundered Irish race listening, and beginning to wonder, and to wonder terribly."

EDUCATION

I—Going to College

ONE afternoon in early November I journeyed up to West Point to watch a football game between the team of the Military Academy and that of a western university. It was an ideal day, one of those delightful autumn days that speak to you softly of Saint Martin and the Indian summer. From the ascending tiers of seats about the parade grounds you could see the high hills across the Hudson, glorious and splendid, even in a waning splendor and a dying glory; and full of faith and hope, they seemed to be standing on tiptoe to watch every movement of the players struggling for victory. It was a game worth the watching, as fair an example of the American college game as one could wish to see; with plenty of wonderful, thrilling plays in the open field, as well as scrimmages in massed charges that try the stoutest heart. It matters little to you or me which team won; for football is not the subject of my story.

When the game was over and the crowd had melted away, I walked about the grounds, taking the pleasant paths across the wide campus, past the officers' houses, and onward toward the chapel-crowned slope above the bend in the river. Students passed me from time to time, seniors, some of them, almost ready to leave the war college; plebes, too, the veriest tyros in military technique. In every cadet, from the man who in half a year would be a second lieutenant in the United States army to the youth who had not yet lived six months within the call of the bugle, there was the same characteristic trait to be observed, an identical, uniform mark that would not be escaped. In the eyes, in the walk, in the general bearing of all there was that, which, if one might sum it up in a single word, one would call purpose. Once you detect it, and it is quite ineluctable, it flashes the message to you: "I belong to a soul that has a sure point of view and a definite goal." It is the badge of every West Pointer, a chevron as insistent as his dress uniform or his military salute.

THE "PURPOSEFUL STUDENT"

Now, the intent of this paper is not to seek into the reasons for military preparedness, nor to recall the glories of dead heroes; arma virumque is not my song. But up there on the plains overlooking the river, as I tried to study those youths with their minds quickened to their goal in life, I could not but think of the uncounted students in the colleges of this land, living in academic enclosure for four years, with no such definite aim. It is probably very clear what is meant by the quality of purposefulness as possessed by the student at West Point. His purpose, without doubt, is to become an efficient officer, capable of serving his country on the battlefield, and willing, if need be, to die in her defense. That is a very definite program of endeavor, simple and all-sufficient. Preparation for this scheme of life is the purpose of the cadet; that is the reason of his four years spent in the rigorous discipline of military training; that is why he goes to West Point. It would be harder, of a certainty, to find the aim of the average college student. And as the train carried me down to the city, while I looked out on the silent, shadowed river, or watched the little villages flash by, one by one lighting up the gloom of night, I thought of college life in America, of its meaning and its worth.

Everybody goes to college now, or, at all events, there is nobody who may not go. Time was, and not so long ago, when only selected individuals attended college; students particularly gifted, or boys looking forward to the professions of law, medicine, or theology; or sons of wealthy fathers. But today the rich and the poor, the scholar and the dullard, the ambitious and the aimless, mingle together in a quasi-democracy on every college campus. The bachelor's degree is becoming more and more the sine qua non in American life today. Going to college is the fashion of the times; it is the custom of the country.

Apparently, moreover, everybody is going for the same reason. If you ask a wealthy man his purpose in sending his son to college, he will answer without hesitation that he wishes to educate his boy. He will think you a very stupid person for your query, and may wonder if you realize the meaning of life at all. If you ask a poor man why his son is absenting himself for four years from a gainful occupation, he, too, will reply, and in no tone of doubt, that he wishes to educate his boy. The first man may have been the fifth of his line to carry his name to his Alma Mater; the second may have fled a pogrom at Warsaw. But for both the word education possesses a magic charm which weaves a never-failing spell. Education is the glorified fetich, the unknown god before which America kneels down and adores. It is the great religion in this modern Athens, and if one does not believe in it, one makes pretense of faith, and passes as an orthodox worshiper; there are no heretics willing to admit their sin.

The sons, too, are just as sure of their intentions. The boy who alights from his sixty-horse-power motor for his first consultation with the college dean will tell you that he is coming to college for an education. The less prosperous-looking youth who is filling out the perilous blank spaces on a questionnaire will cheerfully admit that education is the motive for his determination to spend a considerable fraction of his life in college. And so we have a pleasing unanimity on this point.

UNEDUCATED COLLEGIANS

From the almost daily complaints on the subject, it would seem that there is growing a rather unpleasing unanimity on the negative proposition; to wit, that though the youth may get college, he does not get education. He leaves home, sometimes a light-hearted, sometimes a serious, and usually an amiable lad, fresh from high school or academy, and comes back, it is charged, with his light-heartedness, or his seriousness, and his amiability tempered with a complacently patronizing attitude toward the world that is willing but not too anxious to give him a trial. It is contended that most college graduates know a little of everything, but nothing comprehensively of anything. And the intense desire, on the part of many, is that the new bachelor of arts will forget his four years' dream and settle down, as soon as may be, to the actualities of wide-awake life. In his present state, he is an interesting, but an unimportant phenomenon; his only hope lies in outgrowing the fantastic illusion that he has been wholly prepared for life by the college course. So cry the critics in a chorus of many variations.

Life is so hard at its worst, or so easy at its best, that one may sometimes wonder if it serves any practical purpose at all to be even a little analytic of the vagaries of human nature; if it solaces the heart or feeds the soul to divulge some of the arcana of college life. That it takes all sorts of people to make up the world will be a proverb, one ventures to say, a thousand years from now, if the earth lasts so long. And I am not overhopeful that the college world at the end of this millennium will be populated by one sort of student: the sort of student that plans with a certain amount of wisdom his future years. Indeed, it is of precious little consequence to any of us to worry over the possible outcome of a possible vaticination.

SONGS AND SAVANTS

Everyone remembers the amiable gentleman who would ask only the boon of making a nation's songs, and would leave the unimportant matter of legislation to somebody else. One is allowed to suppose that the essence of patriotism would breathe through those songs; I wonder if one can say that the essence of college pervades our college songs. If one remembers aright, most of them chant the charms of friendship and loyalty, and the pledging of faiths for aye and aye; indeed, a thoroughly laudable and proper manner of song-making. There is very little in verse about the mental growth of the student through the discipline involved in a study of Greek syntax or six-point logarithms, very little save in a jesting vein. There is very little in lyric mood of the broadening of the intellectual vision, of a widening of the human sympathies, of a perceptibility or invisibility enhancing appreciation of the art of living, of the attaining to a more or less satisfying condition of culture in all or any of its many-sided expressions, of the welding of heart and mind into the composite of sturdy character. And undeniably we should be thankful for this; human nature does not abhor such a vacuum. The singing Muse is glad to leave the charming and divine philosophy of the evolution of the youthful soul to another of her sorority, who may tell the tale without the linked sweetness of poetic phrase. And after all, it is more than barely possible that the songs of college, infused with the spirit of fraternity, of gaiety, of unsophisticated optimism, are more truthful tale-bearers of college life than the learned dissertation of a dusty savant. J. F. W.

SOCIOLOGY

The Way of the Good Shepherd

THE perfect love that casts out fear makes a glory in her peaceful eyes. For her there is no past; no memory of searing nights and haggard dawns, of dragging days of misery, remorse and scorn. Only the perfume of the broken box of spikenard, symbol of a bruised and contrite heart, lingers to tell that many sins have been forgiven her who has loved much. She sits at the feet of Christ, and is content. She has found Him in the House of the Good Shepherd.

Thus year by year, nay, week by week, in these quiet homes, sacred to love and penitence, for our solacing and lest the world think the Gospel only an idle tale, is retold the beautiful story of her who, after many wanderings, came to know why God put love in the human heart. Within these sheltering walls, the hapless objects of the world's cold contumely follow Magdalene to Calvary, there to wash the stained robes of their womanhood whiter than snow, in the crimson tide that flows from the riven Heart of Christ. They that were lost have been found.

Not an Economic Problem

The modern civilization which calls evil good and good evil, has lured into the desert many souls for whom the Heart of the Shepherd mourns. The hot words of Buckle, flung like acid into the face of a degraded public opinion, that "There has arisen in society a figure which is certainly the most mournful, and in some respects the most awful, upon which the eye of the moralist can dwell," need not be accepted in their main import, even by those who are well aware that she, on whose "degraded and ignoble form are concentrated the passions that might have filled the world with shame," still abides in all degrees of society, at once a source of physical and moral corruption, and, paradoxically, a possible shield against even greater evils. Harried and hounded, when she has not been enveloped in a hurtful sentimentality, she has been the theme of countless volumes elaborated by psychologists and moralists, and the occasion of much well-meaning but inefficient legislation. Dealt with often and by many forces, but not always wisely, she has occupied much of the public's attention; and in the chorus of conflicting opinions, the charge has been made that the Catholic Church is derelict in dealing with an unfortunate class which constitutes what is now termed a problem in economics or social hygiene.

The Spiritual Element

The Catholic Church will not accept the discussion of the problem on these grounds alone. Certainly, they are not to be slighted, much less rejected. But they are secondary, not fundamental. When one is cold, wet and hungry, when life holds out nothing better than an immutable sentence of toil and want, resistance is not easy. Hence, like her Master, the Church would supply, as far as may be possible, the reasonable temporal needs of her children, "lest they faint in the way." But even under the most unfavorable circumstances, resistance is not impossible. Despite the flood of sentimentality poured out by the popular magazines and some State reports, it is fairly evident that the stability of the girl who works is not dependent upon her wages, and that she who would gladly choose death of the body rather than of the soul is not an uncommon type. The Church, so thoroughly acquainted with the weakness of human nature, is not unmindful of its nobility. She knows well the serene heights to which human nature, ennobled by grace, can and does rise. Man does not live by bread alone, nor perish in its absence. Even admitting the dangers to youth, such as lack of proper housing, food, and necessary recreation, usually connected with poverty, it still remains true that no one was ever dragged into the depths of vice whose gaze had been firmly set on the ideals made practical by the teachings of the Catholic Church.

Materialistic Reconstruction

Physical comfort, the goal of modern sociologists, freedom from care, opportunities for education and social refinement, can no more insure chastity than the most grinding poverty, involving the lack of all things from a temporal point of view desirable, can wreck it. Fifth Avenue does not necessarily connote heaven, nor is an East Side tenement always an anteroom of hell. When Henley wrote that he was the captain of his soul, his spirit of defiance made the claim an empty boast. The Catholic Church teaches that, with the help of God, it is a fact. Therefore does she refuse to countenance the materialistic view that the problem of vice can be solved only by a reconstruction of society which will give to every man according to his temporal needs. Man is not a creature of the State, nor is he dependent upon the State for the truest achievement of life's purposes. Society can hinder or help, but of itself, cannot prevent him from attaining the end for which he came into existence.

The Catholic View

What, then, is the policy of the Church in dealing with this dark disorder? It can be stated simply. She sees neither safety for the innocent nor salvation for the erring save in a firm adhesion to the teachings of Jesus Christ. She does not propose to reconstruct the sin-wrecked soul by substituting courses in music or domestic economy for a humble, hopeful acknowledgment of the fact that sin is a moral disorder calling for personal reparation. Only He who made the soul can heal it, and she brings it to Him and leaves it in His hands. Her dealings with the sinner are dictated by the words of Christ to Magdalene, "Go in peace; thy sins are forgiven." Not because they had no objective existence, but because love, working through penitence, has restored the balance in the moral order, and by putting all past transgressions into the merciful hands of God, has done away with their guilt forever. This is the basis of all the reconstructive measures employed by the Church. It is the way of the Good Shepherd; it finds a beautiful modern expression in the institutions consecrated by this touching name of the Saviour.

Sin and Responsibility

On the other hand, she has no sympathy with the current opinion that sin is simply a pathological condition beyond personal control, like mumps or measles. She will not admit that sin is due solely to malign social conditions, and that, in consequence, the individual is the victim and society the sinner. Not so are human beings made. The Church knows and common experience teaches that day by day men and women, with eyes open to the guilt and consequences of sin, and utterly beyond the reach of "malign social conditions," freely transgress the moral law. A principle of modern pedagogy which bids the teacher "never to tell the child that he has done wrong, but to place before him ideals of positive constructive value inducing him to do what is right," has long been adopted by agencies of reform outside the Catholic Church. But sin is not a mere pathological condition or a social disorder inducing no personal responsibility. It is an act whereby one, knowing good, chooses evil, thereby violating the moral order; hence the reconstruction of the individual must include an adequate reparation of the moral order violated by the culprit. But there is nothing to reform if there has been no sin, and no repentance is possible unless the disorder has been acknowledged. The Church, then, sees no true reconstruction in the process which does not admit this violation, and which, while endeavoring to lead the erring soul to love virtue, does not teach it to hate vice as well.

Catholic Preventive Work

It has been alleged, not wholly without bitterness, that the interest of the Church begins only when the individual has become a social menace. The charge is utterly without proof. On the contrary, in the extent and efficiency of its preventive work, no organization can be compared with the Catholic Church; a fact of which even some of her children seem unaware. She does not undervalue the constructive aids suggested by modern needs, such as playgrounds, social centers and vocational schools, but she does not place her chief reliance upon them. By developing character on supernatural lines, she strikes at the very root of delinquency. Defending, as no human organization dares defend, the sanctity of the home, she secures the foundation of human society. Marriage she regards as a Sacrament; to every mother she holds up as the ideal, the love of Mary for the Infant Redeemer, and to every father the patient sacrifice of Joseph. Her watchfulness follows the child into the schools. The houses she builds for the little ones of the flock are dedicated to Christ, so that from the beginning they may associate every activity with some thought of God or religion. But her greatest aid is in the Sacraments, those sacred rites which strengthen the soul, not by asking for the grace of God, as prayer does, but by conferring it. In her schools, she trains more than one and a half million children; an equal number are subjected, in greater or less degree, to her tireless influence. What child-caring institution in the United States, however vast its resources, can equal or even vie with this record of preventive, genuinely constructive work?

The Only Remedy

That we can be saved only in the name of Christ, is as true in sociology as in religion. Despite the reformers, it is probable that the social evil will always afflict society in some degree, an evidence and effect of human weakness or human malice. But they are working most effectively to lessen the evil who instil into the souls of the coming generation, principles of self-restraint not founded on appeals to the child's budding sense of social justice, but upon the grace of God. In this as in all other disorders the only sure remedy, as Leo XIII so often declared, is to be found in a return to Christ, the Shepherd and Ruler of souls.

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The educational value of giving special attention to the Catholic press in our schools and colleges is gradually being appreciated. Special stress is laid upon the study of current journalistic literature in many non-Catholic schools, but there is particular need of acquainting Catholic students with their own Catholic literature and of educating them to show a lively interest in its regard. In this way we shall be able to develop in future a Catholic literature worthy of the great Church which it represents. At least one Catholic college magazine, the Saint Angela Quarterly, of New Rochelle College, has recognized this need by devoting a special department to the subject. Attention is drawn to leading Catholic magazines by discussing interesting articles contained in them. This is one of many ways in which the students can be made familiar with the excellent Catholic journalistic literature which we already possess, and which we may hope will steadily grow in value and importance according to the measure of intelligent support accorded to it.

A pithy aphorism of a noted French writer is quoted in Our Dumb Animals. "The dog," he says, "is almost always the mirror of his master, and he who sees the one sees the other. Show me your dog and I will tell you what you are." Observing the dames of fashion parading on Fifth Avenue, in New York, and the canines which are led by them or lead them, as the case may be, it might often appear uncharitable to leap to the conclusion which this principle would suggest. Yet there is no little truth in the shrewd observation: "The ruffian has for his dog a scoundrel; the thief, a thief; the stupid peasant, a stupid dog; and the man courteous and kind, a dog gently bred." This will sufficiently explain the psychology of the saying, "Love me, love my dog." The comparison between dog and master or mistress is not, however, to be applied too curiously. In particular it may not always be possible to see in the poor pampered pet the vices of a mistress who seeks by means of a beast and similar unworthy objects to fill the void left in her heart by the absence of the love of God and of His little ones for which nature itself craves. How dreadful the bathos of the modern world!

The cost of conducting the present war, so far as it could be ascertained during the past month, is thus summarized by the American Review of Reviews:

> Great Britain spent in the year ending April 1, $8,000,000,000, over four times her income under the new taxes. One-fourth of this expenditure, however, was in the shape of advances to her colonies and allies. The German Treasury announces that the expenditures for last December were $500,000,000, at the rate of $6,000,000,000 a year, but that since December the disbursements have been smaller. Germany has just closed her fourth war loan, to which there were subscriptions of $2,600,000,000, making a total of $9,000,000,000 borrowed since the war began. The French Minister of Finance states that war expenditures in 1915 amounted to $4,400,000,000, with estimates of current expenses running somewhat above that rate. In April, France arranged to borrow $100,000,000 in the United States, all or most of which is to go toward paying Americans for purchases here. Several of our bankers have underwritten this amount as a loan to the French Government, which will deposit with them certain securities to be collateral for debenture bonds offered to the public. Russia has borrowed $4,000,000,000 since the war began, and is now incurring war expenses at the rate of $6,000,000,000 per year.

Stupendous figures have become so familiar to us that they barely impress our imagination. To realize fully their meaning is impossible. This will come home to the nations, however, when the war-madness has passed and the day of reckoning is at hand. Some one must pay the accounts, or some one must incur the loss of these enormous debts.

The relative healthfulness of city and country is strikingly shown by the recent census tables. The death rate for 1909, 1910 and 1911 among white males under one year of age in cities of approximately 10,000 or more inhabitants was 13,380 out of every 100,000 children, whereas in smaller places at the same time it was only 10,326 out of the same number. The death rate of white females under the same conditions was respectively 11,123 for cities and 8,497 for rural localities, or twenty-four per cent less than the urban rate. The expectation of life, at birth, for white males is 7.7 years greater than in cities and at the age of ten, 5.4 years greater. Until the age of thirty-nine is reached there is a margin of more than five years in favor of the country. Thereafter the difference becomes gradually less, but is always in favor of the country until the age of eighty-eight is reached. After this period of life the cities show a slightly greater longevity than the rural localities. The difference between urban and rural longevity in the case of white females is somewhat less than in the case of males, though it still remains sufficiently pronounced. At birth the woman's expectation of life is 6 years greater in the country places, at ten years it is 3.3 years greater, and until the age of forty-six years is reached it continues to be 3 years greater. After the age of eighty-three years the city women have a slight advantage over their country sisters.

"Total abstinence from intoxicants," writes a Jewish organ, "may be said just now to be the principal doctrine of the Protestant church. This is the doctrine preached by Mohammed some thirteen hundred and odd years ago." The paper concludes that the Church which makes itself responsible for such teaching has taken a long time "to catch up with the Koran." Neither the Old nor the New Testament can be made sponsor for such a doctrine, and yet there is no mistaking the tendency on the part of some to confuse total abstinence with the spirit and even with the very teaching of Christianity. While men are laboring or legislating to combat the abuse of drunkenness we can all heartily sympathize and cooperate with them, but when they would make of total abstinence a touchstone of true Christianity they are setting up a private standard of religion. There may be many who regard prohibition as the only possible remedy for existing abuses. This is a purely personal conviction from which, to say the least, others have a right to differ. But no excuse can be pleaded for men who seek to impose the practice of total abstinence upon others as a religious doctrine or as a test of practical Christianity. There is no prohibition of the rational use of spirituous beverages in any part of the Gospel of Christ. To reprobate the use of them as in themselves sinful is to merit the comparison our Jewish brethren suggest. It is clear that in many sections a decided confusion of ideas exists in this regard. When essential doctrines of Christianity are cast aside queer substitutes are likely to be accepted in their place.

The thirteenth annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association will be held in Baltimore, June 26-29. The opening Mass will be celebrated in the Cathedral of the Assumption on June 27 and the convention proper opened at a general session in Calvert Hall by the President-General, Rt. Rev. T. J. Shahan, D.D. The College Department will hold its meetings in the Cathedral school; and the Parish School Department, in Calvert Hall. The subjects to be discussed the first day in the latter department are, "The Gary Plan," which has attracted such wide attention, and "To Teach Pupils to Study." The next day these various problems in school management are to be considered in this section: "Accurate Keeping of School Records," "Good Classroom Management," "To Train for the Formation of Good Habits" and "To Teach Them to Speak Their Mother Tongue Correctly." Other papers in the same department to be read during the Thursday session, are, "The Problem of Feeble-Mindedness," "The Lesson Plan" and "The Books Every Catholic Teacher Should Read." The Deaf-Mute Conference will be opened on Tuesday by the Rev. F. A. Moeller, S.J., and the Seminary Department by Rt. Rev. Mgr. John B. Peterson, Ph.D. At the general meeting of all departments for this day a paper on "The State" will be read by Very Rev. John F. Fenlon, S.S. On Wednesday afternoon the Rev. Lawrence A. Brown will preside at the meeting of the local and visiting teachers and representatives of religious communities. The report of the Committee on Educational Legislation will be presented at the general session of Wednesday evening by the Rev. M. J. Ahern, S.J. The presence of pastors, teachers and of all who have the interest of Catholic education at heart is earnestly invited.

"The place where Roman Catholics go after death," was the little Protestant girl's definition of purgatory. Today, the Irish Theological Quarterly remarks, Protestants are beginning to change their views upon this subject, and some no longer fight shy even of the use of the word "purgatory" itself. Others are willing to admit the fundamental truth of the doctrine, but hesitate to commit themselves to the term applied by the Church. As an illustration of this attitude a passage from "The Great Hereafter," by so "sturdy" a Protestant divine as the Rev. J. D. Jones, is quoted by the aforementioned review. After some "antiquated but judicious attacks" on the alleged abuses of the Catholic Church, which may serve to make his views palatable to Protestant readers, he says:

> Nevertheless it may be permitted to a sturdy Protestant to say that when our fathers in their revolt against the abuses of purgatory, swept away the very idea of a probationary life, they went too far. There was a real truth in this doctrine which had been held by the Church for centuries. No doctrine which persists throughout the generations can be dismissed as wholly untrue. There is no principle of vitality in what is a mere falsity. If a thing endures, it is because, mingled very likely with much that is erroneous, there is a real truth at the heart of it. And now that the fierceness of controversy has died down, Protestant theologians are returning to a belief in a probationary life after this one.

The word substituted by him and other Protestant writers for the Catholic term, "purgatory," is unsatisfactory. The souls of the dead, who have died in the state of grace, but with the stains of venial sins upon them, and other effects of their transgressions still following after them, undergo a purgation but no further probation. The state of probation is limited to the present life. But it is well to notice how clearly the admission is made that Protestant theologians are returning to a belief in what the writer considers the fundamental truth of the Catholic doctrine. That this doctrine has at any time been mingled with errors in the mind of the Church is an assumption which further study should enable Protestants to set aside easily. The doctrine of purgatory is simple, Scriptural, and in complete conformity with human reason. It has not changed in the course of centuries. Protestants in common with Catholics must realize the need of a term of purgation for the soul not deserving to be rejected eternally and yet not worthy to be admitted instantly to the vision of God, because of guilt not wholly expiated.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 7
WHOLE No. 372

MAY 27, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 16, p. m.-May 23, a. m. —Austrian Offensive in the Alps. France: Helping the War-Cripples. Germany: Bavarian Soldiers Recalled — Germany and the United States. Great Britain: Progress of the Conscription Bill—Increased Direct Taxation. Ireland: The Uprising. Mexico: Some Pitiable Letters. Rome: Two Papal Centenaries..145-148

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Charities Investigation: The Testimony—XLVI–The Young Man and Chemistry — This Way for Loot—Artificial Immunity Against Infectious Diseases—A Great Sodality's Centenary —The Spanish Elections.....149-157

COMMUNICATIONS
Catholics in Protestant Schools — Dr. Badé's Book—The Priestly Title—A Legion of Defense. 157

EDITORIALS
May Days in Ireland—Fair Play—Bishop Burgess and the Investigators—Buying a Reformation—Sholem Aleichem—"It is Too Hard"—The Texas Lynching.....158-161

LITERATURE
Silvio Pellico.

REVIEWS: The English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century—Studies in Seven Arts—William Joseph Chaminade — On the Art of Writing.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Some Recent Novels—Three Books for Children—The Catholic Mind—"The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries"—"Behold the King Cometh to Thee" —The May Month — "On Being Human" — "Under the Country Sky"—"First Base Faulkner"—"Those Gillespies"—"The Conscript Mother."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....161-164

EDUCATION
II–Going to College.....165, 166

SOCIOLOGY
Brownson House: Los Angeles.....166, 167

NOTE AND COMMENT
United States Steel and Carnegie Pension Fund — Summer Course in Church Music — Rural Credit Bill Before Congress—The Ancient Indian Names—Growth of a Catholic Hospital—"Running a Church Like a Grocery Store." 167, 168

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Flanders the Germans have bombarded the Belgian positions near Dixmude but without notable results. North of Ypres, between Steenstraete and Het Sas they have repeatedly endeavored to cross the Yser Canal, but without success. In Artois the British have lost from 100 to 300 yards of trenches on a front of more than a mile on the heights of Vimy. In Champagne the French have blocked a number of attempts on the part of the Germans to advance in the Somme-Py sector between St. Hilaire and St. Souplet. In the Verdun region the offensive has been mainly on the side of the Germans, who have made gains south and north of Hill 287, in the ravine between Hill 304 and Mort Homme Hill, and on the northern slopes of Mort Homme Hill. East of the Meuse the French have recaptured the Haudromont quarries and a portion of Fort Douaumont.

Bulletin, May 16, p. m.-May 23, a. m.

In Russia the Germans have been on the offensive near Illuxt, Lake Miadsiol and in the vicinity of Smorgon, south of Krevo, at Pulkarn and Olyka, and at Novo Alexinetz. The Russians report that in these places they have repelled all attacks. In Galicia, along the upper and lower Strypa there have been a number of engagements between the Austrians and the Russians, but the general situation in this district remains the same. In Egypt, near the border of Palestine, British warships have shelled El Arish. In Armenia there has been fighting between Bitlis and Diarbekr, where the Turks have apparently checked the Russian progress. In Persia, however, the Russians have captured Sekkis and arrived at Bade. Further south they have advanced from Kasr-i-Shirin and are now facing large Turkish forces five miles from the Mesopotamian border at Khanikin. The British War Office has officially announced that a force of Russian cavalry has joined the British on the Tigris, about twenty-five miles south of Kut-el-Amara.

The surprise of the week was the sudden development of the Austrian offensive in the Alps. The attack began with a violent bombardment of the Italian positions from Lake Garda to Montefalcone. This artillery fire became very intense between the Adige River and the Val D'Astico. The Italians, it seems, were taken unawares and were unable to withstand the infantry assaults which followed. Accordingly the Austrians forced the evacuation of Mori and advanced on the west side of the Adige as far as Monte Baldo, which is still held by the Italians. On the east side of the Adige the Austrians captured Marco, cleared the Terragnola plateau, took the villages of Moschera and Piazza, and attacked Monte Maggio from the south. At the same time they drove the Italians from the northern portion of the Lavarone plateau, and began the attack on Monte Maggio from the north. The Italians were outnumbered and were inferior in artillery, and as a consequence they retired south from the ridge. Crossing after the retreating Italians, the Austrians captured Costabella, and began to bombard the Italian positions on Monte Santo. Meantime they had descended the Arsa valley. Monte Santo was thus brought between two fires and the Italians found themselves unable to hold it, with the result that this important position fell into the hands of the Austrians. Further to the east the Austrians also drove the Italians from the northern side of the Val Sugana, and are now seriously threatening Borgo. The Austrians' advance varies from three to five miles, and in some places has crossed into Italian territory. Both sides are hurrying reinforcements, and the battle is rapidly developing on a large scale.

Austrian Offensive in the Alps

France.—Owing to the efforts of M. Maurice Barrès a "Fédération Nationale d'Assistance aux Mutilés des Armées de Terre et de Mer," has been organized to unite all local associations for the help of French war-cripples. The Federation proposes to procure for the crippled soldiers and sailors the artificial limbs needed, to teach them some suitable trade and to find them a situation. The Écho de Paris has already raised $340,000 for the work. The Federation has affiliated associations and homes for the cripples in most of the larger towns and cities. Of the $340,000 raised by the Écho de Paris, $100,000 have been reserved for the provincial associations. Near Lyons, the first school of agriculture has been opened for war-cripples who have been farmers. Here they are trained to continue their work with the aid of artificial limbs. A similar school is to be opened near Beauvais. It is a difficult task to provide the wounded with the artificial limbs suitable, as the Government has commandeered the supply, and has at times to furnish apparatus not fitted to the work intended. As a rule the Federation supplies artificial limbs only to the mutilated soldiers who are being "reeducated" in its homes. Up to January 1, 1916, 1,080 apparatuses had been furnished.

Helping the War-Cripples

Two classes of cripples are "reeducated" in Paris, those who stay with their families or friends, and those who are housed and lodged by the Federation. One hundred and fifty cripples belonging to the former class are "retaught" their former trade of shoemakers, tailors, tinsmiths, etc., in the various homes. Others are taught glass-blowing, toy-making, etc. To these non-resident cripples the Federation allows about seventy cents a day and pays all the expenses of their "reeducation."

Crippled soldiers without home or friends are cared for at the Federation Home, 28 Quai de la Rapée. The report issued from the above address and from which we are gathering these details, says that the Home treats all with impartiality "without distinction of politics or religion." A committee of ladies looks after the welfare of the inmates. Many of the latter are "retaught" various trades, and with their work have managed to some extent to make the home self-supporting. The average cost for each cripple per day is about ninety-four cents. A savings system is arranged so that the men may have a small sum on leaving. The work is becoming quite popular. The Paris report informs us that the Federation for French War Cripples has an American Bureau at No. 20 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

Germany.—It is mentioned as a very gratifying sign for Germany that while various belligerent countries are struggling with recruiting difficulties Bavaria has been able to recall from the front all soldiers who have completed their forty-fifth year, restoring them to their peaceful occupations. In accounting for the abundant supply of men which Germany is said to possess in spite of the long duration of the war the following reason is offered in Heer und Politik:

Bavarian Soldiers Recalled

> Since the Quadruple Alliance actually has many more men at its disposal than Germany and her allies, it is natural to ask how it is possible for the preponderance shown by Germany to extend itself likewise to her supply of troops. The main reason is to be found in the skill of our leaders, who achieve the greatest results possible with the smallest losses, not merely in defensive warfare but likewise in correctly launching their attacks. A Swedish paper recently spoke of the Verdun offensive as a model of its kind, since the attacks were almost entirely carried on by artillery and the greatest saving of men was effected. The art of German generalship consists in saving the men; the loss of our enemies, in squandering their soldiers.

Though desirous of peace, Germany claims to have vast resources of men for all future emergencies. The continued offensive of Germany and Austria is certainly a sign of strength.

Since October, 1914, an American relief kitchen has been conducted at Berlin by voluntary contributions from Americans only, furnishing warm midday meals to several hundred families. The undertaking was prompted, according to the American Association of Commerce and Trade in Berlin, "by the many acts, both official and private, indicative of good feeling toward Americans sojourning in Germany." Such sentiments, it adds, "between two countries which have for centuries lived in harmony and friendship" should be regarded of value, "even in a business sense." That commercial relations between the United States and Germany will be more close after the war than ever in the past is the opinion of the Secretary of the Imperial Treasury, Dr. Karl Helfferich:

Germany and the United States

> Then, no doubt, our relations will be more direct than ever before, since up to now a large part of the business transacted between the United States and Germany was negotiated through Great Britain. Great Britain has lost, certainly with the Central Powers, and, I venture to say, more or less with the whole world, its standing as the world's commercial agent. What happened to private individuals of German nationality in Great Britain, the confiscation of privately owned goods and securities, may be inflicted on the citizens of any other nation in some future war.

The recent excellent American banking reforms, he believes on the other hand, will enable our country "to finance the world's commerce in a manner worthy of the United States."

Great Britain.—The Compulsory Service Bill passed the House of Commons on May 17, and is now before the Lords. The Bill will become effective one month after its passage. While the enactments provide for the establishment of an army reserve for industrial work, it is generally recognized that this is the weakest clause of the proposed measure. England's power to carry on the war depends very largely on her ability to maintain

Progress of the Conscription Bill

the policy of "business as usual." This she has done up to the present; whether she will be able to continue it, depends upon the wisdom of the present legislation and the prudence with which it is applied. "The slackers in general," reports the Month, "made the Compulsory Service Act necessary. The married slackers are now making it odious. The resulting reluctance of the attested married men to serve is doubtless natural, but more natural than exemplary." Eight members of an association styling itself "The National Committee of the No Conscription Fellowship" were recently punished for the publication of a pamphlet denouncing the war as immoral, and demanding the repeal of the Act. Other signs of dissatisfaction have also been noted, but there is no reason to believe that the measure does not receive the approval of the country as a whole.

Increased Direct Taxation

The tremendous growth of direct as compared with indirect taxation was recently commented upon in the House of Commons by Mr. W. S. Hewins, who warned the country against underestimating the economic strength of the Central Powers. In reply, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Secretary for India, agreed with Mr. Hewins to the extent of admitting that it is a wiser policy for any country to conserve and develop its own resources, rather than to place reliance on the possibility of economic failure on the part of her enemies. The Secretary held, however, that compared with the wealth of Great Britain, the financial powers of Germany were small, and that although the increase in direct taxation was doubtless a burden, the abundant returns proved that the country was bearing it without undue strain.

The Uprising

Ireland.—News from Ireland has begun to arrive. During the week the Cork Weekly Examiner, the Dublin Sunday Independent and the Irish Catholic reached the office of AMERICA. Unfortunately the able and courageous New Ireland and the Leader have not as yet arrived. The Cork Examiner carries a long article on the uprising, taken from the English Daily Telegraph. There is also an editorial in which the uprising is called a "mad project;" the Nationalists are declared out of sympathy with the whole affair, and Carson and the Kaiser are denounced. The Independent fixes the blame primarily on Birrell, secondarily on Carson, and the Irish Catholic expresses its opinion in these words:

> We have no intention at the present moment of expressing at length our view of the partially socialistic and partially alien outbreak which has just been suppressed in our midst, but not before it had inflicted grievous anxiety, loss, and sorrow on many of the most worthy among our citizens of every class and creed. The movement which has culminated in deeds of unparalleled bloodshed and destruction of property in the capital of Ireland was as criminal as it was insane. Only idiots or lunatics can ever have supposed that it could prove successful. Traitorous and treacherous as it undoubtedly was, it was most of all traitorous and treacherous to our native land. To us, however, it seems that the immediate practical need is for the Parliamentary representatives of the country and our leading citizens of all sections to unite in pressing on the responsible authorities the imperative importance of adopting measures, financial and otherwise, for the removal of the difficulties which now confront many of our people. Cruel and enormous losses have been inflicted on numerous law-abiding citizens, and it seems to us that, in face of this regrettable fact, it is the bounden duty of the Government to make known their readiness to provide at once the credit or the funds required to mitigate the disastrous effects of an intolerable outrage, not only against the law but against all the principles of common sense and the primary instincts of loyalty to Ireland. The Treasury has helped with generous hands the victims of German aggression in England, and we fail to recognize how any other attitude can reasonably be adopted in the case of this country. Dublin, happily, has no need to ask for alms, and there is no reason why any Governmental aid afforded should not be of a kind repayable within a reasonable period, but no one who realizes the present shattered conditions of a once prosperous city can fail to realize also that, if she is to speedily regain the position she long occupied as one of the most beautiful of the capitals of the world, generous assistance must be extended by the State to the victims of a deplorable disaster. We feel that we need add nothing at present to what we have already written, save to invoke the prayers of our readers for those who have fallen in the conflict now ended.

Strangely enough many of the secular papers take a more lenient view of the matter. Thus the Nation declares that Liberals expected a more deliberate and merciful dealing, as well as a more authoritative intervention of the civil power. Continuing it says:

> Who was the true author of the Irish reaction to force? Who but Sir Edward Carson? Of his acts and words the shattered streets in Dublin and the dead boys and men, English and Irish, that strewed them are the sad monuments. When the Ulster rebels captured post-offices, cut telegraph and telephone wires, held up coast-guards and custom-house officers, . . . they furnished the working model of the Dublin émeute.

If the opinion of the editor of the English Observer can be taken as a criterion, a compromise would not be unacceptable to certain classes in England. He says:

> The only real method of an Irish settlement is to revive the Buckingham Palace conference, which broke down before the war chiefly on the narrow question of Tyrone. We assume that this will be the Premier's main proposal. It is desirable that the settlement be molded between the Irishmen themselves, and we hope that if the Buckingham Palace conference is resumed, its basis will be somewhat enlarged so as to embrace men like Sir Horace Plunkett, who was not included before. But, above all, more depends upon Sir Edward Carson and John Redmond than ever depended on Irishmen before. Cannot Redmond and his friends concede the exclusion of Ulster at the outset in order to get an immediate settlement? Cannot Carson and his friends agree to joint sessions, meeting alternately in Dublin and Belfast, for the management of common Irish affairs? Let every effort be made at first for inclusion, and if this does not work, then let all Ulster be excluded for a time. On such terms there will be in a few years one Irish Parliament for one Irish nation.

That the proximate settlement proposed would be acceptable to the vast majority of the Irish people, is most unlikely.

Mexico.—The following letters written by Yucatanians give some faint idea of the savagery of Alvarado and his bandits who are continuing their work of destruction:

Two Pitiable Letters

DEAR FATHER TIERNEY:

Alvarado, the man designated by Carranza to put into practice the ideals of this revolution in the unhappy State of Yucatan, has just committed the most scandalous outrages imaginable against the religion of the majority of the inhabitants of this unfortunate region, which for more than a year has been suffering untold martyrdom at the hands of the Constitutionalist leaders, who persecute us with impunity because they are supported by the recognition and friendship of the United States. Besides the outrages which you have already noted in your valiant review, the following occurred in Merida during the first week of the current month. On May 1 Labor Day was celebrated. A few Spanish and Cuban agitators brought together a group of 200 street-car men, whom they inflamed by anarchistic and anti-religious speeches. This done, the leaders led the mob, with the consent and approval of Alvarado, to the few churches which still remained open. There they indulged in acts of vandalism, destroying the statues, the altars, the sacred vessels and everything they found. After this work of destruction, they closed the churches and went through the city, carrying the fragments of the sacred objects and shouting blasphemies against God and religion. Later in the day they attempted to break into private houses in order to destroy the statues and other pious objects therein, and to "defanaticize" the residents, as their phrase has it. The inmates resisted, not with arms, because Alvarado has deprived us of all kinds of weapons, but with boiling water, chairs and whatever was at hand. The assailants gave way before the onslaught and did not carry out their purpose.

In two of the churches attacked, groups of Catholic citizens fought a hand-to-hand fight with the bandits, but the latter, supported by the soldiers, were able to accomplish their purpose. Next day Father Ortiz went to the church to say Mass. He managed to gain entrance and to celebrate amidst the wreckage, but he was immediately reprehended by the officials who forbade him to exercise his ministry. Later Alvarado decreed the expulsion of the few priests left in Yucatan, so that soon we shall be entirely deprived of the Sacraments and of the right to practise our religion. This is Alvarado's purpose. On several occasions he has declared that he intends to abolish religion completely and forever. The most intense anguish is in the heart of every decent citizen of Yucatan. A lady of the city (Merida) described our feelings when she said: "The day has passed and the only thing that can give us consolation is the thought that we are a little bit nearer to eternity and that so too are the bandits." The poor people of Yucatan know that in the United States dwell well-nigh 20,000,000 people who feel and believe as the Yucatanians feel and believe, and it hurts us to think that your great republic, mother of liberties and protector of rights, has held out the hand of fellowship to bandits and oppressors.

These bandits are the men who, according to the words of your President, are attempting to give freedom to the submerged eighty per cent of the Mexican nation! On May 7 the Catholics of Merida held a meeting to protest against the savage outrages committed. Alvarado at once ordered the people dispersed. They gave way under pressure of force and went in a body to police headquarters. The police came forth in fighting array and threatened to fire into a group of women. These women called the police cowards and dared them to fire. In the end a great number of people were arrested, laborers and manufacturers and capitalists and in general people of all classes and conditions, including a number of women and girls who, to the consternation of their relatives, were kept in prison for several hours. In the prison the manifestants kept up their loud protests against the attacks on religion. This is happening, dear Father, in a part of Mexico where the Carranza régime boasts that it is in absolute control and where nobody has opposed it by any real show of force. All this gives you an idea of the much-vaunted liberty promised us. Will you not make a fervent appeal to Americans, in your own ardent and energetic way, protesting against this awful tyranny sanctioned and supported by the United States? Ask for American sympathy for us, the sufferers, not for the despicable bandits. Tell your people our sorrow; let them know that our grief is indescribable. They cannot mean to torture us, who have never injured them, by giving support to tyrants, blasphemers, ravishers of women and girls. Our tribulation is great, but one conviction supports us. We cannot believe that the gates of hell will prevail.

The second letter, written after the one just quoted, reads in part:

On May 8, nothwithstanding threats, some four thousand people gathered in St. John's Square and paraded through the streets, acclaiming God and Our Lady of Guadaloupe and demanding that the churches be reopened. The manifestation reached such proportions that Alvarado became frightened and ordered two churches to be opened.

This is the condition of Yucatan: conditions in other parts of the country are worse.

Rome.—Romè reminds us that on Pentecost Monday, June 12, this year, occurs the eleventh centenary of Pope St. Leo III. For 1,100 years he has slept in the chapel of St. Leo I, the Great, in St. Peter's. A still more striking memorial of this great Pope is the disc of porphyry set in the center of the pavement, one of the first objects to strike the visitor on entering the Basilica. It was on this disc formerly occupying the center of the sanctuary in old St. Peter's that Charlemagne knelt to receive from the hands of Leo III "the imperial crown which renewed the Roman Empire of the West, created a new Europe, and established peace on a firmer basis than it had known for many centuries." Leo's motto: Gloria in excelsis Deo et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis, is still recorded, Rome adds, in the ancient mosaic of his Triclinium which may be seen on the external wall of the Scala Santa, with the word Pax, occupying the summit of the arch.

Two Papal Centenaries

On July 16, another Papal anniversary will be celebrated, the seventh centenary of Pope Innocent III, whose remains rest in St. John Lateran. Leo XIII looked to Innocent as his model in the Papacy and chose to be buried beside him. Innocent III in the thirteenth century raised the Papacy to the height of its power, and as Rome well says, the princes, kings and emperors of the eastern and western world appealed to him to settle their disputes. According to some authors, it was Innocent III who introduced into the Agnus Dei of the Mass the third response: "Give us peace," instead of "Have mercy on us." These two centenaries coming so close together will emphasize the truly beneficent and world-wide influence exerted by the Pope in the cause of permanent peace and order.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Charities Investigation: The Testimony

ALL things considered the testimony given before the Strong Commission by the enemies of private child-caring institutions of New York City is unfair to a scandalous degree. This is all the more significant because the witnesses knew the truth: they knew that the institutions which they attacked are safeguarding the health and morals of the inmates, and promoting their education; yet these men employed most sinister methods in an effort to create the contrary impression.

It is quite impossible to examine all their testimony and happily it is unnecessary to do so. A few examples chosen at random are amply sufficient to establish the thesis that crafty men used crafty means to discredit what they should have praised.

Amongst the chief witnesses, heroes in a sordid drama, were Messrs. Kingsbury and Folks, the latter a very Cassius to the former, or perchance his friend, guide and philosopher. For apparently Folks directed Kingsbury along the dark, devious path of intrigue, a fact that the Commissioner of Charities was loath to admit.

These two men lunched together in New York, on November 17, 1915; after lunch, that same day, they went together to the Albany train; they boarded that train together, about three o'clock in the afternoon; they spent four hours together on that train; they took dinner together on that train; they were together in Albany on the night of their arrival there; they were together in that city the day after their arrival there. In other words they performed together a series of acts extending over a long space of time, a fact which all men who are not intellectually abnormal can and do remember with some degree of distinctness. But behold, what took place a short time afterwards! Mr. Kingsbury was on the witness stand; Mr. Kingsbury, the man who criticized the ethics and the pedagogy of private institutions, was testifying. The topic under review was the Folks-Kingsbury trip to Albany. The witness was asked: "Where did you meet Mr. Folks?" He answered: "In Albany." He was then asked: "By appointment?" He replied: "Well, I was there attending the State Conference of Charities." Later Mr. Kingsbury's questioner again referred to this subject as follows: "By the way, you said you met Mr. Folks in Albany when you took the letter (of complaint) of the Mayor to the Governor?" The witness weakening a bit, responded: "I think that is my recollection." Just here his temerity returned and he added: "I did." This was Kingsbury's first testimony. This is the only thing he remembered about an incident with which were connected a lunch with Folks, a journey of four hours with Folks, a dinner with Folks on the train, a companionship with Folks through at least one evening and one day in Albany;—and it is as good an example of evasion and chicanery as any in history. Moreover, an interesting psychological problem is suggested by it. The function of the memory is to preserve, recall and recognize knowledge once had. Mr. Kingsbury's memory preserves and recalls knowledge he never had. Or is his memory faithful while his words lack coordination with the whole truth, formal and objective? Peculiarly enough the Commissioner has the unusual faculty of recalling most vividly things that are not so, especially when they tell in his favor. He is therefore a fit subject for the laboratory; experts might be able to determine whether his kink is intellectual or moral.

The testimony just cited was given February 14, 1916. From that day to March 22, 1916, the Commissioner's memory remained quite as perverse as a froward child. On March 22, 1916, his friend, Folks, the other hero in the melodrama, was on the stand. And Folks has a wretched memory too. In the present instance that was most fortunate, but for a time only. The subject was the Albany trip. The opposing counsel queried: "You said this morning, in your direct examination, you did not go on the train (to Albany) with him (Kingsbury)?" The witness replied: "That is my recollection." This question followed: "Do you remember going up with Commissioner Kingsbury on the train the day before the report was presented?" "I do not remember." "Do you remember taking lunch on the train, or dinner with Commissioner Kingsbury?" "No." "Do you remember Dr. Higgins and Father Ludlow at the same table?" (The transformation of the memory of the witness begins here, but it is never completed.) "I remember Dr. Higgins and Father Ludlow sat at the table with Commissioner Kingsbury and myself." "Did they, the day before this report was presented to the Governor?" "I am not sure, it may have been." "Does that enable you to refresh your recollection?" "I could verify it from my office, but I cannot from memory." "Did you know at the time you went up there, that he (Kingsbury) was going for the purpose of presenting a report to the Governor?" "I presume I did." "You have heard it? Did you hear it on the train or in Albany or in New York?" "I think I did" (sic.) This happened March 22, 1916. Mr. Kingsbury had testified February 14, 1916. For slightly over a month his memory remained dormant; it was dormant, February 14, February 15, February 26, March 1, March 2, March 10, March 18, March 19, March 20, March 21, March 22, at four o'clock in the morning, at five in the morning, at six, at seven, at eight, at nine;—the crisis is coming: Folks is on the stand, the partial truth is being jerked out of him: Kingsbury is "touched from on high," he recovers his wits and on the day of miracles, March 22, 1916, "corrects" the testimony given February 14, 1916. Conclusions are in order and the intellect of Aristotle is not required to draw them.

But Mr. Kingsbury did something more remarkable than "correct" testimony. He took occasion to spread incorrect and scandalous statements. Here his freakish memory was most active in the strangest possible way, in his own favor. His words were pathetic too. Here they are:

I can describe some of the things for you. For instance, in the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, I shall never forget the melancholy picture that was presented to me by Commissioner Doherty verbally, and subsequently in his reports, of these little children, heads cropped, sitting at the sides of a long table, on backless benches, eating out of tin dishes, as I recall it (with their fingers in most cases), some without anything to eat at all. Then I remember very well how he described how they jumped up in military fashion at the end of the meal, took their pails, emptied them into the can from which the soup or stew had been dished and that the same can was later taken out, as I remember, to feed the pigs with. That is one thing that I remember.

This is quite marvelous: the man who could not remember anything about his important Albany trip recalled every detail of a verbal report which included the remarkable fact that some children ate from tin dishes, without eating anything at all. (sic.)

This testimony is horrible, soul-stirring; it was wired to all corners of the country; it made a splendid headline; it furnished copy to a hundred papers—and it was a downright untruth. Sister Felicitas, the lady in charge of the dining-room in the accused institution, was called to the stand and with a calmness born of truth gave the lie direct to Doherty or Kingsbury, or both. Here is her statement:

"Is it true that the food which was left in the dishes of the boys was poured back into the pails in which it was brought and then taken out into the barns?" "They were not taken to the barns; they were taken to the scullery, emptied into the garbage can in the scullery, and not taken out, as was in the paper the other day." "Were the tin pails that were used on the table ever taken out to the pigsty?" "No, sir, they were not." "Were they ever taken out of the building?" "No, they were washed immediately." "And scoured?" "Scoured and shined; they are made of tin."

Her testimony did not furnish scare headlines for the papers. It was the truth; moreover she could not afford to hire a press agent and she was serving God not the devil. Why then should papers stress her words? Did Mr. Kingsbury correct his misstatement? Not he. Good men and women, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, had been shocked by his statement—and Mr. Kingsbury? He helped to give the calumny permanency and to spread it still further. For one Moree, with the consent and financial aid of Kingsbury got out an anonymous pamphlet of this nature. On the front page was a picture of a pitiable waif, pale and wan. Just over the child's head, in the most prominent place, in heavy, black type, was printed the lie: "Orphans and Pigs Fed From the Same Bowl, City Charities." Practically the whole pamphlet was made up in this way; there were dozens of "scare" headlines and "colored" abstracts from papers friendly to Kingsbury. And, mark it well, this document with its false and exaggerated statements was issued, with the aid and under the sanction of Kingsbury, quite early in the investigation which should have been judicial and therefore free from even the suspicion of calumnious bias. By whom was it issued? By Kingsbury and his friends, I repeat. The pamphlet was anonymous; but its authors were soon discovered.

Then Mr. Kingsbury became a very lion of courage. On March 25, he told an audience in the Plaza Hotel, that Moree, the man who compiled the odious document, informed him he could issue the pamphlet if he had the money to pay for it, otherwise he could not do it, and, continued Mr. Kingsbury, "I went to a friend of mine that night and told her we needed $500 for this pamphlet, and she gave me the $500. Mrs. Helen Hartley Jenkins paid for this pamphlet and she is now proud she did it." That is bad enough, but there is more. When Moree was on the stand objection was made that the pamphlet was not fair. He answered with the naïveté of a cave-man:

The objection to it seems to me to be more or less beside the point. I have a right to be unfair or not, if I like. That is my right. As long as I do not violate any legal obligations of this Commission or of the institutions, I have that right.

In other words private institutions were under attack by a man who was unfair, knew he was unfair, claimed the right (sic) to be unfair and sent out an unfair document in order to score a point against opponents. What is to be thought of a cause that relies on such tactics? What of the men who employ them? They may be passed over with the speculative remark that men who do such things and defend such principles are generally classed among moral perverts.

The publication of this pamphlet involved Mr. Folks, yet he did nothing to prevent it; it involved Mr. Canfield, another enemy of private charities, yet here is what he thought of the matter:

"And yet, Professor Canfield, with the proof of this pamphlet submitted to your committee and the opinion being expressed by all the Board that it would not be a proper thing for the State Charities Aid Association to do, you did not lift your hand to stop the assistant secretary who had charge of the principal work of publication of the association from circulating it?" "We did not lift our hands because we did not feel it was necessary." "In other words, you were glad to have it go out, but you did not want the responsibility." "No, I personally regretted that it was going out." "You regret it now, or did you then?" "I did then." "But you did not think you had a right to stop it?" "No, I don't think I had a right to say to Mr. Moree that he must suppress something that he was doing." "And it never entered your mind that it would be the right thing to do to say to him that neither would the State Charities Aid Association stand sponsor for it, nor should it go out by direction of one of its assistant secretaries?" "No." "That is right, is it?" "That's right."

Just here another actor appears on the stage, one Oseroff, an "uplifter" who makes an easy living by poking into other people's business. In 1915 he "investigated" private institutions in western Pennsylvania, and, of course, found that the "State has burdened itself with institutions which are a shame to the State and a detriment to the charitable system of which they have parasitically become a part." The gauntlet had been thrown down; a joint commission of twelve men appointed by the Pennsylvania Legislature investigated Mr. Oseroff's investigations and rendered this decision:

> In the opinion of the Commission this statement is untrue, misleading, and scandalous. It was this statement which gave the keynote to the various articles which appeared in the public prints. The Commission considers the whole statement as untrue in fact and reprehensible in the highest degree.

Yet this fellow who in the opinion of twelve men issued an untrue, scandalous statement, was called to testify against gentle Sisters who in striking contrast to the paid charity worker, Oseroff, have given their lives to the poor, without pay. The man from Pennsylvania testified with keenness, just as all professional fault-finders do. He found that the dentist's cards in one institution had been tampered with. Pressed for particulars he became confused; he did not know how many cards he had examined, he was not sure that the cards had been "doctored," and altogether he made a wretched showing. A Sister from the accused institution followed and denied firmly and unequivocally that the card had been changed in any way. Oseroff quietly disappeared after the benevolent Mr. Strong had allowed him to return to the stand to rehabilitate himself. No doubt he will be heard of again through the legislature of some other State. He must make a living.

Little remains to be said about this investigation which was conceived in iniquity and carried on in hate by the base methods described. The little that is unsaid refers to wire-tapping and the "stolen" telephone conversations. There is a great flurry over this: "real naughty" words are spoken, appeals are made to patriotism, there are cries of treason and a great deal of loud bluster which deceives nobody. Wires were tapped; there is the first outstanding fact. Under the circumstances this was a beggarly, unethical act, destructive of all confidence in officials. At first those who ordered the tapping denied it, but ultimately in the face of cumulative evidence, they admitted the deed. They might as well have admitted it from the beginning. Hardly had the wires been touched, when warnings were flying thick and fast through the city. Then the fun commenced; conversations over the wires were "faked," and forthwith subpœnas began to alight everywhere, much to the amusement of the initiated. And, imagine it! there is circumstantial evidence that Mr. Kingsbury's counsel used some "stolen" conversation as a basis for his questions. The fox thought he was playing with the goose, and the goose proved to be the fox's grandfather. Grandfather fox toyed with kitten fox, by indulging in bogus telephone conversations of this kind: "Are you keeping under cover?" "It might be well to stay away until the blows are over," etc., etc. This is amusing; the aftermath has proven a discomfort to the tappers. But the daily papers have made this abundantly plain. They have not dwelt much on these facts however: that the stolen conversations were handed over to Mr. Kingsbury for use against his opponents, and that when they ultimately came into Mr. Strong's hands, he magnanimously returned them to the tappers. In other words the gentleman who presided over the judicial investigation we have been considering turned over to the accused the evidence against them! This in boastful New York of the twentieth century! But the end is not yet. In conclusion, perhaps amongst the enemies of our private institutions there is one who will consider this dilemma: Either the accused institutions were guilty of the gross neglect attributed to them or they were not. If they were not guilty, why all this prosecution and persecution? If they were guilty, where the necessity of intrigue and lies and wire-tapping and all that to prove it?

THE EDITOR.

XLVI—The Young Man and Chemistry

ONE of the unexpected consequences of the world-war now desolating Europe is the sudden revelation to the modern world of the vast importance of the science of chemistry, an importance not restricted to the invention and production of death-dealing substances, but one felt in all the affairs of life. Chemistry touches us in health and in sickness; we depend upon it for much of our food and raiment when we are well; and for medicine when we are ill. The marvelous expansion of the iron industry is due almost exclusively to the chemist, whose discoveries have made the ores available in their most perfect forms. The farm, the stockyard, the factory, now depend largely upon chemistry for their successful operation. The tanner's, the weaver's, the dyer's craft, without the aid of chemistry would still be in their primitive stage of development, instead of being extensive industries that now give sustenance and employment to thousands and thousands.

Consequently the chemist, working in seclusion, "the world forgetting and by the world forgot," has at one bound been exalted as the master of modern technical industries. Chemistry is now a profession that offers the most alluring inducements to young men of ambition, industry and a scientific bent of mind; that type of mind that can patiently and ploddingly work at a problem in spite of obstacles and disappointment, until tireless effort is crowned with merited success. Such young men must of course have an imagination quick enough to find the solution of the average chemical problem, enough courage to persevere undauntedly in the face of adverse criticism, and an intellect sufficiently well-balanced to avoid being misled by vain illusions.

To men of talent, the rewards of the profession are high in the industrial field. The young chemist, fresh from college, receives, of course, a comparatively small salary, for, however well-grounded in theory he may be, he is deficient in practical experience. His first work is of a routine nature, and is carefully supervised and checked. In large concerns he may be set keeping apparatus in condition, graduating from that to the work of making analyses of products or to similar tasks requiring care and attention to detail. After some experience, a competent man is entrusted with more complicated and delicate analytical work, which presents difficulties calling for greater resourcefulness. The final step in the career of the analytical chemist, is the testing and standardizing of methods of analysis, the improvement and refinement of old ways and the development of new. He aims at the simplification of processes by the application of fresh principles to familiar problems. It is in the laboratory that the chemist is thoroughly tested in regard to his capacity for undertaking successfully particular branches of work in the industry that employs him.

The analyst, when his fitness has been demonstrated, will be ready to supervise the manufacturing operations of those industries in which chemistry plays so large a part, such as the refining of petroleum and the making of dyes and chemicals. He may then have a technical foreman's position or assist in some capacity the plant superintendent, a place to which he himself may aspire in time, if it lies within his abilities and is in line with his ambitions. In the natural course of events, he may finally become a consulting expert, or even an inventor, and then his path to great success is secure.

As for the financial rewards of the calling, the young chemist may receive from $600.00 to $900.00 a year; after sufficient experience as an analyst, he may get $1,200 to $1,500. Then there is practically no limit to the money he can make; all depends on the chemist's industry, ambition and ability. For instance, Dr. L. H. Baekeland, of baekelite fame, was once a chemist with the Eastman Kodak Company; his invention of a noted photographic paper, and of other things, made him a millionaire before he was forty-five. One of the most eminent and successful chemists of the day is Dr. J. B. F. Herreshoff, whose improvements and inventions in methods of copper refining and sulphuric acid manufacture have richly rewarded him.

Instances could be multiplied of chemists both here and abroad, who from small beginnings have risen to affluence and eminence in a profession of great attraction to the profound student, who while working for a future desires to be as free as possible from the sordid cares of the business struggle. In the profession of chemistry, men not molded for the intense warfare of competition may attain competency and even wealth in a congenial pursuit, while even plodders will be able to earn a living, and this too under conditions that must seem very attractive and agreeable.

J. D. DE LA TORRE BUENO.

This Way for Loot

DOWN beyond the Rio Grande an unhappy land is in its death throes. Its coinage is debased; its fields lie waste; the hum of its industry is hushed; famine and disease have wound their yellow fingers around a thousand throats; hearts are bruised, torn, broken; souls are caught in the mill of pain and a cry of agony is in the air, the cry of little girls that were once mirthful and ignorant of the shame of life, the cry of distraught maidens and mothers and consecrated virgins, a cry that is like a wail from the dying in the night.

Mexico is now a land in which vultures are rejoicing, foul creatures that delight in noisome odors and fetid food. Carrion birds are at home there, and bandits, their kin in spirit. Through the streets of the cities brutal generals and colonels and what-not pass and repass, gleeful in their ghoulish work of robbery and outrage and murder. Round about them are the starving people, some passing like phantoms in the twilight, others wild in their desire for food. But the officers are not hungry; they are well-fed. Why should they not be? Most robbers are. These men are robbers, every one of them from first to last. They have looted homes and churches and chapels. Their hands still dripping red with the blood of victims have seized chalice, ciborium, monstrance, chasuble, cope, everything that could be carried off. Good! But what became of the loot? Ah, there's the rub. The thrifty Yankee, the soulless trafficker, was at hand. Mexico's misfortunes would be his fortune; out of the ruins of the Catholic Church he would rise, a rich man. He followed on the heels of the Mexican bandits fresh from their orgy of lust and rapine, rattling his money in his criminal hand, and striking a bargain for stolen goods. He nosed about like a hungry wolf in alleys and side streets, buying other people's property at special rates. And now vast quantities of these goods, the property of poor, unfortunate, maltreated Mexicans, as well as church furnishings, are safe in this country, actually shipped as household effects through our ports, free of duty. Through New York and Galveston and Laredo it has come, this loot, in trunks and barrels and boxes. Chalices there are and copes and chasubles, and all are household furnishings, free of duty! Milady uses the chasuble as a dressing gown no doubt, and the cope as a bathrobe perchance. Be that as it may, they are household goods. Mark it well: sacred vessels and vestments are household goods and according to the testimony of one importer the "officers" at Galveston and Laredo "never questioned the right to bring such articles in," free of duty. Perhaps the "officers" of Galveston and Laredo can explain why so much of this household furniture was sold for high prices to dealers on Fifth Avenue, New York. If they cannot explain it, maybe an investigation of the ports of Galveston and Laredo would bring out interesting facts. Some of the goods, meantime, rest in the appraiser's stores in New York, other some is in the Boston Storage Warehouse, more was in the Lincoln Storage Warehouse in New York. And all the while the Mexican people are being uplifted by priests and priestesses of humanity; and the uplifting consists in prating about ideals, robbing decent people of their property and supplying guns and bullets to bandits whose only form of worship is phallism.

It is well for American people to know these facts; it is well for all sincere, fair-minded folk, Catholic and Protestant alike, to know that Americans have not only been engaged in this nefarious traffic, but have actually aided and abetted the most shameless bandit of the twentieth century, Villa. The Guardians of Liberty, a collection of bilious ministers, henpecked husbands and a lone general who wears gold braid even on his bathing suit, congratulated the wretch on the work against the Catholic Church and actually sent him money to help on his cause. So it ever was: low-browed, slant-eyed men, a disgrace to their race and their religion, have never hesitated to join hands with our country's enemies, when they thought that by so doing they could destroy Catholicism. They would run with the devil, if that would ruin the Church. This is not rhetoric: it is sober fact. It has happened every time an attack has been made on Catholicism. It happened in the Spanish-American War, for instance, as this document will testify:

WASHINGTON, D. C.
UNITED STATES OF N. A.
July 2, 1898.

MY VERY DEAR AGUINALDO:

I hear that you are a member of a society to protect the people against the machinations of the accursed Roman Catholic priests. I am a member of the American Protective Association, commonly called the A. P. A., having the very same object in view. It is a secret society, and we now number several hundred thousand good men and many women; but unfortunately our rulers either do not understand this plotting, scheming, thieving, and murderous priesthood, or they fear the gang so much that the Church of Rome is rapidly increasing in power here, and we fear a great civil war may come upon us in the near future on their account. I hope you will issue a proclamation confiscating all the estates of the monks, nuns and all other ecclesiastics, before the affairs of the Philippines fall into the hands of our republic; for according to our laws these estates cannot be confiscated. I hope you will write me in answer to this, and I will read your letter in one of our secret council meetings. I enclose a clipping from the Times of this city, showing the strength and influence of the A. P. A. We admire your course, and bid you God speed in your efforts for freedom! ROME is the enemy. You have millions of admirers in the United States!

Yours ever,
[Signed] C. ROYS,
Formerly Chief Justice of the A. P. A. in the District of Columbia.

Interesting that! An American writing to a "near-enemy" of his country tells him he has millions of admirers in the United States and urges him to commit a basely immoral act. And this American was not ashamed of his infamy. He acknowledged it thus in answer to a query:

W-n, D. C., No. 631 "F," N. W.
April 9, 1902.

DEAR SIR:

I recd, your letter, dated the of April, in due course of mail. I have been unusually busy in the Supreme Court of D. C., and this must account for my delay in answering.

I remember that I wrote a letter to Aguinaldo, and I think I sent it c/o Admiral Dewey. I have been looking over some "copies of important letters" which I keep, to try and ascertain what I said in that one; but I have not found any such copy. My recollection, however, is, that I advised him to issue a proclamation confiscating the Friar lands, as we could not well do so under our Constitution. It was certainly very kind of you to notify me, as you did, and I appreciate your kindly act, very highly. It seems to show that soldiering has not corrupted your Christian morality. It is remarkable that the letter should fall into the hands of one of our citizen soldiers, and under such singular circumstances. You may publish it if you wish in the "American Citizen," whose editor and office are at 127-A Tremont st., Boston. I will ask only that you relate the circumstances to the manager, Mr. Long, and request him to send me the original, after it has been put into type. It would be a keepsake to me, and of little interest to any one else.

Thanking you most heartily for your notice, and offer to return it to me, I am sincerely

Your Most Obt. Servt.
CHASE ROYS,
Atty. &c.

P. S. I enclose 2 stamps for your expense in sending note to me; and I hope you are well and may live long and happily upon the earth.

C. R.

Words would but obscure the import of these documents. Only one remark is in order. Soldiering did not corrupt the Christian morality of the inquirer, but an A. P. A. ,who urges a man to an act equivalent to banditry is scarcely a judge of virtue.

And Catholics? They were ever such, shouters down the wind, a disorganized flock of sheep and lambs, many ignorant of their rights, others too indifferent or politic to care for those rights. R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.

Artificial Immunity Against Infectious Diseases

WE have known always that if a person recovers from certain infectious diseases, as smallpox, typhoid fever, or measles, he cannot, as a rule, be reinfected with these maladies, although there are exceptions. Recovery from other infectious diseases, such as diphtheria and pneumonia, does not confer such immunity. It is also certain that when a person convalesces from an infectious disease his body commonly cures itself. The physician sustains the patient by meeting adverse symptoms, but the sick man's body makes the antidote that finally restores health. In the recent medical treatment of a few diseases the physician injects into the patient's body a specific remedy for the malady, which is sometimes a drug like quinine or salvarsan, or an antitoxin, or the like, but these medicines are not available for many of the infections.

Several of the infections are caused by micröorganisms. The bacteria, protozoa, or other microbes, which cause tuberculosis, diphtheria, leprosy, pneumonia, influenza, cholera, bubonic plague, septicemia, typhoid fever, malaria, and other diseases, have been isolated. There are some diseases, as smallpox, measles, scarlet fever, chickenpox and typhus, the causes of which have up to the present eluded us. Bacteria which cause disease are extremely minute vegetable organisms. If a bacterium is shaped like a round dot it is called a coccus; if like a hyphen, a bacillus; if spiral, it is a spirochete. A coccus magnified 800 times is as large as a period in the type on this page; a typhoid bacillus enlarged 800 times is just like a hyphen in this type. The influenza bacillus is much smaller. Bacteria which do not produce disease in a given subject are called saprophytes, but that which is a saprophyte for one animal, may be malignant for another animal. Bacteria which cause disease if injected in large quantities are called half-parasites. Pure parasites are such bacteria as cause disease even in the smallest doses. If an emulsion of the bacillus of hemorrhagic septicemia is diluted in five million gallons of water, one minute drop of this very homeopathic dilution will kill a rabbit in twenty-four hours. That bacillus, however, is a saprophyte for human beings.

Parasitic bacteria multiply by fission in the body with extreme rapidity, and either their own substance or their exudates are so poisonous that they injure the cells of the body and cause those symptoms we call collectively pneumonia, diphtheria, typhoid, or the like. If the poison overwhelms the man's resistance, enough of the cells are destroyed to cause death; if his resistance is good, his body cells make "antibodies," which either neutralize the poison, and such an antibody is called an antitoxin, or destroy the bacteria, and such an antibody is a bacteriolysin; or they so alter the bacteria that the white blood corpuscles can destroy them, and such an antibody is a bacteriotropin or an opsinin. These three types of immunity are called antitoxic, bactericidal, and cellular immunity.

When the blood serum of an animal contains antibodies formed during convalescence, that animal has "active immunity." The serum of such an animal will immunize another animal, and this second animal then has "passive immunity." Both active and passive immunity here are "acquired," but there is also an immunity called "natural"; that is, some animals are congenitally resistant to certain diseases. Man is naturally immune to hog and chicken cholera: Algerian sheep are not affected by anthrax but European sheep are killed by it; swine will not take glanders which kills horses; monkeys are susceptible to tuberculosis, while dogs are practically immune; negroes seldom take malaria or yellow fever; they have acquired partial immunity as a race by long sojourn in the tropics, as we have acquired partial immunity to measles which is extremely fatal in a race newly infected. Active immunity against several diseases can now be conferred artificially, by injecting substances into living animals which excite their bodily cells to form antibodies. The substance injected is called an antigen, and it may be a living virus, a dead virus, a bacterial extract or a bacterial toxin.

The use of a living virus, especially a pathological bacterium, is so difficult to control that it is tried only with attenuated or weakly infectious viruses. Such a method is called jennerization, and vaccination against smallpox is the type. This vaccination consists in inoculating with vaccinia or cowpox, which is an attenuated form of smallpox. The attenuation in virulence has been brought about by the passage of the virus through the bodies of calves, which are less susceptible to smallpox than man. Pasteur used attenuated viruses to immunize against hen cholera, swine plague, anthrax, and rabies. He found that rabies can be transmitted to dogs by injecting under their brain membranes the brain substance of rabid animals. This virus is called "Street Virus." The incubation period of rabies is long; the disease shows from three weeks after the bite up to 584 days, or even longer. Pasteur took advantage of this fact rapidly and artificially to immunize the patient before the rabies from the dog or wolf bite had time to develop. Rabbits are especially susceptible to rabies and the antigen is obtained from these animals. Rabies is passed through several rabbits until the time of incubation is reduced as much as possible, that is to seven days; the spinal cord of the last rabbit is dried and is called virus fixe. When a person has been bitten by a rabid animal a minute quantity of an emulsion of the spinal cord of a rabbit which has been killed by a virus fixe is injected. This cord has been dried for fourteen days. Later a less attenuated virus is used, that is, one from a cord which has been dried for a less number of days; then a less attenuated one, and so on, until finally portions of cords which have been dried for only three or four days are injected. In this process the man's cells are excited to form antibodies, and these are ready in his blood and tissues to meet the materies morbi from the bite when it appears. There are various modifications of this method, and now the virus fixe itself is used from the very beginning of the process. This is an example of immunization with a living virus.

Immunization with a dead virus or antigen is used to protect against typhoid, paratyphoid, cholera, pneumonia, and several pus organisms. The bacteria, say, of typhoid, are isolated and grown in an incubator on agar; they are suspended in solutions and then carefully killed by a heat which is not enough to destroy their virulence while it prevents their growth. The dead bacteria in standardized doses are injected to excite the formation of antibodies. Typhoid fever is now under complete control in armies where as late as our Spanish War it was a plague. Today soldiers are vaccinated against typhoid as children are vaccinated against smallpox.

A third form of immunization uses bacterial extracts as the antigen, because the extracts are more readily controlled than the pure parasite, and for other technical reasons. Bacteria are injected into the the pleural cavity of an animal, and after the animal dies the exudate in the cavity, is cleared and sterilized, and used as an antigen. This kind of an antigen is called an aggressin, and it seems to be the product of broken down bacteria.

Koch's tuberculin, which is a valuable diagnostic aid in obscure tubercular conditions; mallein, used in diagnosing glanders; and nastin from the streptothrix leproides, are made by the aggressin method.

The immunizations so far considered are effected by bacterial substances and extracts. Immunization against diphtheria, tetanus, snake venom, and several other dangerous pathologic conditions, is brought about by using the secretions or toxins of bacteria, or in snake poisoning the venom itself, as the antigen for the antitoxin. If a person is infected with anthrax the bacillus will be found in the blood, lymphs glands and viscera, but the tetanus bacilli do not so appear. In diphtheria the bacillus is localized, and the circulating toxin does the damage.

Formerly when a child was infected by diphtheria it either made enough antitoxin itself and recovered, or it was overwhelmed and died. Now when the diphtheria is diagnosed we inject a certain dose of antitoxin, made in the body of a horse, at once neutralize the diphtheria toxin, and the child recovers, provided there has not been too great a delay in giving the antitoxin. Antitoxin cures every case when it is injected on the first day of the disease; if a delay of six days is made half the children die. Antitoxin for tetanus and snake poisoning must be given early; tetanus antitoxin before the symptoms show. The use of whiskey in snake poisoning only adds alcoholic intoxication to the venom.

The first diphtheria antitoxin produced in the United States was made in Washington in 1894, by Dr. Joseph Kinyoun, then Professor of hygiene in the Georgetown University Medical School, and the writer of this article, then bacteriologist to the District of Columbia, worked with him.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

A Great Sodality's Centenary

EVEN in a year of brilliant commemorations so modest yet noteworthy a centenary as that recently celebrated by the Sodality of the Children of Mary of the Sacred Heart should not be overlooked. In 1816 Blessed Madeleine-Sophie Barat organized among the children under the care of her religious a confraternity known as the Association of the Sacred Heart. The second degree of this confraternity was a Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, which in 1818 was affiliated with the Archconfraternity in Rome, and is distinct from other pious associations in virtue of its canonical erection in 1825. In 1876 Pius IX, by an Apostolic Letter, confirmed in perpetuity the indulgences and privileges bestowed by his predecessor, and in his turn granted the sodality still other favors.

We live in times which have seen the birth of a movement called feminism, in the name of which woman is clamorously urged to take what is known as "her place in the world." Strangely enough, although her theories rested on a vastly different foundation, this was precisely the object Mother Barat had in view when she undertook to educate the young women of post-Revolutionary France, for she aimed to fit them to take their places in the world. "You are to act as apostles," she told them, "in the midst of a perverse world." In this she had no intention of turning out a set of self-conscious reformers, but of developing women who should have sound reasons for their faith, who should live lives untainted by infidelity and worldliness, who should be filled with great tenderness for the poor and suffering and a determination "never to descend from the high thoughts of the children of God."

So, when Mother Barat happened to be visiting the convent at Lyons in 1832, she determined to admit to membership in the sodality not only the children then in the school, but the former pupils as well. The first rule of the sodality had been compiled in 1820, by Father Varin, who had been instrumental in founding the Society of the Sacred Heart itself, but the rule now in force was drawn up by Father Druilhet, S.J. Thus came into existence a society whose power for good cannot be accurately measured because the works of its right hand are unknown to its left. There are extant interesting records dating from those early times, and in the yellowing pages stand out many striking and edifying facts.

Many of the early sodalists were very holy women. Such a one was Madame De Cormis, President of the Children of Mary at Lyons; another was the Vicomtesse de Vergnette, both of whom God, having tried, found not unworthy of Himself. From Paris in 1870, well called la cruelle année, comes a strangely familiar account of ambulances and the nursing of wounded soldiers. The meetings of the sodality, we are told, were not interrupted during the first siege, but during the second "the shells fell like rain" in the vicinity of the convent, and the director, Père Olivaint, soon by a martyr's death to be numbered among "the fair chivalry of Christ," announced that if the shells should prove too terrifying all were free to absent themselves from the meeting. But sometimes another note is struck. From Lyons, for instance, comes a description of the festivities celebrating the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and from Lille in 1864 mention is made of a gift of vestments and altar linens to his Eminence, Cardinal Wiseman.

The roll of the years has contained distinguished names. At the fire which destroyed the Charity Bazaar in Paris, the Duchesse d'Alençon, who was President of the Children of Mary, sacrificed her life to her duty, and her charred body was recognized by the silver medal she used to wear, with its inscription, Cor meum jungatur vobis. In England, Lady Georgiana Fullerton, likewise President of the Sodality, typified Catholic womanhood at its best, in Spain there was the munificent Duchess of Pastrana, and in France again Madame la Maréchale de MacMahon. Eugenie de Smet, who founded the Helpers of the Holy Souls, was a Child of Mary of the Sacred Heart, another was instrumental in bringing to the United States the Sœurs Réparatrices, and still another has founded an Order for work among the colored people and Indians. That the sodality's influence for good has not been wholly unrecognized is evident from the fact that when Pius IX wished to effect a reform in the fashion of dress which prevailed in Roman society it was to the Children of Mary of the Trinità de' Monti that he looked to set the example.

Nor has the sodality failed to meet the exigencies of more recent times. For example, when the French Government confiscated the convents of the Sacred Heart and drove the nuns into exile, the Children of Mary kept up the poor schools. In Paris a house is maintained where the sodality's monthly meetings have been held almost without interruption. In Mexico, where Madame Porfirio Diaz was an exemplary sodalist, Catholic schools have been made possible through the zeal of the Children of Mary, and in Spain the work of the Tabernacle Society, of which the Queen is a member, is done on a magnificent scale. The sodality is active in Chile, Argentina and Peru, its influence having been especially felt in Buenos Aires in effecting a reform of the drama. In England the Children of Mary have taken over the support of St. Vincent's Home for Cripples, organized by Mr. Norman Potter and conducted by the Sisters of Charity.

To deal at all adequately with the sodality's activities in this country would require much more space than the limits of a single article allow. In an age of organized charity our American Children of Mary have not been found wanting, while they also bring to the work that element of personal consecration which sets the width of heaven between charity and philanthropy, and which Our Lord had in mind when He promised to consider Himself served in the persons of His poor. It is this heart-service which explains the Home for Consumptives founded in Boston in 1887 by a Child of Mary who gave her own house for their shelter; it explains also the day nursery maintained in New York entirely at the expense of a Child of Mary, and the settlement house supported by another. The St. Louis sodality has an outing home where young women devote themselves day and night to the care of poor children brought from the congested districts; Cincinnati has its day nursery, and Philadelphia a working girls' club that makes an annual retreat. The Detroit sodality, which is over fifty years old, has a Barat club and conducts a lunch room. The sodalities of the three convents in New York maintain the Barat Settlement House and Day Nursery, and St. Elizabeth's Gild in Albany was founded by a Kenwood Child of Mary. A similar gild in Boston had its origin in a day nursery founded by the Children of Mary in 1889. The Chicago congregation maintains various centers for the teaching of Christian doctrine together with a mothers' club and a citizens' club, and the work of visiting hospitals is carried on systematically.

This paper does not pretend to enumerate the various congregations nor to give an exhaustive account of those that have been mentioned. The aim of the article is simply to show that the hundred past years of the Children of Mary of the Sacred Heart have not been inglorious, and that for a generation with such traditions the outlook is full of splendid promise.

B. M. K.

The Spanish Elections

I AM now in a position to give you the results of the elections which have recently taken place. They were everywhere marked by the greatest quiet and order. Even in those districts where the contest was relatively bitter and hotly contested, there were no serious disturbances. But a great number of electors stayed away from the polls. In spite of the penalties established by law against absentees, it is estimated that about one-half only of those entitled to do so cast their votes. Political apathy and neglect of the most important and vital civic duty are daily growing more and more noticeable in the country. Profound discouragement, complete skepticism have taken hold of our people. "Why trouble ourselves about the elections," they say, "when they are under Government control and manipulated according to its pleasure for the victory or defeat of the candidates?" There is a great deal of truth in this. In Spain, deputies and senators are not elected by the people, but practically appointed by the Ministry. Often elections are a farce and a lie. Long before election day, the Government makes out a list of those who are to compose the future Cortes, with the various candidates classified according to parties, groups and factions. In some districts strange and startling things happen. Men are elected there who are not residents, whose family does not belong to the place, who have no property or interests of any kind in the locality. They are returned because the Government wants it, has so ordered it, and for no other reason. These men are the sons, the relatives of Ministers and other Government officials, and they are given their commission to the Cortes just as easily and as jauntily as if the present were an automobile or a scarf-pin. Can we then wonder at the discouragement, the indifference, the skepticism, the venality spreading on all sides? In Spain electoral contests are not carried on with the methods followed in other countries which have a parliamentary system. No party programs are set forth, there is no exchange of ideas and ideals, we have no public meetings and reunions, no oral or written campaign for the purpose of winning over the different candidates. There is nothing of all this. Those who aspire to represent the people in Parliament, instead of going to the people to win sympathy and to present some program embodying national ideals and aspirations, go instead to the Department of the Interior and there enter into a regular bargain with the Government, the result of which, ultimately gives them their commission to Congress. Thus, as I have often said before, the Spanish Parliament in no wise represents the people; it represents the Government and the Ministers, nothing else.

If we consider now the positive result of the recent general elections, there is one outstanding and indisputable fact, the breaking up of the Republican Party. To prove this, here are figures and statistics with regard to the capital. In the elections of May, 1910, when Canalejas was Prime Minister, the Republican candidates in Madrid received over 42,000 votes; in March, 1914, when Dato was in power, the Republican candidate polling the greatest number of votes, had only 23,000; in the present elections, the same candidate had only 19,000. Thus the Republicans have lost in these two years 4,000 votes and more than 13,000 in the last six years. The fact is more striking still when we remember that the Radicals were fighting alone in 1914, but that in the recent elections they fought united with every section of the Republican party. And the increase of the Monarchist vote corresponds to the loss in the Republican. In 1905, the most popular Monarchist candidate had only 18,000 votes; in 1914, this number rose to 23,000; in 1916, the same candidate had 26,000 votes. And in order to seize the full meaning of the preceding figures, we must remember that it is in Madrid that the elections are the most thorough and give the true and genuine trend of popular feeling. Moreover, electoral absentees are to be found in the Monarchist party alone and are scarcely ever met among Republicans. Thus we can in all confidence proclaim as a certain fact the decline of the Republican party.

What are the causes of this evident decline? In my opinion, the paramount cause is the discouragement of the Republicans, their absolute lack of faith and trust, not in the ideals which they profess, but in their leaders. The Spanish proletariat, which constitutes the great mass of the Republican party, is becoming more and more convinced every day that the individuals who figure at the head of their party are men who turn politics into a means of livelihood, personal advantage and gain; men who, to an evident intellectual incapacity add an inordinate ambition and boundless egotism, and whose conduct and acts are in open contradiction with their promises and protests. Hitherto, with leaders of the intellectual caliber and austerity of conduct of Pí y Margall, Castelar, Salmeron, the Republicans constituted a real and positive power in the country. Today with mediocrities and leaders thoroughly discredited before the people, such as Lerroux, Soriano and others, Republicanism has become a gradually waning and disappearing power. So true is this, that in the recent elections, of the six Republicans running in Madrid, only two were returned, and that with the greatest labor and trouble, the journalist Señor Castrovido, editor of El Pais, and the Socialist leader, Pablo Iglesias. In the provinces, the defeat of the party has been almost as complete as in Madrid.

With regard to the results, Catholics have no reason to be dissatisfied. In the future Cortes, our number will be somewhat increased. Moreover in some districts, where hitherto it seemed almost impossible to engage in an electoral struggle against liberal "bosses" whose word had long been law, we made a brilliant fight. And that is the first step toward victory. Finally, with regard to the Mauristas, it must be noted that they made their fight alone, that is, independently of the other Monarchists, and of the "liberal" Conservatives of Señor Dato. In spite of this they received 17,000 votes in Madrid, 6,000 more than in the preceding general elections. Thus the followers of Señor Maura had more votes in Madrid than those of Count Romanones or Señor Dato, considered separately. According to official figures, the future Congress of deputies will be thus made up: Liberals 235, Conservatives 94, Mauristas 16, Catholics of every party, 13, Republicans 19, Socialist 1, other parties 31, 409 deputies in all.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

COMMUNICATIONS

Catholics in Protestant Schools

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your late numbers of AMERICA quite a deal has been said of Catholic education, especially in our boarding schools. Allow me to leap immediately in medias res by asking a very pertinent question. Why will Catholic parents insist on sending their children to non-Catholic boarding schools? Here in our jurisdiction we have five such institutions, one for girls, the others for boys. The former is a Methodist school, both in faculty control and student membership, advertised as such. Yet four young Catholic girls have been sent there by Catholic parents, to imbibe Southern culture and lose their religion. The schools for boys tell a similar story, but a sadder one, for fifty-four Catholic lads are at these four institutions. Recently the twenty-five boys at one of them missed Sunday Mass. Upon inquiry I learned that a gentleman of the Y. M. C. A. had delivered a Sunday-morning lecture to the assembled student body. This was deemed a sufficient substitute for all Sunday services, and no boys were allowed to go to church that day. Our Catholic boys had to miss Mass to listen to a Y. M. C. A. orator talk on goodness, virtue, honesty and other vague topics. A vigorous protest brought forth this statement from the authorities: "We thought your boys wanted to hear Mr. So-and-So."

Everyone knows that the South is an especially bigoted section. Yet Northern Catholics, without rhyme or reason, will pay high tuition fees to have their children educated at such schools rather than at Holy Cross, Fordham, Mt. St. Mary's or Georgetown, not to mention others, in all of which a far better education can be had, and in which clean Catholic principles of morality will be insisted upon. These few lines are written in the earnest hope that some Catholic parents may pause and consider well the school to which they intend to send their children next fall. May it not be a Protestant boarding school, above all in the South, where their religion will not only be practised with difficulty but very often treated as a byword and a jest. Fifty-four Catholic souls placed in jeopardy, not by enemies but by their parents! And the sufficient reason? Maybe Solomon could give it.

Staunton, Va. E. A. B.

Dr. Badé's Book

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is a pleasure to learn from Father O'Neill's letter in last week's AMERICA that Dr. Badé's "The Old Testament in the Light of Today" "has not been introduced as a textbook into the University of California." The statement was taken by me from the publishers' book notice, sent to reviewers. It was in keeping with Dr. Badé's assertion that "A first draft of my tentative conclusions was published in the University of California Chronicle, a little over a year ago, under the title, 'The Decalogue, a Problem in Ethical Development.'" Perhaps the Doctor's last draft about the Decalogue is worse than the "first draft" that the University of California publication fathered. I have not the issue of that publication at hand. Dr. Badé's lectures were originally given in the Berkeley Summer School of Religion. I wonder if this school is connected with California University in Berkeley?

Woodstock, Md. WALTER DRUM, S.J.

The Priestly Title

To the Editor of AMERICA:

About the use of the word "Father" as applied to a secular priest; is he not our "ghostly father" in the Sacrament of Penance, and do we not say in the Confiteor "I confess to Almighty God . . . and to thee, Father?" And he is surely (secular or regular) a spiritual father when he baptizes us. I wouldn't willingly give up addressing a priest thus.

Grand Rapids, Mich. A. K. GIBSON.

A Legion of Defense

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Yesterday I was disturbed and disgusted by reading of the arrest of three Catholic Sisters in the city of St. Augustine, in the State of Florida. We Catholics have been a long-suffering people. We have been patient and have endured a general campaign of slander; we have watched men defeated for office simply because they were Catholics; we have cowardly stood by unaffected while we have been misrepresented, mistreated, misled. We have submitted to everything. We have been passive even under the "Charity Probe." But now comes the climax of fanaticism. Three Catholic Sisters arrested in a city founded by Catholics, named after a Catholic! And for what? For teaching the Catholic religion in a Catholic school! Patience has ceased to be a virtue. What can be done? Are we going to stand by like helpless old women and let things take their course, as we have in the past, or are we going to arise like men and throw off the shackles of silence and loosen the bonds of indifference?

I have given much thought to the question of religious bigotry, and I am firmly convinced that most of it is due to ourselves. All the Menaces and all the Guardians of Liberty in the world cannot hurt us. We have none to fear but ourselves. The most dangerous diseases come from within, not from without. We take great pride in asserting that we number eighteen millions, but we do not exert the moral influence of eighteen children? We are indifferent, criminally indifferent, to the cause of Christ and the defense of our religion. We are going the way of France and Mexico. Indifference was responsible for the revolution against the Church in both these countries; indifference is growing in America; like causes produce like effects. We can save the day if we will only arouse ourselves from our lethargy. We have tolerated all kinds of slander, ridicule and abuse. It is time to call a halt. We must grasp this serpent of bigotry, grapple with it, strangle it.

Would that we had a few men like St. John the Baptist. He was strong, a lover of good, a despiser of evil. He was a fine militant apostle. He was born for a principle, he lived for a principle, he fought for a principle, he died for a principle. And that principle was the cause of Christ. We need some of his fighting spirit. We need a "Catholic sense" that will be sensitive to insult and alive to the interests of Christ. We need concerted efforts to defend the Church. Who will organize a legion of defense?

Brooklyn, N. Y. P. SCANLAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

May Days in Ireland

AN act of rebellion is an act against God. The hand that is raised against lawful authority in State or Church is a hand raised against the Almighty Himself, from whom all well-ordered authority receives its final sanction. No ebullition of patriotism can take from rebellion its true character as an act derogatory to the majesty of the God of men and nations. Such is the prescription of the natural law, reenforced by the law of Revelation and the teaching of the Catholic Church. From it there neither is nor can be an appeal that is justified in Heaven.

With all this said, who shall undertake to judge the motives of any man who gives his life that his country may live? The beginner in philosophy or law can define the nature of rebellion. But who will say that an attempt to free one's country, prompted by present wrong and the recollection of centuries of dishonoring oppression, implies in those who make it, the moral iniquity of rebellion? The crumbling walls and blackened ruins of Dublin tell why Pearse and his followers died; but from them at whose hands they died, the world may look for no truthful story of their motives or of their deeds. For the history of conquered Ireland and oppressing England is ever the same; a narrative of savagery and blood, met by intrepid patriotism and unswerving fidelity to the teachings of Jesus Christ. This is no assertion, inherited from an ancestry springing from the little Isle, set like an emerald in the gray silver of the northern seas. It is a fact which all whose eyes are not held by the red mist of hatred, plainly see.

They who in this month of May have fallen, that Ireland might take her place among the nations of the world, met their fate like men. For them no pity; their names are made forever glorious in the love and devotion of their countrymen. But all who understand their motives and many who do not, will breathe a prayer, that the God who searcheth the hearts of men, yet searcheth with an infinite love, may give them rest; and that in His own good time, He may bring their country, not the Niobe of nations, but the strong-hearted mother of saints and heroes, to the consummation reserved for peoples, as for men, who give Him all the devotion of a ready and a generous heart.

Fair Play

FAIR play is admirable, foul play is odious and scandalous. Most men play fair: not all, however. Some have no standard of honor, others have such a standard, but they lapse from it, sadly at times. Why, it were bootless to inquire.

Strange to say these defections from high ideals occur commonly enough when ministers of the Gospel foregather to discuss the interests of Christ. A notable example of this is given in these words of the Epworth Herald, recording an action of the Methodist Conference, in session at Saratoga.

Saturday, May 6. The gavel this morning is in Bishop Burt's hands. Dr. Wedderspoon of Washington has a resolution against the giving of government money to sectarian—that is, Roman Catholic—schools. The Conference promptly approves the resolution. Greetings are sent to the two African Methodist General Conferences now in session.

That is not fair play, far from it. The Methodists themselves have never hesitated to do the very thing which they set forth as a Roman Catholic trait. True the people were willing that this should be. But are not the people willing when Catholics are in question? Are our citizens so unfair that they refuse to Catholics what they grant to Methodists? Do Catholics take the money by force, rob the public treasury?

From extrinsic evidence it would appear that this motion of the "General Conference" in session at Saratoga refers to moneys appropriated for Indian schools. If so, the action of the Conference is an astounding lapse from honorable standards. The resolution calls upon our Government to violate a treaty obligation, and that is dishonorable. The resolution contains a gross misstatement of fact, and that is dishonorable. Government money is not appropriated for Roman Catholic schools. The pittance given does not and never did belong to the United States. It is the property of the Indians; the money is theirs; the United States is its guardian, not its owner, and our Government is bound in conscience to distribute that money in accordance with the legitimate desires of its owners, the Indians. They wish that a portion of it should be given to their schools, a legitimate demand which the Methodists would gainsay, thus adding another injustice to the many crimes committed against the Red Man.

A peculiarly odious feature of this thoroughly odious campaign is that all the while the sects were fighting "sectarian appropriations" for Roman Catholic schools, they themselves were recipients of these so-called appropriations, receiving money with an eager and a glad hand from the Choctaw and Chickasaw fund. The Presbyterians received a bounty for their schools at Hugo and Durant, Okla., the Campbellites for their school at Chickasha, Okla., while up to a short time since the Methodists, the very people who are now clamoring against appropriations for Roman Catholics, demanded and got money for their school at Ardmore, Okla. Each year they took the money eagerly, without hesitation or scruple until finally they sold the school building to the Government, losing nothing either in money or school influence by the transfer. Farther west the Episcopalians fought the Sioux appropriation, refused to take money from the fund; but they actually took from the Government food and clothing bought with the very money they had rejected, a fine distinction without the slightest difference. Finally this year and hereafter, sects will receive money for their schools, yet the Roman Catholics alone are the object of attacks.

Much more might be revealed in this regard, but enough has been said to show that dignified and honorable as fair play is, it is sometimes forgotten by men who are supposed to "live" it.

Bishop Burgess and the Investigators

ADDRESSING his Annual Conference at Garden City, Dr. Frederick Burgess, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, affirmed his belief that the recent "investigation" of the private charitable institutions of New York, "was not started with sincerity of purpose." The Bishop only states what is now a fairly common conviction. "Honest investigation," said Dr. Burgess, "has no need to resort to dishonest and unworthy methods," yet "at the hearings all sorts of evidence seemed to be admitted, and the public, reading the public press, received an utterly false impression." As is now fairly plain, it was the main purpose of the enemies of the private institution, to create this false impression; and to deepen it, reports were permitted

To go out from an official hearing that our babies are brought up in filth, that our children are fed as pigs are fed, that they are beaten so that the marks remain on their bodies, and so starved that Mr. Squeers' boarding-school would seem a luxurious home.

The self-styled reformers took for granted, that few who read these slanders would prove them false, by the simple device of a personal visit to the maligned institutions. However, here as always, malice overreached itself, and there now seems no good ground for believing with Bishop Burgess, that "irreparable harm has been done by these false reports." The Strong Commission gave the "reformers" a vast amount of rope, and in their use of it, they have verified the proverb. Whether or not the Grand Jury returns indictments against those of our white-souled reformers, who tapped the telephone wires in a vain attempt to secure further "proof," is really not of much consequence to the present issue. By their own confession, these paladins of civic righteousness have written themselves down as the merest of eavesdroppers. Weak indeed is the cause that invokes their assistance.

Buying a Reformation

NO film-manufacturer produces improper moving-pictures. For proof we have the assertion of many in the trade. Neither does any impressario lend his skill to the arrangement of films not utterly correct, nor can any commercial censorship be found to bless them even with a forced smile of approval. Nevertheless, moving-pictures offensive alike to good taste and morality, do exist; but since no one is responsible for their existence, no one, it would appear, made them. Like Topsy, they "just growed." This is a perplexing situation. Evils are most effectively checked at their source. But this evil has no source. What can be done?

A hopeful ray of light beams from an advertisement, recently inserted in many American newspapers, by a prominent firm of producers. "For the good of motion-pictures," counsel these wise persons, "sign this protest. Should the manager of your local theater show sensational, vulgar and unwholesome pictures? For your family's sake and the good of the community, speak up! Sign this protest and leave it at the box-office."

I am opposed to sensational and suggestive pictures. I want the best. I will support you in any conscientious effort toward bigger, cleaner, better pictures.

Apparently, these gentlemen have concluded that in the long run, decency is the best policy. If they are willing to live up to their profession, they deserve and should receive, the exclusive patronage of the public. Furthermore, if singly and by societies, the sixteen million Catholics of the United States are willing to act upon the advice proffered by this commercial firm, reform will speedily dawn over many a house of amusement. It can hardly be taken for granted, that all who don the sock and buskin, to strut across the stage or flicker across the screen, adopt by preference, a theme of impropriety. The choice is dictated largely by commercial considerations. Morality is chained to the box-office in our modern day, thereby making it easier to fight the devil of impropriety with money than with fire. If there is no other way of inducing the modern stage to return to virtuous ways, let us pay it to be good.

Sholem Aleichem

BISHOP LIGHTFOOT was only expressing a matter of world-old experience, when he said, "The thoughts that absorb you, will also mold you." His aphorism has just had another striking exemplification in Solomon Rabinowitz, an immigrant from Kieff. Soon after Solomon's marriage poor business ventures lost for him all he had, and he turned to literature, writing under the name of Sholem Aleichem. Success crowned his efforts and for many years he wrote in Yiddish for the comforting of his people. Thirty volumes came from his tireless pen, and although he confessed that life for himself was often bitter, he was an unfailing source of joy to those who read his stories. Kindly satirical, humorously playful, he saw the rift in every cloud, and with a subtle magic charmed sadness from the mind, tears from the eye, and rancor from the heart. Though his own soul groaned in silent agony, he set himself to be a purveyor of mirth. Only his countrymen know how often he changed their frowns to smiles. He never became rich, except with the supreme riches of a growing power to give happiness to others.

His will was a fitting epilogue to his writings. Its last paragraph sums up his life work, and through it there breathes a gentle spirit of peace and resignation:

> My last wish to my successors and my prayer to my children: To protect mother, to beautify her old age, to make her bitter life sweet, to heal her broken heart; not to weep for me, on the contrary, think of me with joy; and the main thing: To live together in peace, to bear no hatred one for another, to help one another in bad times, to remember one another upon occasion in the family, to have pity on a poor man, and when circumstances permit, to pay my debts, should I have any. Children, carry with honor my hard-earned Jewish name, and may God in heaven come to your help. Amen!

To the very end he was the true friend of his people. He wanted no fellowship except with them:

> Wherever I die I want to be placed not among aristocrats or among the powerful, but among plain Jewish laborers, among the very people itself, so that the gravestone that is to be placed upon my grave should illumine the simple graves about me; and these simple graves should adorn my gravestone, even as the plain, good people during my lifetime illumined their folkesschreiber.

Even before they knew his last desire, the common people of the East Side whom he loved, responded to his desire. Thousands upon thousands of them attended his funeral, and their silent grief was a testimonial of a love that for all its shabby surroundings gave a nobility to his obsequies rarely seen even in New York.

"It's Too Hard"

IN an eastern city dwells an editor one of whose ears is permanently affixed to the ground. He is auscultating the heart-throb of "the great common people" by a primitive method; he is seeking to discover what the public wants. Thoughts of the uplift and of one's sacred duty to humanity, do not surge within this gentleman's placid bosom. He is not a reformer, like the social worker; not an educator, like the philanthropic moving-picture man. He is an editor. His one task and ambition is to guide the feet of his publication along financially profitable paths. His customary posture may not please the esthetic; but the esthetic are not paying his salary. But it does please the publishers, for it pays. Apparently too, it pleases the public. They give up money for it, and such sacrifice is ample proof that they want it.

When this gentleman on Sundays or vacation days unbends to exchange confidences with another editor, a smile such as lit the faces of the two augurs immortalized by Cicero, plays about the countenance of each. There are tricks in all trades. The heart-throbs of the great common people tells the earth-clinging editor that the great common people do not want to think. The public wants to be amused; and brevity is the soul of wit. If faintly reminiscent of a comic opera or a minstrel show, skits not exceeding 100 words, do not bear down too heavily upon the public's staggering intellect. These contributions, however, approach the danger-line of thought. Reading is a slow process, an involved psychological operation, and "joke-smiths" sometimes use words that are hard to understand. Pictures, therefore, are better; not pictures that are painted; but photographs. A few lines of text, just enough to label the picture, may be allowed, but not more. Above all, never publish an article which presumes to intimate that most questions may be treated from divergent points of view. It may call for the exercise of the intellect and the effort will confuse the reader. Better contented error than troubled thought.

Adhering faithfully to these simple principles, our editor with one ear to the ground has raised his magazine from the slough of despondent debt to the affluence which comes with a subscription list of half a million. But being an intelligent person, he regards his publication with what may be safely termed contempt. The outlook for art, he thinks, and literature is not dark, but quite black. "The people want to be amused, mostly by looking at pictures. If you don't put them in your paper, they'll go to the 'movies.' People don't think nowadays; they haven't the time and it's too hard." We are a great people, no doubt, but "It's too hard," is a favorite motto. Perhaps this fact explains why low, tawdry magazines have a numerous audience, and why the "movies" are on Broadway, while Shakespeare is withdrawn in favor of a "tired business man" comedy.

The Texas Lynching

THE recent lynching in Texas is a particularly outrageous instance of the altogether reprehensible assumption of authority on the part of a mob. A prisoner had been tried and convicted of a detestable crime, that was calculated to awake the righteous wrath of any man. He was found guilty and condemned to death. Justice, however, was not allowed to take its course. A group of irresponsible and unauthorized citizens forcibly seized the negro, bound him to a tree, piled fagots about him, and burned him to death. A crowd looked on and applauded.

No one indeed but a sentimentalist of the advanced type would deprecate the exaction of the full penalty for the dastardly deeds that ended in the murder of an innocent woman. The black man richly deserved death. Nor would any normal person object if this retribution had been meted out without delay. That too would be perfectly legitimate. But the manner of the execution is another story. In the first place the men who took the negro's life had no authority to do so. They were private individuals and, as such, had no more right to put the prisoner to death than the criminal had to slay his victim. No doubt they would wax wroth over the insinuation that they are murderers. But what are they? Without authority to do so, they took a man's life. That is murder and the man who does it is a murderer.

This latest Texas lynching is particularly indefensible. The State was willing to punish the criminal as he deserved; the death sentence had been passed; there was absolutely no fear that it would not be carried out, and yet the mob defied law, order and decency and gave the world an example of brutality more worthy of savages than of civilized people. Surely Texas is not honored in these men, but then they constitute but a small fraction of the inhabitants of a great State notable for sturdy Americanism.

LITERATURE

XXVII—Silvio Pellico

DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON once said that he liked a little book, a book that he could take with him to the fire. I like little books too, and there are three small volumes written about a century ago that are special favorites of mine. Anyone who does not know them has a great pleasure in store, for to know them is to love them. They are Silvio Pellico's "My Ten Years' Imprisonment," Chamisso's "Peter Schlemihl or the Man That Lost His Shadow," and Xavier de Maistre's, "A Journey Round My Room," and of these three Silvio Pellico's is the greatest. It is just the simple story of what happened to him, the people he met, and the thoughts that came to him during the ten years' imprisonment he suffered because he had joined a political society that was under the ban of the Austrian rulers of Northern Italy. Pellico was a poet and his story is written from so close to the heart of nature that the book will live through many generations as a treasure-trove for discerning readers, and a consolation to the afflicted, for it has been translated into all the European languages, and there are many editions of it in the original Italian.

Silvio Pellico was born at Saluzzo, Italy, in 1789, the year of the fall of the Bastille. Before he was ten years old he had written a tragedy on a theme taken from Macpherson's "Ossian." His boyhood years were spent in France, but at the age of twenty-one he returned to Italy to teach French at the Soldiers' Orphans' School at Milan. Here he met Vincenzo Monti, Ugo Foscolo and other Italian writers, wrote "Laodicea," a tragedy in classical form, and one in romantic form entitled "Francesca di Rimini." The popular young dramatist then became the tutor of Count Lambertenghi's children and met at his table the distinguished European literary folk who assembled there. He thus came to know Lord Byron, whose "Manfred" he afterwards translated, Madame De Staël, Friederich Schlegel, Manzoni and others.

When thirty years old Silvio Pellico began the publication of Il Conciliatore, which professed to be a literary journal, but it was very difficult to keep literature apart from politics in those days, and besides the Austrian censor was not disposed to make fine distinctions between the two. A ruthless censorship ruined the periodical within a year. No wonder, then, that Pellico, like many a young Irishman during the nineteenth century, finding himself unable to get justice by legal redress, joined a revolutionary society. Though he was the mildest of men, his literary reputation made him a shining mark and when only thirty-one he was thrown into prison, tried as a conspirator and condemned to death.

He found he could resign himself to death, but the thought of the poignant grief that would fall on his dear ones was beyond his power to endure, so he offered this noble prayer: "My God! from Thy hand I will accept all—for me all; but deign most wonderfully to strengthen the hearts of those to whom I was so very dear! Grant Thou that I may cease to be such to them now; and that the life of the least of them may not be shortened by their care for me, even by a single day!"

His sentence was commuted, however, to fifteen years' imprisonment, so the next decade of his life he spent in a cell, being released by the general amnesty of 1830. In spite of his sufferings he lived to be sixty-five, wrote a number of other poems and plays, including a drama about Blessed Thomas More, and a religious manual on "The Duties of Man."

But Pellico's greatest work is "My Ten Years' Imprisonment." The book opens with a straightforward preface which runs thus:

> Have I penned these memorials, let me ask myself, from any paltry vanity, or desire to talk about that self? I hope this is not the case, and forasmuch as one may be able to judge in one's own cause, I think I was actuated by better views. These, briefly, were to afford consolation to some unfortunate being, situated like myself, by explaining the evils to which I was exposed, and those sources of relief which I found were accessible, even when laboring under the heaviest misfortune; to bear witness, moreover, that in the midst of my acute and protracted torments, I never found humanity, in the human instruments around me, so hopelessly wicked, so unworthy of consideration, or so barren of noble minds in lowly station, as it is customary to represent it; to engage, if possible, all the generous and good-hearted to love and esteem each other, to become incapable of hating anyone; to feel irreconcilable hatred only towards low, base falsehood, cowardice, perfidy, and every kind of moral degradation. It is my object to impress on all that well-known but often-forgotten truth, namely, that both religion and philosophy require calmness of judgment combined with energy of will, and that without such a union, there can be no real justice, no dignity of character, and no sound principles of human action.

From the austere character of this foreword, it may be inferred he expected that his prison journal would prove merely a collection of the serious moral reflections of an enforced recluse. But it is a simple, familiar story of human beings. At the beginning the author was in an ordinary prison having for companions criminals of all kinds, drunkards, women of the street, robbers and brawlers. The sympathy the sensitive young poet felt for a Magdalen is most touching, and the jeers of his companions were very natural. "As it is in prison," he says, "so it is in the world. Those who make it their wisdom to fly into a passion, to complain, to defy, to abuse, think that to pity, to love, and to console yourself with fair and gentle thoughts and images that harmonize with humanity and its great Author, is all mere folly."

For a time Pellico was in the famous Venetian prison known as "Under the Leads," the cells of which, being just beneath the roof, were intensely uncomfortable during an Italian summer. The simple story of his sufferings, his resignation, his gentleness, and his thoughtfulness for those around him, even for the jailer's daughter, is a literary classic. Then came his transfer to the Fortress of Spielberg, where on April 10, 1822, he entered the underground prisons for what must have seemed practically a life-sentence. As he was never very strong, his health was soon undermined there and his end seemed near. Indeed the patriot's death was actually reported and caused great excitement in Italy.

In the midst of all these sorrows, Pellico's unselfish solicitude for others continued, the doubts about faith that he had entertained during his earlier years were dissipated, and in the midst of his sufferings religion became his greatest consolation. Not being allowed to write, only one letter reached his family during his imprisonment, and two tragedies that he composed had to be committed to memory because his jailers refused to furnish him with writing materials, for the Government feared his manuscripts would find their way out of prison and influence his countrymen.

It was under these circumstances that one of the kindliest books in existence was written. Cervantes, writing "Don Quixote" in a debtors' prison where he was suffering for another's fault is the only good parallel case we have, and Silvio Pellico's "My Ten Years' Imprisonment" is not dwarfed even by that comparison. JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

REVIEWS

The English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century. By PAUL THUREAU-DANGIN, Secrétaire Perpétuel de l'Académie Française. Revised and Re-edited from a Translation by the late WILFRED WILBERFORCE. In Two Volumes. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $11.00.

There cannot be found in a single work a more satisfactory account of the "Catholic Revival" than M. Thureau-Dangin offers in these well-translated volumes. Evidently he mastered the vast literature bearing on the inception, progress and effects of the Oxford Movement, and with a French litterateur's unerring logic and keen power of analysis he then gathered together his material and wove it into an absorbingly interesting narrative. After sketching, in an excellent introduction, the history of the Church in England since the days of Henry VIII, the author introduces John Henry Newman, the rest of the work's 1,100 pages being practically the story of the great Tractarian's influence on his age. About him are grouped all the other actors, for the closeness of their relations with Newman determines their prominence in the book. M. Thureau-Dangin is tender toward the Ritualists. He has no doubt about the good faith of such men as Pusey, Keble and Church, and seems to believe that, had they become Catholics, the Oxford Movement would have reached an abrupt conclusion, for their conversion would have discredited in the eyes of Anglicans the ideas that led up to it, whereas the gradual adoption of Catholic practices by Protestants has brought many individuals into the Church and is preparing large groups to enter it in future. On the other hand, however, Pusey's illogical course has doubtless kept multitudes of Anglicans from becoming Catholics.

Besides writing an enthusiastic appraisal of Newman's genius, the author gives discerning sketches of the character and career of Keble, Pusey, Hurrell Froude, Ward, Church, Wiseman, Manning, Faber, Samuel Wilberforce, and the latter's gifted brother Robert, who died only a few weeks before the day set for his ordination as a Catholic priest. In the latter part of the work M. Thureau-Dangin describes the conflicts that took place between the Evangelicals and the Ritualists, gives a sympathetic account of the movement for reunion that Lord Halifax zealously strove to promote, and ends with the effects produced by Pope Leo's Pontifical Letter Ad Anglos. Though the author wrote this book to give his fellow-countrymen a correct idea of the Catholic Revival in England, the work has been so excellently done that American readers who desire a clear, impartial and complete account of that interesting movement should read M. Thureau-Dangin's brilliant work. The volumes are furnished with an excellent index and with portraits of Newman and Manning. It is a pity the book's price is so high.

W. D.

Studies in Seven Arts. By ARTHUR SYMONS. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

In reading this stimulating book, we feel as one who with a cultured interpreter or guide is led from masterpiece to masterpiece through some noble museum, and hears well-poised and illuminating comments and judgments on the marbles and canvases glistening before him. Mr. Symons is original in his views and expresses them with decided distinction. His style is not only clear of the plebeian and the commonplace, it is that of a literary aristocrat. Here and there a hint and faint suggestion of Ruskin glimmers through the finely-chiseled prose. On reading the author's description of the Cathedrals of Cologne, Amiens, Canterbury and Bourges we instinctively recall the glorious picture of St. Mark's so familiar to the admirers of the great critic of "Modern Painters" and "The Stones of Venice." Mr. Symons sets us before the writhing and tortured but living figures molded by Rodin, the paintings of Watts, Gustave Moreau, Monticelli and Whistler, makes us listen to a symphony of Beethoven, explains the ideas of Wagner and tries to solve the problem of Richard Strauss, analyzes the power and fascination of Eleonora Duse and has a word even for the "Symbolist Farce." In every chapter he is interesting. He is widely read and has a poetic insight into the beauty of the masterpieces which he sincerely admires. He thinks and writes like an artist. But he is too lenient toward art. He leaves the impression so commonly made by the neo-humanist school that art is its own law and end and that in order to represent movement, instinct, passion, life, it may dare and do anything. This is a dangerous assumption, and if logically pressed home by artists and writers of less restraint than Mr. Symonds would ultimately lead to moral depredation and the deterioration of art itself.

J. C. R.

William Joseph Chaminade. From the French of Rev. HENRY ROUSSEAU, S.M. Translated by J. E. GARVIN, S.M. Dayton, O.: The Brothers of Mary. $1.00.

It is a pleasure to welcome this English edition of the life of Father Chaminade. He is not so widely known as he deserves to be; besides, an acquaintance with this great-hearted man and his remarkable apostolate is opportune at a time when the need of greater Catholic organization is keenly felt. Born in France in 1761, he was still a young priest when the violence of the Revolution broke over his beloved country. But he was no hireling. He remained at his post, and under a thousand disguises, in the midst of imminent dangers, he rendered signal service to the cause of religion during that perilous period. Persecution did not end with the close of the Reign of Terror, and when in 1797 a new Jacobin decree obliged Father Chaminade to seek a refuge at Saragossa, what a blessed exile it proved! For there, at the shrine of Our Lady of the Pillar, his future career was revealed to him. Through Mary, France was to be brought back to Jesus. During his three years' sojourn in Spain, very definite plans had been drawn up, his soul had been steeled and strengthened, and no sooner had Father Chaminade been allowed to re-enter France than he undertook his gigantic task.

Possessing a keen insight into the wants of the times, his first step was to form sodalities of young people. For this work he was so eminently qualified by nature and by grace, that he was soon surrounded by a throng of fervent sodalists. But he was not satisfied to labor for their personal sanctification only, he would transform them into zealous missionaries, and the sodality would become a center from which every kind of Catholic activity was to issue. The next step was to select from among the sodalists a chosen band known as the "religious staff." They took vows of chastity, obedience and devotion to the apostolate of youth, and they soon constituted the soul of the sodality. The final step in this regular gradation was the formation of two religious institutes, the Society of Mary, and the Daughters of Mary. Both of these Congregations spread rapidly during the lifetime of their saintly founder and grew so fast that today only sixty-four years after his death, the Society of Mary, in addition to its numerous foundations in almost every European country, includes two provinces in this country, as well as schools in Japan, the Hawaiian Islands, Honolulu and Northern Africa.

D. J. C.

On the Art of Writing. By Sir ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH, M.A. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

"Let me say that of all the books written in these hundred years there is perhaps none you can more profitably thumb and ponder than . . . 'The Idea of a University'. . . . It has missed to be appraised at its true worth . . . The book is so wise—so eminently wise—as to deserve being bound by the young student of literature for a frontlet on his brow and a talisman on his writing wrist." That is what the author of this excellent volume thinks of Newman's great work and he frequently quotes the Cardinal's writings to exemplify the literary virtues of accuracy, perspicuity, persuasiveness, and appropriateness. Burke is another of Sir Arthur's favorites and Shakespeare too of course. These are three masters he would have studied constantly by those who would learn the art of writing. Echoing Sir Joshua Reynolds's advice to young painters the author observes: "The more extensive your acquaintance is with the works of those who have excelled, the more extensive will be your power of invention, and what may appear still more like a paradox the more original will be your conceptions." He urges his young Cambridge hearers to practise verse assiduously if they would learn to write good prose for there is no better means of acquiring distinction of style. Always highly practical and rich in examples, the book gives young writers such excellent precepts as these:

> (1.) Almost always prefer the concrete word to the abstract; (2) Always prefer the direct word to the circumlocution; (3) Generally use transitive verbs, that strike their object; and use them in the active voice, eschewing the stationary passive with its little auxiliary its's and was's, and its participles getting into the light of your adjectives, which should be few. For, as a rough law, by his use of the straight verb and by his economy of adjectives you can tell a man's style, if it be masculine or neuter, writing or "composition."

The chapter "On Jargon" is full of sage counsel for those fond of "bromides"; "Murder your darlings" is the ruthless command "fine" writers receive, and the pages "On Style" are among the best in the book. Though the chapters treating of "Literature in Our Universities" do not seem to belong in a volume professing to teach the "Art of Writing," they are very interesting and, like the rest of the book, are pervaded by the author's learning, humor and literary discernment.

W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. Stephen Whitman's "Children of Hope," (Century, $1.40) is a whimsical tale of the adventures that befall a rather seedy gentleman and his three artistically ambitious daughters, when the coming of an unexpected fortune sent them on their first trip to Europe and enabled them to spend some months in Italy. It is overcrowded with incident and somewhat lacking in unity. It is a clean story, which is high praise in these days, but not very interesting.——Mrs. Humphrey Ward's "A Great Success," (Hearst's International Library, $1.25) is built on familiar lines. A clever lecturer yields for a time to the glamour of social distinction and causes some heart-pangs to his devoted wife by his neglect. He is disillusioned in the end, and comes to recognize that he has underestimated the worth of domestic happiness. This effect is brought about by the wife, who forgets the pique of personal slights to save from a great misfortune the woman who threatens her own happiness. The book will add little to Mrs. Ward's reputation, although its faults are mostly of a negative character.——In "Alice Devine," (Bobbs-Merrill, $1.25) Mr. Edgar Jepson has strung together some satirical studies of English life in a rather amusing way. The children in the story and Alice, who is only a grown-up child, are its best feature.——"The Proof of the Pudding," (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.35) by Meredith Nicholson has a very unattractive girl as the chief character of the story. She associates with a worthless set and shows little affection for her benefactor, but secures a better husband than she deserves.——"The Strange Cases of Mason Brant," (Lippincott, $1.25) is the title of an interesting volume of detective stories by Nevil Monroe Hopkins. Radium and wireless play deadly parts in certain murders that occur, but Mr. Brant, who is rather reminiscent of Sherlock Holmes, catches the culprits.

Among recent books that little children will like are "That's Why Stories" (Lothrop, Lee & Shepherd, $1.00), "Seven Fairy Tales from the Portuguese and Spanish" (Benziger, $0.30), and "Little Donald" (Benziger, $0.75). In the first, Ruth O. Dyer draws on her profound knowledge of fairy lore and gives satisfactory solutions of twenty-five problems that perplex little folk who visit the country. When she has explained, for example, "Why the Dandelion's Stem is Short," or "Why the Pine-Tree Moans in Winter," the question is settled forever. Besides, there are lots of pictures. The fairy tales in the second little book are all of the orthodox type, with princesses, knights, wizards and spells figuring prominently in each. But Mrs. Innes-Browne's story of "Little Donald" has to do with the romantic adventures of a poor Scotch boy of today.

The Catholic Mind for May 22 is an excellent number to put into the hands of youths and maidens who, now that their school days are drawing to a close, have begun to think what career they will follow, for in choosing a calling, God's claims must not be overlooked. In the opening paper of the issue Archbishop Hanna describes the thorough training the seminary gives the young men who as priests are to be "other Christs" and, like St. Paul, "God's coadjutors" in saving souls. The Rev. Thomas M. Knapp, S.J., then tells the story of two young ladies, one of whom becomes a society leader and the other a Sister of Charity. He describes the lives they lead, and then asks the thoughtful reader which of the two really took "Her Place in the World" with credit and nobility. The refutation of a new slander that has been published about Father Damien has given the Catholic Standard and Times an opportunity to describe once more that heroic priest's life of sacrifice and the article is reprinted in the current Catholic Mind to show our young people that the Church still produces men and women of lofty holiness. The number concludes with a short exposition of the advantages of the religious life.

The valuable little book entitled "The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries according to the Conclusions of Harnack" (Herder, $0.50), is a good translation of the analysis the Rev. Jean Rivière made of this distinguished German scholar's tribute to the Church. Part I deals with "The Facts" of Christianity's spread: "The Historical Development," "Social Penetration," and "The Geographical Development." Part II takes up "The Causes": "The Environment," "The Christian Doctrine," "The Christian Life," and "The Obstacles." The work is an excellent apologetic. ——"Behold: Thy King Cometh to Thee!" (Wagner, $0.60), by the Rev. J. R. Taylor, is well described as "plain and practical instructions and readings for the preparation of first communicants." In an appendix are added good counsels for a child's first confession, but one of "The Seven Capital Sins" has been omitted.

The May Month is a highly literary number. Edith Cowell contributes a diverting paper on "Some Relatives." The Editor writes feelingly on the difference between "Poetry and Verse" and has chosen well the three poems he publishes. Particularly appropriate for May is Theodore Maynard's sonnet "In Domo Johannis":

Here rest the thin worn hands which fondled Him,
The trembling lips which magnified the Lord
Who looked upon His handmaid, the young, slim
Mary at her meek tasks. And here the sword
Within the soul of her whose anguished eyes
Gazed at the stars which watched Gethsemane,
And saw the sun fail in the stricken skies.
In these dim rooms she guards the treasury
Of her white memories—the strange, sweet face
More marred than any man's, the tender, fain
And eager words, the wistful, human grace,
The mysteries of glory, joy and pain,
And that hope, tremulous, half sob, half song,
Ringing through night, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

Father Thurston tells about divers holy men of old who were addicted to multiplying their genuflections, St. Sabas, for example, contriving to get in 2,000 a day. H. S. Dean gives an appreciation of the late Wilfrid Ward, and the war is the theme of several other articles.

President Wilson, in his essay "On Being Human" (Harper, $0.50), confirms his reputation as a sentence-builder. The book is a letter to the people, urging a clear-headed balance in these unbalanced times. The age demands, he says, not a fiery, blustering type, but a shrewd observer, acting in accordance with the broad principles of history. Humanness is variously defined: "This is our conception of a truly human man; a man in whom there is a just balance of the faculties, a catholic sympathy—no brawler, no fanatic, no pharisee; not too credulous in hope, not too desperate in purpose; warm, but not hasty; ardent and full of definite power, but not running about to be pleased and deceived by every new thing." And again: "The art of being human is the art of freedom and of force." Mr. Wilson must, of course, suppose that the foundations of ideal humanness is a realization of the supernatural and a firm adherence to the moral law. Of these principles, however, he neither says nor hints anything.

"Under the Country Sky" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25) by Grace S. Richmond is a book that suggests the freshness and purity of the open air. Georgiana Warne is a steadfast, devoted heroine, old-fashioned in her ideals, yet modern in her grasp of situations. Born to the country, she enters urban life by her marriage to the eminent surgeon, Dr. Craig, while her city-bred cousin, finds happiness by settling in the country. The plot is well developed and leads to a satisfying conclusion. Though Mrs. Richmond is "the novelist of the home" she falls just a little this side of that reality which is desirable in novels of the home-life.——In "First Base Faulkner" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25) "Christy" Mathewson of the New York "Giants" has written a healthy and interesting story for boys about the national pastime. It is a real baseball story, dealing with the efforts of a manly fellow to win a place on the school team. The book is well written, showing the vigorous and cordial friendship of two friends, and will appeal to all boys who are interested in the great American game.——That dreary old theme, a married woman's passion for a man not her husband, spoils "Those Gillespies" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.35), Mr. William John Hopkins's recent novel. Otherwise his fertile imagination and whimsical style would have made the book worth reading.—— With his usual literary skill Mr. Robert Herrick has told the story of "The Conscript Mother" (Scribner, $0.50), an Italian woman, who in her eagerness to see her son once more, actually penetrated to the firing line.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
The Irish Orators, a History of Ireland's Fight for Freedom. By Claude G. Bowers. Illustrated with Photographs. $1.50; Lyrics of War and Peace. By William Dudley Foulke, LL.D. $1.00.

Catholic Truth Society, London:
New Thought, Briefly Considered in Seven Letters. By Leslie Moore. Three pence; Everlasting Punishment. By Rev. Joseph Rickaby, S.J.; Caroline Chisholm, the Emigrant's Friend. By G. Elliot Anstruther; Chocolate Cigarettes and Other Stories. By Agnes Henderson; Pope Joan. By Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J.; Four Conferences. By the Very Rev. Monsignor Benson; With Mary at Communion; With Jesus at Communion; Christ the Healer; Maxims of St. Thomas Aquinas; With Jesus at Holy Mass. One penny each.

The Canadian Messenger, Montreal:
John de Brébeuf, Apostle of the Hurons; Gabriel Lalemant, Victim of the Iroquois; Anthony Daniel, Victim of the Iroquois; Charles Garnier, Victim of the Iroquois; Noël Chabanel, Missionary in Huronia. All by E. J. Devine, S.J. Five cents each.

Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York:
Discourses on the Sober Life. By Luigi Cornaro. $0.25.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The New International Encyclopædia. Second Edition. Vols. XIX and XX, Polk-Shilluk.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Mothers. By George Hirschfeld. Translated and with an Introduction by Professor Ludwig Lewisohn. $0.75; Tennis for Women. By Molla Bjurstedt and Samuel Crowther. Illustrated from Photographs. $1.25; Scouting with Kit Carson. By Everett T. Tomlinson. Illustrated by John Frost. $1.25; Wild Animal Ways. By Ernest Thompson Seton. With 200 Drawings by the Author. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Vision and Vesture. By Charles Gardner. $1.50; Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper, 1914-1915. By Christian Mallet. $1.00; The Cathedrals of Great Britain: Their History and Architecture. By the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield. $1.75.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
A Song of the Guns. By Gilbert Frankau, R.S.A. $0.50; Kitchener's Mob. By James Norman Hall. $1.25; What Is Your Legion? By Grace Fallow Norton. $0.25; Through Glacier Park: Seeing America First with Howard Eaton. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. With Illustrations. $0.75; The Latchstring to Maine Woods and Waters. By Walter Emerson. $2.00; A History of the Third French Republic. By C. H. C. Wright. With Illustrations. $1.50; How to Know the Mosses. By Elizabeth Marie Dunham. With Illustrations by the Author. $1.25; Under the Apple-Trees. By John Burroughs. $1.25.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Idyls and Sketches. By Sister M. Blanche. $1.00; The Prayer Book for Boy Scouts. By Rev. Thomas S. McGrath. $0.15 and $0.35.

Little, Brown & Co., New York:
Criminality and Economic Conditions. By William Adrian Bonger. $5.50.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Fruits of the Life of Prayer, Short Considerations on the Seven Words of Our Lord from the Cross. Written for the Use of an Inclosed Sister. By the late Rev. B. W. Maturin. $0.10; Devotions from Ancient and Mediæval Sources (Western). Translated and Arranged by the Rev. Charles Plummer, M.A. $1.75.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Battle and Other Poems. By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson. $1.25; Filibusters and Financiers: the Story of William Walker and His Associates. By William O. Scroggs, Ph.D. $2.50; Reveries Over Childhood and Youth. By William Butler Yeats. Illustrated. $2.00.

Monastery of Gethsemani, Gethsemani, Ky.:
Trappist Life at the Abbey of Gethsemani. $0.25.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
On the Art of Writing. By Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, M.A. $1.50; A Month in Rome. By André Maurel. Authorized English Edition Translated by Helen Gerard. With 116 Illustrations and 32 Maps. $1.75; Unhappy in Thy Daring. By Marius Lyle. $1.35.

Sherman, French & Co., Boston:
Paradoxical Pain. By Robert Maxwell Harbin, A.B., M.D. $1.25.

Silver, Burdett & Co., New York:
The Progressive Music Series. By Horatio Parker, Osbourne McConathy, Edward Bailey Birge, W. Otto Miessner. Catholic Edition. Edited by Right Rev. Joseph Schrembs, D.D., and Rev. Gregory Huegle, O.S.B. Book Two. $0.35.

Small, Maynard & Co., Boston:
One More Chance. By Lewis E. MacBrayne and James P. Ramsay. $1.50.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Father Bernard's Parish. By Florence Olmstead. $1.25.

Joseph F. Wagner, N. Y.:
Plain Sermons by Practical Preachers, Original Sermons on the Gospels or Epistles of All the Sundays and the Principal Feasts. 2 Vols. $3.00.

EDUCATION

II—Going to College

IT is a very pleasant thing to look back upon one's college days. You remember so vividly that wide stretch of campus, with the college buildings looking out over its green lawn; you remember the walks made historic by the promenades of thousands of the old boys; you remember the tennis courts, the baseball diamond, the football field; you remember the throngs of gay people who used to fill the high tiers of seats at the famous contests; you remember the days in early June when the green grass, and the budding trees, and the warm sunlight, and the blue sky were calling, calling in their insistent appeal to your willing heart; you remember the winter nights when under the crackling stars the world was a thing of white, and the snow and the cold were building fragile palaces with a defter hand than fairies ever dreamed; you remember the first days of the college year, when the old halls and the campus would wake up after the siesta of summer; you remember the companionships renewed, the glad, unselfish friendships, the month after month of joyous comradeship with those whom you loved and who loved you in return; you remember the commencement season, when after the glory of degree-giving and prize-awarding the splendor and gaiety would melt away, the fellowship of the year would dissolve, and only the lonely spirit of unavailing sadness would linger about the college grounds. You remember all these things, and many more that seem to elude the words you would voice them in, intangible things, subtle things, that steal into your soul with their facile charm and bring the tender, wistful longing to your eyes.

All this is sentimental rhapsodizing, half-poetic reverie, a kind of harmless, minor lunacy, like dreams of Italian roses and sweet-scented nights under moon-bathed skies. But none of us is disposed to ask pardon for these backward glances, for they all seem too hallowed, and too precious, and too personal to admit of reproof. Moreover, whether we have gone to college or not, we all have our recollections of old, happy, far-off things, of sweet yesterdays that creep into our todays and make them mellow and warm and endurable. It helps us live more nobly, and plan more splendid mansions for future endeavor, if once in a while we open the flood-gates and bid the tide of memories advance, and let them surge lovingly and eagerly and beseechingly, flashing their glories in a light that never was on sea or land.

But to be sentimental is a luxury; and we should not indulge too often if we would not have reminiscence become a cloying commonplace. It would be better now to view the college course a little more dispassionately and detachedly, and judge it as it unfolds itself rather than bless it with unqualified affection in after years, when days full of plotting and planning make academic life seem the golden age.

What Is a College?

A college in full operation is a plant consisting of teachers and students, books and apparatus, laboratories and recitation rooms. If you should visit a typical American college, you would be convinced that all these elements unite to form a rather busy institution. And they do. The business of education is a busy work. In the course of your visit you would hear a serious-looking youth translating into English Pliny's letter to his emperor about the proposed treatment of the Christians; another analyzing the causes of Roman enmity against ancient Carthage; a third describing the relations between medieval universities and the Papacy; a fourth explaining the matter of Doctor Johnson's dictatorship in English letters of the eighteenth century; a fifth summing up the characteristics of the times of Frederick the Great. Or you could watch students conducting interesting experiments with test tubes and dry batteries; you could hear a class discussing the advantages and disadvantages of a protective tariff system; you could listen to the details of a contrast between William James's theory of life and the opinions of Monsieur Henri Bergson.

All this is very well; one would imagine that a college training surely justifies itself. And, all things considered, it undoubtedly does. But of all those young men whom you have seen in classroom or laboratory, how many really know what it is all about? A boy learns French, and chemistry, and economics, and history, but how vital to him are all these studies, how closely do they touch his actual life, how often do they impress on his personality something that may be considered of real worth?

Current Topics at College

These are difficult questions to answer; probably in the present state of experimental psychology it is quite impossible to reach a definite conclusion. But if you go with these students to their rooms, or accompany them on their walks, or sit with them on the benches in the college yard, you will hear very little conversation that seems to demand a college education as a preparation. It would be absurd, of course, to expect the exuberant spirits of youth to make the text-book the burden of small talk, but it would appear reasonable to expect that small talk should not be the burden of conversation. It is interesting, to be sure, to discuss the relative merits of two wrestlers, the reasons for the demoralization of a favorite professional baseball team, the claims to stellar fame of a popular vaudeville artist, the improvements in next year's motor-cars, or the difficulty of playing a certain golf course in par. All of these subjects are current, entertaining, somewhat vital topics, and college men converse very fluently upon them. But there are other topics, just as alive, quite as up-to-date, and decidedly more important, upon which college men have rather unimportant opinions. Except among the students of the keenest minds there is very little enlightened talk on, let us say, the work of the sixty-third Congress, the probable causes of the present war, the expediency of an income-tax law, the most recent South American explorations, or the poetry of John Masefield.

The Plane of Intelligence

Perhaps it is not altogether needful that college youths should have much discussion on these topics; sometimes men who are quite learned, who are full men in the Baconian sense, indulge in serious conversation less often than one might expect. After all, it is quite the fashion out of school as well as within to gossip rather than to converse. Nobody seems to wish his friends to discover that he views the world as aught but a play, and a pleasant comedy at that. It is a diverting little convention to which all of us, sooner or later, in some degree subscribe.

It would be pleasing if one could be sincere in thus disposing of the matter; but one can be sincere in nothing but one's charity. For the melancholy fact is that the majority of our sophomores and juniors, yes, and seniors, too, do not know anything very valuable about some of the comparatively important subjects of the day; and their ignorance does not cause them a noticeable anxiety. Probably more than one college graduate who is out in life today will remember, when he looks back on his academic years, that the general intelligence among the students was leveled down to a not very high plane. Men who knew more than their fellows had to be rather careful not to exhibit their knowledge too often; such erudition was respected, but not precisely encouraged. To be a choice and master spirit was not identical with intellectual leadership, but rather with ability to measure up or down to the ideas of mediocrity in the mass; to be an average man, with a personality somewhat but not conspicuously above the average.

DOES THE COLLEGE STIMULATE?

There may be many reasons why a college student may wish to seem unlearned; but undoubtedly the fact that he really is lacking in information is due, at least in a large part, to the widespread apathy among college men in regard to reading the newspapers, the better class of magazines, and books other than fiction. For most college youths a newspaper means the headlines of the first page, the athletic news, and the cartoons of a popular artist; a magazine means a collection of stories known as light fiction vamped out by indifferently clever writers for the delectation of minds not given to high-power thinking; a book means a novel usually, rarely a volume of stimulating essays or a choice biography.

To be very truthful about the whole matter the college course does not seem to make a sufficiently large number of boys awake, alive, eager to make the most out of the half a century, more or less, which they expect to live. And perhaps the best explanation of the problem, even if it be not a solution, is that the vast multitude of college students do not quite realize the worth of four years, they do not know the price at which to appraise it, they do not enjoy a sure vision of a certain goal, they do not experience a feeling of genuine, sincere purpose. They say that they go to college for education, but they speak a language of the lips, without the voice of the heart. JOSEPH F. WICKHAM.

SOCIOLOGY

Brownson House: Los Angeles

IN March, 1901, Rev. John J. Clifford, then assistant at the Cathedral, urged upon a group of Catholic women of the Cathedral Aid Society the need for Catholic social work in a crowded district of Los Angeles. He had been requested to do this by the pastor of the parish of Our Lady of Angels where the necessity was most urgent. The Rt. Rev. George Montgomery, who was at that time Bishop of the diocese, gave his hearty approval to the project and until his departure for San Francisco was a strong supporter of the work. The name of the new settlement was suggested by Rev. John J. Clifford. It is the name of Orestes Brownson, the noted American Catholic writer, whose zeal in the service of truth was to be an inspiration to the work just begun. In June, 1903, the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Conaty came to preside over the See of Monterey and Los Angeles. He at once became acquainted with the little settlement, though it was struggling to do the needed work only in a modest way and in most inadequate quarters. From that day, Bishop Conaty was the mainstay of the undertaking.

In 1904, he purchased property and built the present settlement house at 711 Jackson Street, a location which was occupied in January, 1905; and, in 1913, he again demonstrated his faith in the enterprise by securing another and larger site where a greater settlement may be built. The name of Bishop Conaty is inseparably linked with all the success and development of Brownson House.

A CONSTRUCTIVE PURPOSE

The purpose of Brownson House Settlement Association is best set forth in its constitution:

> The object of this Association shall be to establish and to maintain a Catholic Social Settlement which shall be a center for personal service and mutual helpfulness, for civic, social, and religious betterment in sections of Los Angeles where conditions of living are difficult, and where Catholics of poor circumstances and foreign birth abound; to preserve this spirit of mutual friendliness, respect and service, in all the relations of this Association with its neighbors of every race and creed.

From this, it will be seen that the aim is to do constructive social work and to do it by a really cooperative method. To make its plans still more effective, Brownson House maintains a staff of experienced paid workers who devote all or part of their time to the work. At present, there are four such paid workers. These form a substantial nucleus about which the efforts of the volunteer workers center, thus producing a higher efficiency. There are seventy-five volunteers, men and women, now in active service. In the present house the accommodation is unfortunately limited to two residents. In the proposed new settlement house there will be provision for a greatly increased number of resident workers.

The neighbors of Brownson House are of many nationalities, races and creeds. Though Mexicans and Catholics largely predominate, there are also Italians, Poles, French, Basque, Slavonians, Portuguese, Japanese and also Jewish people from many countries. The privileges of the house are open to all without distinction and with absolutely no vexing conditions.

VARIED ACTIVITIES

The activities of Brownson House are many and varied. They include a constant daily succession of clubs, classes, clinics, etc., at the settlement house besides the work which is carried on in the homes. Though it has taken many years of quiet, friendly contact to gain the influence in the community which Brownson House possesses today, yet a genuine friendship and a mutual confidence cannot be gained in any other way. Brownson House has studiously avoided all formalism and rigidity; it had striven to retain its primitive flexibility and responsiveness to all real needs and to adapt itself to all changing conditions.

The religious work for the Catholic neighbors, adults and children, has always been a prominent feature at the House. The Settlement's most important function is to preserve and to strengthen the religious faith and practice of the immigrant, and, on this sound basis, to help him to adapt himself to the best American standards of living and citizenship. In many cases, primitive necessities must be supplied and external obstacles removed, before effective religious work can be done. Often specific living conditions, or other difficulties of long standing, have entailed results which have checked the development of spiritual aspiration, and these hindrances must yet be overcome. Mass is celebrated at the Settlement House every Sunday. Religious instruction classes are held on Sunday after Mass, and during the week. Many children are prepared for the Sacraments, and adults are brought back to the earnest practice of their early faith.

CLUBS AND CLASSES

During the week the calendar of House activities reveals a full program for each day and evening. There are separate sewing and housekeeping clubs for girls from under seven to over twenty years of age; for boys there is a workshop with a trained instructor. When the boys and girls become sufficiently proficient to make salable articles, these are sold, and the young maker receives the price minus the wholesale cost of the material used. Boys over twelve years of age may become Boy Scouts; the Brownson House Troop is now regularly enrolled as Company A, 67th Infantry, United States Boy Scouts, and is doing remarkable work. There are sewing and social gatherings for women, in their own homes and in the Settlement House, with many practical benefits for the home. There is a library with good books for home reading and a story hour for little children. There are music lessons at a nominal price for children of talent. There are hot and cold shower baths, a playground, and a clothing bureau. Several mornings are devoted exclusively to the tiny children who are not old enough to go to school, and there is an English and citizenship class for men and women.

ENTERTAINMENTS AND HOME WORK

Once a month a neighborhood entertainment is given and whole families come to enjoy the program. Many numbers on these programs are contributed by the neighbors themselves. Once a week there is a neighborhood dance, and great care is exercised by the young people to maintain the high standard of these parties. National celebrations, private parties, and other social gatherings, etc., are sometimes held at Brownson House. The holidays are all remembered, and there are excursions, "hikes," and picnics from time to time.

The Settlement keeps ever in mind the importance of the home, and always seeks to keep well united father, mother and children, in order that they may advance together and develop their own resources.

All the home work is under the direction of an experienced worker who is assisted by volunteer friendly visitors. Great care is taken to preserve always the genuine friendliness which characterizes the whole work. Mexican handiwork is sold, and employment secured, whenever possible, through the State Municipal Employment Bureau and through private sources. A great effort is made to assist boys of working age to secure positions which promise advancement.

CLINICS

There are three clinics at Brownson House each week. One is for the crippled and deformed, and is under the charge of Dr. John Carling who volunteers his expert services and is assisted by Dr. Elizabeth Saphro. Many of the children have been cured of physical disabilities, and saved from the ranks of the handicapped. Another clinic is the Maternity Dispensary for which the use of the House is given to the city on one morning each week. This work is in charge of Dr. Lyle G. McNeile, assistant health commissioner of Los Angeles, aided by Dr. Olga McNeile. Prenatal care and instruction are given to expectant mothers. Many unborn lives are preserved, and many little children come into the world endowed with a greater vitality and promise for the future, because of the care and instruction given in this clinic. The third clinic is the Infant Welfare Station, also under the Los Angeles Health Department which conducts six such stations in the city. Brownson House is placed at the service of the city for this work also. On one afternoon each week, the babies are brought for examination, proper feeding is prescribed and the mothers are carefully instructed. Miss Grace V. Ream and Dr. Elizabeth Saphro are in charge. Brownson House is also one of the city pure milk distributing stations.

Brownson House Settlement Association believes in educative and preventive work, and seeks to remove causes rather than to strive merely to palliate results. It cooperates with the many splendid public agencies of Los Angeles and keeps in close touch with them. It is endorsed by the Municipal Charities Commission and belongs to the National Federation of Settlements.

SOCIOLOGICAL INSTRUCTION

To advance the cause of education for social work in order to meet the pressing social needs of our time, Brownson House has provided lectures on social subjects. In the summer of 1914, Rev. Frederic Siedenburg, S.J., of the Loyola University School of Sociology, Chicago, gave twelve lectures in Los Angeles under the auspices of the settlement. Rev. Edward F. Gareschè, S.J., of St. Louis lectured, under the same auspices, in October, 1915. Since 1914, regular monthly social study meetings have been held at the Settlement House under the leaderships of prominent local social workers. Beginning January 11, 1916, these monthly meetings were developed into a regular course of weekly lectures planned and directed by Rev. William E. Corr. All lectures are open to the public.

RESULTS AND NEEDS

Brownson House is supported by the annual subscriptions and donations of generous people, and by an occasional campaign for funds. The subjoined figures will give some idea of the conditions at the House during the year ending March 1, 1916: Residents, 2; paid workers (whole time), 2; paid workers (part time), 2; volunteer workers, 75; new patients in dispensary, 235; babies in welfare station, 70; visits in homes, 1,200; garments collected (estimated), 6,000; books in library, 1,000; weekly deposit of books from public library, 50; distribution of milk (daily), 17; aggregate attendance (weekly), 1,500.

The greatest specific need of Brownson House at present is the proposed new and more commodious Settlement House with increased provision for resident workers. In such a place as has been planned, the House can provide for the expansion and development of its many activities and yet preserve that neighborly and informal character which brings so closely together the lives of its workers and the lives of its neighbors, with so much of benefit to both. MARY J. WORKMAN.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The fifth annual report of the United States Steel and Carnegie Pension Fund shows a disbursement of $2,234,410.75 since the inception of this plan. The total distribution for the year 1915 was $659,389.42. The average age pension during this year was $62.84; the average service pension, $28.34; the monthly pension, $20.85. The smallest pension paid is twelve dollars a month, the largest not more than one hundred dollars a month. The fund itself consists of the old $4,000,000 relief fund established by Carnegie and $8,000,000 added by the Steel Corporation. In spite of the danger inherent in the power which a firm acquires over its men by the pension system, it is doubtless a great blessing to the workman provided that just wages are paid him at all times.

The summer course in Church music, conducted under the auspices of the Society of St. Gregory, will be given at Baltimore, from July 24 to August 12, for all who wish to acquaint themselves more perfectly with this important feature of Church services. The class lessons in traditional Gregorian chant will be held twice a day under the direction of Rev. Leo P. Manzetti, who is likewise director of the Schola Cantorum of St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore. Besides the course in plain chant another class will be organized for the study and interpretation of polyphonic and modern Church music and private lessons can likewise be had. The course is "lectural" in part only. Once the students have mastered the theory and principles of Gregorian and figured music they are formed into a real schola for the rendition of each.

The problem of rural credits calls for most serious attention, not merely that the American farmer may be saved from frequent danger of complete ruin, but likewise that the welfare of consumers in our cities may be safeguarded. The realization of this fact led to the appointment of two commissions whose duty it was to study agricultural operations in Europe. Their recommendations brought about the introduction of the Moss-Hollis Bill now pending in Congress. Writing in the Central-Blatt and Social Justice, Mr. Louis Budenz states that the rural credit methods of Europe, including the famous Reiffeisen system, are inadequate for our newer and more extended needs, while the Moss-Hollis Bill will answer them satisfactorily. He has the following urgent appeal to make to our Catholic societies:

> The desirability of the proposed legislation is certainly apparent, and the review of the Moss-Hollis Bill should serve to show that that measure meets the requirements of the present time in the agricultural industry. Our Catholic societies throughout the country should interest themselves actively in this matter. This is par excellence a reform measure in the interest and for the welfare of the middle class. And middle class reforms, measures that will tend to strengthen that division of society and to prevent a further deterioration of its members into the ranks of the proletariat, particularly commend themselves to us. They are in fact the objects of our special consideration and solicitude. In our district leagues and local organizations, particularly in the farming districts, this important piece of legislation should be discussed and action should be taken whereby it will be materially advanced toward passage and a place on the statute books. Up to the present time, it has been entirely too much neglected.

The Bill provides for a non-partisan Federal Farm Loan Board, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury and four members appointed by the President, all of whose time must be devoted to this work. The loans to farmers are to be made by twelve or more Federal land banks, each operating in a separate district. The further details of the Bill are briefly outlined in the article quoted.

"Preserve our ancient names!" was the appeal made to the United States Government by the Blackfoot Indians. They asked that white men's names should not be given to the mountains, lakes, rivers, waterfalls, and other natural features of Glacier National Park, in Montana, which had been sold by them to the Government in 1896. "Time was," the Indians said, "and not so long ago, when we owned all the country from Saskatchewan to Yellowstone and from the summit of the Rockies eastward for some hundreds of miles. We desire to have some memorial of our wise and brave fathers who ruled that vast domain, and what more fitting than that their own mountains should be their monuments?" To take the Indian names from the scenic features of the National Park would be to deprive the Park of much of its charm and poetry. There is beauty as well as historic association in the ancient names that still remain throughout our land in memory of a race that has almost passed way. They are likewise, it is true, a sad and terrible reproach to the nation which has practically exterminated the tribes of the Red Man. Perhaps the darkest page in American history is that which tells of the white man's cruelty, faithlessness and injustice toward the Indian aborigines. Many of the most hideous and pitiful tales of starvation and destruction are not even recorded, or can only be learned from scattered allusions, such as may be found in Laveille's "Life of Father De Smet." Worst of all was the unscrupulous attempt made, under Government protection, to rob the Indian of that Faith which the early Catholic missionaries had implanted in his heart at the cost of heroic labors and terrible sacrifices. Catholic Spain preserved, educated and Christianized the barbarous tribes wherever the missionary's cross was planted; but Puritan and non-Catholic America relentlessly hunted, butchered or starved the Indians. The white man's plighted word was broken in the most criminal ways and his vices were communicated to the children of the forest, who in the hands of the missionary had shown themselves amenable to all the doctrines and practices of Christianity. History has scarcely begun to record the full truth. It were but fair to afford what spiritual and temporal blessings we can to the small remnant of these tribes to repay them for the wrong done their fathers.

The fiftieth annual report of St. Francis Hospital, New York, tells of the magnificent work accomplished during half a century by the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis. Their hospital, as the medical staff of the institution states, "occupies the enviable position of one whose sole duty is the care of the sick poor." The sixth of their house rules expressly provides that, "The poor will always be received free of charge. Those who are able will be expected to pay a moderate sum toward the support of the hospital." On May 1, 1865, one Sister and a postulant came from St. Peter's Hospital in Brooklyn to two totally empty and unfurnished houses obtained through a loan:

> The Sisters had no means whatever, and no financial support, but simply willing hands and stout hearts, and that firm belief in a Divine Providence and confidence in the generosity of the people, which have ever been the strong staff of these Sisters. The loaf of bread that the postulant brought was their sole food supply for the first day, and the empty straw tick that each carried, after being filled with straw by a friendly undertaker in the neighborhood, was the only furnishing for their humble quarters.

So the great work was begun, and in this spirit it has been carried on to the present day. Harboring 351 patients during the year 1865, the Sisters, after half a century of devoted labor, are able to show a record of 3,808 cases cared for in 1915, with 2,037 operations performed and 122,559 days' treatment given in that single year. Success has not lessened their love of poverty and simplicity. They are called "Sisters of the Poor" not merely because the sick poor have the first claim on their service, but "because they themselves are to be poor, alike in everything unto these." From the training school which is now to be established in the hospital, for the benefit of the younger Sisters, will go forth in time to come the highest type of the trained nurse. It is in such as these that the charity of Christ resplendently manifests itself within the Catholic Church.

The rector of Trinity Episcopal Church in Newark, "a fashionable downtown church" of that city, was recently requested by members of his vestry to hand in his resignation. The invitation, he said, was due to his refusal to suppress passages in his sermons calculated to make sinners feel uncomfortable. Other reasons may likewise have existed, judging from the subjects of some of his sermons. The instructions which the minister claims were given him by the vestrymen of his church, afford an interesting illustration of what is likely to be expected today of clergymen outside the Catholic Church. The Newark minister thus pictures the situation:

> Not long ago I was deeply distressed by having a member of the vestry say, in a serious, friendly conversation, that his idea of running a church was that it should be run, just as a grocery store is run, to please the patrons. No one could run a successful grocery store, he told me, who let his private convictions interfere with his selling his patrons what they wanted, liquor or anything else. About the same time I was told by another member of the vestry that the plain indication on my part that I thought there were sinners in Trinity would give offense, and I was asked to strike out of a sermon that was to be published the clause in which the reference occurred. Somewhat later the same member, the dominating member of the vestry, said to me as there were probably nine sinners to one saint in the church he thought that I ought to preach to please the sinners, to preach, that is, so as not to make them uncomfortable when they came to the church, not to irritate them.

Whatever the aberrations of the Newark rector may have been, he has touched upon a vital point. We hear a great deal in the Protestant churches, as he says, of a God of infinite love whose justice is greatly ignored. Yet this too must be infinite. "We hear it said that hell is an old wives' tale, incompatible with belief in this good God. I tell you this God mentioned here is of recent man-made manufacture and never the Father of Jesus Christ, Our Lord." Sincere men are weary of the slurring and denial of essential truths. The Catholic Church offers to them the one safe refuge. Nothing is of greater importance, therefore, than that her Divine credentials be made known to the modern world, to enable men to see the one truly "evangelical" Church, in which alone the whole Gospel of Christ is preached without attenuation or respect of persons. The sermons heard in many non-Catholic churches seem to indicate that the instructions given the Newark vestrymen, though seldom so plainly expressed, are complied with frequently enough.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 8 { WHOLE No. 373 } JUNE 3, 1916 { $3.00 A YEAR PRICE, 10 CENTS }

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 23, p. m.-May 31, a. m.—German Success in the Verdun District—Austrian Advance in the Trentino. Austria-Hungary: Premonitions of Peace. France: A Snap Vote. Germany: Recent Developments. Great Britain: The Conscription Law—Military Expenditures and Military Servants. Ireland: More Trials—Lloyd George's Position. Rome: The Pope's Hospitalization Plans Successful. Spain: Mella and Maura.....169-172

TOPICS OF INTEREST
A Mayor, a Church, a Conspiracy—The Battle against Divorce—The Charities Investigation: An Oliver Twist School—Great is Diana of the Ephesians—"Caliban by the Yellow Sands." 173-185

COMMUNICATIONS
A Call to the Colors—A Good Suggestion—The Boy Scout Movement.....185

EDITORIALS
The Gospel at Atlantic City—Logopathy—City Brides—A "Practical" Catholic—Government by Rebellion—Infected Magazines—Findings of the Panama Commissions.....186-189

LITERATURE
Gilbert K. Chesterton's Poetry.

REVIEWS: The Life of the First Duke of Newcastle and Other Writings—Christian Feminism: A Charter of Rights and Duties—Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies—A Thousand Years of Russian History—Kitchener's Mob—The Church in the City.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Adventures in Common Sense"—Memorial Volume for Andrew J. Shipman—April's "Best Sellers"—"A Book for Graduates"—"Oral English"—Some Little Books of Piety—Three Good Pamphlets—"Battle and Other Poems"—"A Song of the Guns"...189-192

EDUCATION
III—Going to College.....193, 194

SOCIOLOGY
Is Charity Work a Sinecure?.....194, 195

NOTE AND COMMENT
Mothering the Tenement Children—Human Wastage from the Battle Fields—Trophies for Catholic Schools—Longevity of Women Greater than of Men—The Sociological Church of To-day—A Trappist Abbey in Kentucky...195, 196

CHRONICLE

The War.—The British have been on the offensive southwest of Givency and have made some slight gains at Loos. A Bulgarian force, said to be about 25,000 strong, has entered Greece and occupied the southern exit of Rupel Pass and the heights east of the Struma. Greece, after making a formal resistance, permitted the invasion, but will enter a protest as in the case of the occupation of Salonica by the Allies. The Germans, according to Russian reports, have lost heavily in a recent engagement near Dahlel Island. In Persia the Russians have occupied Sardesht, and further south they have crossed from Persia into Mesopotamia and captured Suleimanei. Still further south in Mesopotamia, the British report that the combined British and Russian forces are advancing on Kut-el-Amara, having reached Shatt-el-Hai on the left bank of the Tigris, although on the right bank they have not been able to drive the Turks from Sanneyat. In German East Africa the British War Office reports that the Germans are retreating.

Bulletin, May 23, p. m.-May 31, a. m.

In the Verdun district the advantage during the week has been with the Germans. On the west side of the Meuse, they captured Cumières and advanced on a two-mile front that stretches from that village to the southern slopes of Mort Homme Hill, and are now in possession of the Bethincourt-Cumières Road. The attack consisted of a series of infantry assaults of a costly kind, and the French withdrew. The German success is important, because it advances the German lines a half-mile on the east side of Mort Homme Hill, thus facilitating the German operations against this hill and Hill 304, and at the same time it deprives the French of a position which dominated the German lines across the river. On the east side of the Meuse the Germans have recovered the Haudromont quarries which they lost last week, and have also retaken Fort Douaumont, a large portion of which was recently recaptured by the French.

German Success in the Verdun District

The Austrian offensive in the Trentino has made further progress. Although in the vicinity of Riva and at Monte Baldo the Italians have held their own, they have fallen back in the Lagarina Valley toward Ala. Further to the east, in the Arsa Valley, the Austrians have captured Chiesa, ten miles north of Schio. Advancing from Col Santo, the Austrians attacked Monte Pasubio, but failed to dislodge the Italians. East of this mountain, however, they have advanced from Piazza, taken Monte di Laghi, entered the Posina Valley, crossed the Posina Brook and occupied Bettale. They are now west, north and east of Monte Pasubio. Leaving the Lavarone plateau, and following the Astico River, they captured Forni, and after a serious struggle stormed Monte Cimone. In the Sugana Valley region, the Austrians took Sassa Alto, Roncegno, Borgo, Cima Cista and Strigno. The Italians evacuated the entire western portion of the valley and endeavored to make a stand on the ridge between Monte Meata and Corno di Campoverde, but finally withdrew and left it in the hands of the Austrians. The advance made by the Austrians is on a front of more than twenty-five miles and has become a serious menace to Schio, Arsiero and Asiago.

Austrian Advance in the Trentino

Austria-Hungary.—In the latest utterances of the German Imperial Chancellor, the Vienna press sees distinctly hopeful signs of peace. His words, the Tageblatt observes, are "crystal clear, strong, sure and opportune." It concludes from them that Germany is ready for any contingency, whether to continue the war victoriously or to discuss peace terms for Europe's welfare. The fact that the Teutonic Powers freely speak of peace is a sign of their strength:

Premonitions of Peace

That Germany today can and may speak of peace is its triumph. Nobody can discover the faintest sign of weariness on the part of the Central Powers, who, on the height of their achievements, can plant the standard of humanity. Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg reminds the Entente of the terrible guilt it takes upon itself if Europe continues to be bled and mangled.

The Neue Freie Presse sees a great gain in the journalistic exchange of ideas between Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg and Sir Edward Grey, and calls attention to the new attitude which it says has been assumed by the English statesmen:

A change in the feeling of England is already to be seen in Premier Asquith's speech, in which he did not mention Alsace-Lorraine, nor even Russia. The Premier and the Foreign Secretary are swallowing their words of the past. They deny they ever desired the destruction of Germany, which Poincaré and Briand, in their fear of a collapse, still stammer about. The policy of the destruction of Germany has moved its headquarters from London to Paris.

Commenting upon President Wilson's Charlotte speech, the same paper remarks that the growing popularity of the peace idea in America has been seized by the President to further his candidacy for re-election, while he knows that the proffer of his services is not unwelcome to England. Austria-Hungary has not rejected the original idea of his mediation, but it will be necessary for him to strengthen the weakened confidence of the Central Powers in his impartiality. On this latter point Baron Hengelmüller, formerly Austro-Hungarian Ambassador to the United States, says that the United States lost its opportunity of playing a superbly great and noble rôle from the very beginning of the war:

There was a radical difference in the tone of the American notes to Germany and Great Britain. Despite its preachments about humanity, the United States never raised a word of protest to Great Britain or the Entente Powers in the Baralong, the King Stephen, the Zeppelin L-19, the Elektra and the Dubrovnik cases.

Baron Hengelmüller finds this use of a double standard all the more painful, because of his earnest desire for a continuance of friendly relations between the United States and the Teutonic Powers.

France.—General indignation has been felt among Catholics, and even among advanced radicals at a recent action of the French Senate. At a sitting held before adjourning for the Easter vacations, at which no more than fifty of the three hundred members of the Upper House were present, the Senate decided to examine the Bill for the regulation of charitable works, and adopted the main clauses in spite of the opposition of the Catholic minority and the demands for the postponement of the vote in the absence of the Minister of the Interior. The nature and purpose of the law which the Senate was in such a hurry to vote can be judged by its two essential articles, which are as follows: "For the future no work, no person and no newspaper may appeal to public charity without previously having obtained the authorization of the Minister of the Interior or the Prefect of the Department. The works already existing are subject to the same regulations as new works. Authorization can be refused or withdrawn without discussion, and without notification to the interested persons. Moreover, the interested parties may not bring such matters before the courts of justice." Fair-minded men are everywhere protesting against the measure. Its upholders say that it is meant merely to regulate and control charity. But to all sound-thinking men, it means the subjugation of charity and charitable works to the caprice of the Government. If carried into effect it would mean the strangling of all private and individual initiative. A writer in the Intransigeant describes the Act as "so discouraging that words are wanting to qualify it." The manner in which the clauses of the Act were passed has caused loud protests. They were adopted by an overwhelming majority of the 300 Senators, though only 50 of them were present. But these used the privilege enjoyed by members of the French Parliament to vote for their absent colleagues with their permission. The permission was this time probably abused. A Catholic senator declared: "I have been a member of the Senate for the last twenty-four years, but I never witnessed such a scandalous proceeding." It is possible that owing to the outcry raised against the measure in the conservative press, and to their credit, even in some radical journals, the Senate may adopt amendments which will deprive it of some, at least, of its most odious features.

A Snap Vote

Germany.—Important changes in office have taken place in Germany and new positions have been created. The former Secretary of the Interior, Dr. Delbrück, has been replaced by Dr. Karl Helfferich, former Minister of the Treasury. The latter post is now filled by Count von Rödern. The imperial finances are "in strong and capable hands, with ninety per cent of the war expenditure covered by long term loans, while in England more than half, and in France three-quarters are covered by short term credits." A "Food Regulation Board" has also been created, with Herr Adolph von Batocki at its head. The appointment of August Müller as a member of this Board is the first instance of the admission of a Social Democrat to any Imperial Commission. An Imperial Meat Bureau has been called into existence by the need of husbanding the meat supply which is likely to remain very limited, though an improvement in conditions may set in during the autumn. "We have vegetables enough," says a noted banker, "and can for the time being become vegetarians." A census of all meat supplies, excepting such as are designed solely for the household needs of the owners, was undertaken throughout the Empire. The food prospects of Germany depend upon the coming crop. If its present promises are fulfilled there will be an abundance on hand. Preparations for a fifth war loan by September seem likewise to be under way. A credit of 10,000,000,000 marks, it is thought, will be asked by the Reichstag and the usual interest of five per cent will be offered. The financing of the war is causing no consternation, since it is believed that Germany can better bear the strain than the hostile countries. The war expenses have been diminishing and are now considered to be less than 2,000,000,000 marks a month.

Recent Developments

Great Britain.—By virtue of the royal assent and proclamation, the newest conscription measure is now a law. The Liberal faction in England predicts "grave developments, flowing from the principle of military conscription." "Free military service," they say, "has been destroyed in the hour of its splendid vindication and replaced by the reactionary ideal of forced service." There is more than a touch of mere rhetoric in this statement; enforced service, if necessary for the life of the nation or for its proper welfare, is quite within the lawful power of the civil authority. Yet, while there can be little doubt that the enforcement of the new law will be attended with considerable difficulties, the fear expressed by the Liberals, that "enforced service" will become a precedent, ruling not only the military but all the departments of government, does not seem to be well founded. The country recognizes the new measures as "emergency legislation," and the very temper of the nation is the strongest guard against the domination, in the future days of peace, of an unjustified spirit of militarism.

The Conscription Law

On May 23, Mr. Asquith moved and was unanimously granted, a loan of one billion five hundred million dollars. According to the Premier, the average daily expenditures during the last fifty days have been in excess of twenty-four millions, nor is there any hope of an immediate appreciable decrease. In the course of the debate which followed the Premier's motion, some interesting "observations at the front" were communicated to the House by Colonel Winston Churchill. The former First Lord of the Admiralty severely criticised certain details of the campaign in France, and considered it "a grave mistake" to allow great armies to remain inactive in Egypt and Salonica "when they ought to be employed in diminishing the number of the Allies' foes." In announcing that the non-combatants with the army included sixty thousand grooms and two hundred thousand men employed as body-servants to English officers, Colonel Churchill may have stated the reason for some of the opposition at home to the principle of enforced military service.

Military Expenditures and Military Servants

Ireland.—The country seems to be gradually settling down to normal conditions. Two items of news are of special interest: the first concerns the fate of certain Sinn Fein leaders; the second the task assigned to Mr. Lloyd George, who is to undertake the reconciliation of Irish differences. With regard to the case of Jeremiah C. Lynch, of New York, a naturalized American citizen, accused of complicity in the Dublin uprising, the London Foreign Office stated, on May 22, that General Maxwell, commanding the forces in Ireland, sent a telegram to Premier Asquith asserting that Lynch had participated openly in the uprising, having been seen frequently in an Irish uniform in Liberty Hall during the fighting. A court martial sentenced him to death, but General Maxwell, after receiving the request from the American Embassy, reviewed the sentence and commuted it to ten years' imprisonment. On the same day Ambassador Page reported that John J. Killgallon, of Long Island, N. Y., whose father asked the American State Department to intervene in his behalf, is interned in a camp at Stafford, England. Mr. Page said he hoped soon to obtain Killgallon's release. It was also officially announced that the sentence of death imposed on Peter Galligan, was commmuted to five years' penal servitude. A number of other persons were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. On May 25, John MacNeill, President of the Sinn Fein Volunteers, was found guilty by a court martial of complicity in the late disturbances. On May 30 he was sentenced to prison for life. There have been conflicting rumors as to the part he played in the recent Irish troubles, one of these asserting that he disapproved of the uprising, believing that defeat was inevitable. He is also said to have issued a general warning to Sinn Feiners against any participation in the movement. It is affirmed, too, that he and some of his immediate adherents went into seclusion in a district outside of Dublin and took no part in the actual fighting. John MacNeill, besides being President of the Sinn Fein Volunteers, was Professor of Law in the National University, and was the organizer and vice-president of the Gaelic League.

More Trials

On Thursday, May 25, the London Grand Jury returned true bills against Sir Roger Casement and Daniel J. Bailey, formerly a British soldier who is held as his accomplice. Seventy-five Grand Jurors were summoned before Lord Chief-Justice Reading, and from their number twenty-three were selected to decide whether or not indictments for high treason should be returned against the two prisoners. They decided promptly. The trial of Casement was fixed for June 26.

On May 25, Mr. Asquith announced to the House of Commons that Mr. David Lloyd George, in addition to his duties as Minister of Munitions, would undertake the settlement of the Irish question. After the announcement he appealed to the Commons to refrain from all debate on the subject both within and without the House, as arguments on the subject might interfere with the difficult task. When he concluded, Mr. John Redmond, Nationalist Leader, rose and acquiesced in the Premier's request, and expressed his ardent desire for a solution of the difficulties of his country. Mr. Redmond was followed by Sir Edward Carson, Ulster Leader, who promised his support to the Premier's proposition, and by the Independent Irish Leader, Mr. William O'Brien, who also approved of the project. It is as yet unknown how soon Mr. Lloyd George will be able to arrange a formal conference and what shape the conference will take. He has been engaged for some time in informal talks preparatory to such a conference, and it is understood that besides Mr. John Redmond and Sir Edward Carson, the conference will include Mr. Herbert Samuel, the Home Secretary, who had much to do with framing the finance clauses of the Home Rule Act. Other names mentioned are John Dillon and Joseph Devlin. In making this important announcement, Mr. Asquith said that Mr. Lloyd George's mission was one of peace and reconciliation. It is difficult as yet to see what the outcome of the conference will be; it is to be hoped that it will result in satisfying the legitimate rights and aspirations of the majority of the Irish people.

Lloyd George's Position

Rome.—The plans of the Holy Father for the hospitalization in Switzerland of sick prisoners of war whose condition requires special care, have been crowned with success. The Osservatore Romano, quoted by Rome, contains the following information on the subject:

The Pope's Hospitalization Plans Successful

We are glad to announce that the benefit of hospitalization in Switzerland will be shortly extended to the English prisoners interned in Germany. Since last March, measures were being devised by the interested governments to give effect to this hospitalization, according to the convention already established between France and Germany, and the Representative of the Holy See at Berne has not failed to exert himself charitably to eliminate any obstacle which might arise. Today it may be said that the realization of the humane plan is happily secured, as may be seen from the following Note, which His Excellency, Sir Henry Howard, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain to the Holy See, addressed on May 4 to His Eminence Cardinal Gasparri, Secretary of State to His Holiness.

The Note referred to is as follows:

Eminence: I have the honor to inform your Eminence that I have just received telegraphically from Sir Edward Grey the order to make the following communication: The German Government having made known that it accepts the proposal for the reciprocal removal to Switzerland of invalided prisoners of war, English and German, His British Majesty's Government hastens to express to the Holy See its warmest gratitude for having presented this project. It was inspired by those great humanitarian sentiments of which His Holiness the Pope has given such fruitful proof during the course of the war, and His Majesty's Government is convinced that the action so happily initiated by the Holy Father will be fruitful of benefits to many British prisoners of war. In renewing the assurance of my deepest respect, I avail myself of this occasion to express to your Eminence my sincere gratitude as well as that of my Government for the inexhaustible good will which you have shown in this matter.

To this official acknowledgment must be added the testimonies of gratitude which numbers of French and German prisoners have addressed to their common Father from the Swiss Sanatoriums, to thank him for his solicitude and love.

Spain.—The Catholics in the country and their friends at home and abroad have been greatly encouraged by the announcement that the long-desired Catholic Union is at last to become a reality. At a banquet given to Don Juan Vasquez Mella, to congratulate him on his recent election to Congress from Oviedo, the great tribune announced that Don Antonio Maura, the representative of the Loyalist Conservatives, and he himself, the spokesman and leader of the Integrists of the Extreme Right, would meet in September at the national shrine of Covadonga, the cradle of Spanish independence, and would there form a Union of the Right on the basis of a minimum Catholic program. The program, as announced by Señor Mella, will be social, political, and religious. It will defend the sanctity of Catholic marriage, and the freedom of Catholic education. The program also intends to give full local autonomy to the various provinces of Spain, a policy now quite popular, for the people are loudly protesting against the centralizing tendencies of the Government, which are becoming more and more galling every day. Better administrative measures are to be proposed, and above all, a strenuous campaign is to be waged against "Caciquism," or "Bossism," one of the greatest evils of the country. Fully aware of the electoral frauds which are taking place, Señor Mella intends to oppose universal suffrage as at present exercised. He will also advocate the "administrative" separation of the Church and State. Their present administrative union, he contends, makes the Church the slave of the Government.

Mella and Maura

The details of the program have not been made public, and it is impossible to say how all these projects will be fused into a common platform. The Union is to work for common ends, but it will not entail the amalgamation of the parties. The forces of "Caciquism" will be everywhere arrayed against it, but whatever may be thought of the principles and plans of the Union itself, all are agreed that it has for leaders two of the ablest men in the country, who to a keen and practical knowledge of political problems, add the highest standard of ideals and conduct. Meantime the anti-clericals are not inactive: they let no opportunity to protest pass. Recently the Minister of Public Instruction reorganized the national school for deaf mutes and the blind and put Sisters in charge of it. Immediately a great clamor was raised against this act and the Minister, called upon to explain, declared that they were the best teachers.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

A Mayor, a Church, a Conspiracy

THE New York Charities Investigation has had interesting and far-reaching ramifications. These followed close on the indictment of Kingsbury, the Commissioner of Charities, and Hotchkiss, his counsel, by the Kings County Grand Jury. The nexus between this indictment and the aforementioned ramifications is this: the Mayor of New York, whipped to fury and passionate indiscretion by the quandary of his two supporters, clamorously, without a shred of evidence, in violation of a fundamental law of formal logic, accused the Catholic Church of conspiracy to seize "the City Government." This is the hideous charge, uttered by his Honor of New York, and wired throughout the country to furnish copy to a vile, hostile press that lives by calumniating the Church after the manner that Mayor Mitchel employed. His Honor's statement is:

> For the last two and a half years, during the entire life of the present administration, there has been a well-organized and purposeful conspiracy conducted by a certain number of coreligionists of my own, acting with others, in the obstruction of the proper and orderly conduct of the government of charitable institutions of the city, and the care they give to 22,000 children.—(N. Y. Evening Post, May 23, 1916.)
>
> The attempted seizure by the Church of the City Government is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. We hold that the Government shall not lay its hands on the sacred altar of the Church and that conversely the Church must not lay its hands on the sacred altar of the Government. And, gentlemen, so long as I am Mayor of this city it never shall.—(N. Y. Times, May 24, 1916.)

Words could not be plainer; neither could the charge be more false or more stupidly put. Indeed, it were unworthy of notice, were it not for the nature of the institution maligned and the accidental value that attaches to the calumny, because of the office of the calumniator.

The plaintiff has made a wonderful discovery: he has found a purposeful (sic) conspiracy; a conspiring conspiracy in other words, something like a goosing goose, though in a different order. Apparently John Purroy Mitchel is a remarkable man, a rare scientist.

This fictitious conspiracy was attributed "to a certain number of his coreligionists." Later without submitting any proof for his contention, the Mayor named some four or five of these, thumped a table and screamed that the Church was attempting to seize the City Government. There may have been force in the thump and pathos in the scream, but there was no logic in the assertion. To conclude from this alleged act of four or five members of the Church to the Church itself is a sin against the very first principle of ratiocination. The Mayor of New York committed that sin, in order to fasten an infamy on a guiltless institution and thus arouse in his favor the passions of the offscouring of the people. The City Hall of the metropolis of the continent has become a hustings from which a fanatic shrieks, "No Popery" to the admiration of the ignorant mob. Or, is it that he has dreamed himself a David slaying a Goliath, only to find his pebble turned to an empty shout at the critical moment?

All this happened, May 23: the Mayor slept on his emotions and strange logic; the wires buzzed with the false charge against the Church; it was flung into our faces in conversation, and by papers, like the New York Evening Post, that join the sweaty rabble to score a point against the Papists. The honorable Mayor awoke and declared:

> It is not the Catholic Church which has so conspired to pervert justice and obstruct or control government, but a small group within the Church cooperating with a few non-Catholic laymen. It is this group I charge with conspiracy. This group I am convinced is not representative of the Church or of the great body of right-thinking, honest Catholics of this City.—(N. Y. Tribune, May 25, 1916.)

Was there ever such a proceeding? One day, the chief official of a great American city, to whom people should be able to look for fairness and habitual probity, vehemently charges the Catholic Church with a crime, the very next day he just as vehemently acquits the Church of that crime.

This is a wonderful comedy, but the chief actor may now be regretting that he put on the buskin and donned the masque. Perhaps, however, the Mayor of New York never expects to be taken seriously again.

But the real accusation is clear now, even though no one can vouch for its sincerity. So too is the consequence. The whole issue may be put this way: During the last two years and a half a small group within the Church has conspired to pervert justice and obstruct or control government. Therefore Mayor Mitchel caused wires of certain members of that group to be tapped.

Now the proof. Mayor Mitchel, burning with anxiety to defend his Commissioner of Charities indicted for wire-tapping or complicity therein; Mayor Mitchel, placed in so perilous a position by his connection with the wire-tapping that Alfred J. Talley, counsel for one of the alleged conspirators, declared without rebuff, to the very face of the Mayor, before the Thompson Committee, that his Honor escaped indictment by only one vote; Mayor Mitchel who had every desire, both for offensive but especially for defensive reasons, to bring forth proof of his accusation, confessed that his evidence would not be received in any court of competent jurisdiction, nay, not even by himself, fighting as he is for his reputation and security. (N. Y. Tribune May 25, 1916; N. Y. World, May 25, 1916.) In other words, the plaintiff on his own confession not only cannot prove the charges made, but he realized before he made them that he had no legal proof to support them. What has any Church to fear from such a man? He has played his last card, and lost.

The Mayor's so-called testimony can be divided into two parts: one concerns the condition of the maligned institutions, the other has to do with the conspiracy. The first is not relevant to the issue and can be thrown out of court. The issue is the conspiracy said to have been carried on by some few Catholics against the city government, for the last two years and a half. No, not for two years and a half, the Mayor changed even that part of his original proposition; he discovered over night that the plot reaches back to 1907 and involves a man who died opportunely April 11, 1915—a year too early to defend his name against a traducer. In 1909 and 1910 Mitchel, then a petty official, was conducting an examination of the accounts of institutions and "discovered" that $5,000 had been subscribed by private institutions as a honorarium for Daniel Potter, examiner of private charitable institutions in the Department of Finance. When the sum was in hand, the prelate's "conscience hurt him at the thought of paying the money over to a public servant," so "he appropriated this money to his own use without asking permission or stating anything concerning his purpose to the institutions which had subscribed it." The Mayor declares that all this was admitted to him by Mgr. McMahon, under oath, sometime during 1909 or 1910. Good! But now for a few questions. Is this a conspiracy to seize any government, much less Mitchel's which did not begin till January 1, 1914? The collection is said to have taken place in 1907; it was "discovered" in 1909 or 1910; no objective nexus between it and any action done by priests, during the present administration, has been established. How then does it justify or help to justify the Mayor for tapping wires because of crime or suspicion of crime, done or to be done, during his administration? There is no answer to that; it exposes his Honor once again.

Just here a digression from the main topic is useful to show the peculiar workings of the Mayor's intellect or will. In the first place the intrinsic absurdity of the allegations against the dead prelate is patent even to the blear-eyed. Mgr. McMahon is accused of collecting money to give a present to a city official; at the proper time the prelate's conscience bothers him and to ease it he appropriates the money to his own use, that is, he steals it. Verily! It is as if the Mayor of Rome tapped private wires in the year 10 B. C., got a scruple and then to ease his conscience blasphemed Jupiter. A pagan mayor would not be so mad as to commit a monstrous crime to ease his conscience troubled over a matter much less serious. Only stupid, untrained Catholic prelates do such things.

But Mayor Mitchel offers proof. Of what? Of these two statements: (1) That Mgr. McMahon admitted to him under oath that these funds ($5,000) had been collected as a present for Potter; (2) that Mgr. McMahon appropriated the money for his own use without permission or statement of any kind. (N. Y. Times, May 24, 1916.) What is the proof? The confidential report of Fosdick, Commissioner of Accounts under Gaynor. (N. Y. Sun, May 27, 1916.) Does this prove both or either of the Mayor's statements? It proves neither of them. Nowhere, in no way does the report say or insinuate that Mgr. McMahon swore to Mitchel that $5,000 had been collected for Potter. That was the Mayor's first statement. Again, nowhere and in no way does the report say or insinuate that the Monsignor's conscience so bothered him that he "appropriated the money to his own use" without asking permission or stating anything concerning his purpose to the institutions which had subscribed it." That is the Mayor's second statement, and it is as foul a slander as was ever uttered. But then Mgr. McMahon is dead and his Honor is indeed a worthy man, who would not mention the prelate's act, if it were not on record! (N. Y. Times, May 24, 1916.) Can it be that such statements are not on record? They are not. These things only are on the record submitted: (1) Mgr. McMahon received $500 from one corporation (that got no money from the city) towards a fund for a present to Potter; (2) The money received, the plan was changed and Potter, who was ignorant of the whole transaction, was not given a penny. Mgr. McMahon did not recall whether he informed the donor of the change or not, and, continues the Fosdick report:

> He (the Monsignor) stated that at the time the proposed present came up a considerable sum of money was raised by him from various Catholic institutions to defray the expenses of his own personal supervision of their institutional work. These funds he deposited in a special account at the Fifth Avenue National Bank, and from them he made drafts to other accounts which he maintained. The incompleteness of his records made it impossible for him to show specifically how all these funds had been used.

Therefore, not one assertion made by his Honor is substantiated by this report. He speaks of $5,000 sworn to as collected (New York Times, May 24, 1916); the document he offers in proof mentions $500: he declares that Mgr. McMahon swore he appropriated the money for himself without knowledge of the institutions involved; the document he offers in proof mentions one institution actually involved and Mgr. McMahon declares he does not recall whether or not he spoke to the head of that institution about the change. A Mayor who can juggle with facts this way may make any charges he pleases; they will harm himself only.

But Mgr. McMahon, one of the dearest and most unselfish men that ever lived, answers the man who snatched his bones from the grave and rattled them despitefully before the public. Here is an affidavit that shows every item of the transaction to be free from the least taint of crime:

> American Consulate, Carlsbad, Austria—ss:
>
> Denis J. McMahon, being duly sworn and desiring to give full answer to inquiries from New York, U. S., deposes and says:
>
> He is the Right Rev. Denis J. McMahon, rector of the Epiphany Catholic Church, Second Avenue and Twenty-first Street, New York City; that he is the Supervisor of Catholic Charities in the Diocese of New York, and has authority in matters pertaining to the Catholic charitable institutions there; that at the present time he is stopping in Carlsbad, Austria, having left home for Europe in April last. That in the winter of 1906-7 he planned to organize more completely the educational work of the charitable institutions, to the end that every teacher in them might have a certificate from the Department of Education; also to establish a Catholic bureau for the "after care" of children from the institutions and the Children's Court. In order to develop these plans he opened an office with a suitable clerical force. To centralize these and other important charitable works, he requested funds from the institutions to meet the increased expenses. At first it was suggested that while raising these funds a sufficient sum be secured to give a honorarium to Dr. D. C. Potter of the Finance Department, New York City, who had rendered valuable and long-continued services outside of his departmental duties; also and particularly, the refund of disbursements incurred in connection with a set of photographic albums mentioned below. The latter part of this suggestion was finally adopted.

That these funds contributed by the institutions were used by deponent for the work of his office, a purely diocesan matter. That at no place or time did deponent pay to the said Dr. Potter any sum of money, except on one occasion when payment was made for the actual cost (amounting to over $1,000) of the illustrated albums which were sent to Europe. This work was compiled and completed in all details by Dr. Potter. Deponent has already testified in court upon this subject, where vouchers were presented. Dr. Potter received no money for his services or any profit. It was well understood that his services were gratuitous. He was not offered or given anything beyond actual disbursements.

Other than in this instance deponent never paid said Dr. Potter any sum of money, either directly or indirectly, or to any one else for his benefit.

In answer to a specific inquiry, in which deponent is informed that among the vouchers of St. Joseph's Union, a private corporation, receiving no money from the City of New York, though connected with the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, there is a cheque dated on or about January, 1907, for the sum of $500, (five hundred dollars,) with a memorandum on the accompanying voucher stating in substance that the cheque was to be made part of a sum proposed to be raised on behalf of D. C. Potter, which sum the rector of the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin states was given to deponent. Deponent says that said $500 was received and used by him in the diocesan work described above, and no part of the said $500 was either directly or indirectly paid to D. C. Potter

Deponent further says that in asking for about $4,000 (four thousand dollars) at that time he stated the object above-mentioned openly at a regular meeting of the Superiors of the institutions, and among the contributions received for this purpose was the above-mentioned $500.

Whilst deponent may not have reported to the Rev. Rector in person the use of his contribution, he does actually report annually both to his Superior and to the Superiors of all the contributing institutions, the financial transactions of his office.

(Signed) DENIS J. MCMAHON.

Sworn to before me this 27th day of June, 1910, at Carlsbad, Austria.

(signed) WILL L. LOWRIE.

Consul of the United States of America.

American Consulate, (Seal,) Carlsbad, Austria.

Moreover, Mgr. Dunn follows, denies under oath that the alleged $5,000 was collected, asserts that the books of New York and Brooklyn institutions were audited without the discovery of a trace of it; Dr. Potter follows him, swears he received no honorarium and affirms that the Mayor has slandered the dead prelate. However, all this is unnecessary; the very document on which his Honor relied proves his statements false; nevertheless, it is pleasant to find that document supported by the testimony of three men.

But this is a digression made to show once again that the plaintiff is entirely untrustworthy. The point at issue is: that because of an alleged conspiracy against the city government, the Mayor tapped the wires of certain priests. So far there has been no trace of a conspiracy on the part of the defendants, the priests. As much cannot be said for the plaintiff. The Mayor is still on the stand. He is now presenting the case against the priests, Mgr. Dunn, Father Farrell, Dr. Higgins, and Father Dineen, and his case is: these men entered into a criminal conspiracy to prevent justice and obstruct or control government, and I, the Mayor, knowing this, or having reasonable ground for suspecting it, had the wires tapped. That's the case, it needs constant repetition, lest the issue be befogged. The evidence? The Mayor declared before the Thompson Committee that he had no evidence worthy of a court's consideration; he admitted that he himself would not accept his own assertions as legal evidence. That needs repetition, too, lest it be forgotten. More than that, and this is most important: The Mayor stated that his so-called evidence was submitted to the Kings County Grand Jury (New York American, May 25, 1916); his indicted Commissioner of Charities testified before that Jury; the alleged conspirators within that Jury's jurisdiction testified before it, and yet that Jury, presided over by a careful and honorable judge, indicted the Mayor's Commissioner of Charities and the Commissioner's Counsel, a fate which, according to an uncontradicted statement, made in the presence of the Mayor before the Thompson Committee, his Honor escaped by only one vote. This is significant. But do not miss the point. For the present it is not that the Grand Jury did not indict the alleged conspirators against the city government. There are two points. The first is that the Grand Jury found no trace of a conspiracy on the part of Mitchel's co-religionists, against the city government; otherwise it would have found that the wire-tapping was justified, Kingsbury and Hotchkiss would not have been indicted and Mitchel would not have escaped the same fate by only one vote. The second point is that the Grand Jury did not find that Mitchel had reasonable suspicion of a conspiracy; otherwise it would have justified the wire-tapping, Kingsbury and Hotchkiss would not have been indicted and the Mayor would not have escaped the same fate by only one vote. Another and most noteworthy point is contained in these words from the Grand Jury's presentment to Judge May:

If, as does appear, they (the Mayor and Police Commissioner) approved of the conduct of those who were responsible for the tapping of the wires in question for no other purpose than to furnish counsel in private and personal litigation with information and to gratify private curiosity, and not for the detection or prevention of crime, the conduct of the Mayor and Police Commissioner merits severe condemnation.

In view of all this, of what worth is Mr. Mitchel's proof?

Who now are the conspirators? Judge from the action of the Grand Jury. Judge from the added fact, that despite most strenuous efforts to fasten guilt on them, not one priest has been indicted anywhere for anything, and not one will be indicted, for not one is in the wrong.

In view of all this, is it any wonder that, before these indictments were found, the Mayor of New York made frantic efforts to stop inquiry into the wire-tapping? He declared that international issues were involved, that a man who would pursue such an investigation would be a traitor; he threatened "to pan" Senator Thompson. All this was good acting. (Some day, the Senator may be induced to publish the rest of that conversation now known to many. People may find it interesting. This in passing.) But after the indictment the Mayor was keen to spread his assertions on the record. In order to estimate these at their proper worth it would be well to note how they were concocted. Policemen "listened in" on tapped wires, pencil and slate at hand. As the talk proceeded, the officers wrote down on the slate the "skeleton" of the conversations, that is, a few isolated words. These words were afterwards transferred to scraps of paper and the conversation was then filled in at leisure, it would appear; then it was typed. (N. Y. Tribune, May 27, 1916.) Finally some two months after the first conversation was stolen the eavesdroppers were ordered to interview the accused so that the voices heard over the 'phone might be identified!

From these wonderfully-wrought, stolen, typewritten conversations that had passed through at least three processes, his Honor testified, without being able to say that his copies agreed with the originals which in the great majority of cases "were destroyed, that no information might be disseminated which would be injurious to any one"! Well might he pronounce his assertions legally worthless! Yet on them he founds grave charges against priests, while professing to be solicitous for people's reputations!

The process of the theft may account too for the language said to have been used by well-educated Catholic priests and a Baptist minister. Here are some specimens: "Yes, when them pamphlets get around there will be some time." "Well, I know that I done everything." "Yes this is him." "I ain't afraid." The Mayor of New York read this twaddle as part of some conversations of priests and a minister.

But let the Mayor "testify." Surely. He has done so; he has striven manfully to prove the conspiracy which eventually turned round this point: that the priests tried to get a witness, Potter, out of the jurisdiction of the Strong Commission so that he could not be called to testify. The Mayor made assertions; page after page of them; the Thompson Committee listened hour after hour, and at the end, Senator Thompson, the Protestant chairman, declared that there was no evidence of a conspiracy. No evidence even that Potter wished to avoid becoming a witness, while Potter set the audience laughing by stating that a conspiracy to spirit him away was quite unnecessary, since Commissioner Strong declared that he (Potter) would not be asked to testify. Why go further? The Thompson Committee has cleared the priests. But then the testimony is amusing. The conspiring coreligionists of the Mayor are, as I have said, Father Dineen, secretary to Bishop Hayes, a priest well known in New York, Mgr. Dunn of New York City, Dr. Higgins of Brooklyn, Father Farrell of Brooklyn. The main allegations against Father Dineen are: (1) He told Potter over the wire that a Holy Name Society had protested to the Governor against the Strong Commission; (2) He told Potter over the wire that it was reported the Governor intended to stop the investigation; (3) He advised Potter to keep out of the way. A large conspiracy this! And Father Dineen declared under oath he never said such things to Potter! He appeared scarcely to know Potter, yet the latter is made to address the priest whose name is Joseph, by the familiar term "Harry." But, halt here. Father Dineen did speak to Mgr. Dunn over the wire in a perfectly legitimate way about a perfectly legitimate act of the Holy Name Society. That is important, for the Mayor has declared more than once that neither the wire of Bishop Hayes nor of Mgr. Dunn was touched. Despite this denial, one or both wires had been tapped. This recalls that there was no admission that Hebberd's wire had been tapped, until the fact became too well known to be denied any longer. Father Dineen's testimony brought the following interesting result:

"Hold on!" said Mr. Moss, (counsel for the Thompson Committee). "If that is so, if they twigged your conversation with Mgr. Dunn, they must have been tapping some wires that they have not admitted."

"I would not be surprised."

"The question that is raised on this witness's testimony," Mr. Moss went on, "is whether there are not taps that have been made, or are being made, that the police authorities do not know about and that the telephone company has not got a good record of."

"Of course there are," interjected Senator Thompson. "So far as the telephone company is concerned, why I think that is true. So far as the police are concerned, I do not care to say as Chairman of the Committee just now.—(New York Sun, May 26, 1916.)

Great heavens! And this is New York, not Siberia or Devil's Island. Some of us are dreadfully anxious; we talk in our sleep; a Mayor or a Commissioner of Charities may be under the bed, and the floor is sometimes dusty.

Mgr. Dunn comes to the stand. He is an arch-conspirator. He conspired with Father Farrell and Potter, putting $100 in an envelope in his office for Potter's messenger to carry off.

Before March 13, Mgr. Dunn had never seen Father

Farrell; he met him that day for the first time at Mr. Mulry's funeral. Before that time he had communicated with him once over the wire to ask for some matter for a pamphlet. This is the extent of that part of the conspiracy which Mitchel affirms is at least two and a half years old. Now for the second part of Mgr. Dunn's conspiracy, that $100 in a sealed envelope.

On March 12 the Monsignor suspected his wire had been tapped; on March 15 or 16 he informed Dr. Higgins of his suspicion; on March 23 Potter, according to the Mayor's admission, said over the wire that he suspected his wire was tapped. (N. Y. Sun, May 25, 1916), and yet on March 24 these astute conspirators, these wily chaps who had every reason to suspect that the "ends" of their wires ran into the ears of eavesdroppers, talked conspiracy over those wires!

Mgr. Dunn acknowledged speaking of 100, without mention of dollars, to Potter; he had reason to suspect wires were tapped; he wished to make sure; on the spur of the moment, he threw out the "bait" 100; he was subpœnaed immediately and questioned forthwith about $100; the proof was had; wires were tapped. The Monsignor swears to this; he swears, too, that there was no mention of a sealed envelope, while Potter swears he received no money. The Grand Jury of Kings County heard the Mayor's side of this story, and found no trace of a conspiracy; the Thompson Committee heard it and its Chairman affirms that there is no evidence that any attempt was made to spirit Potter away.

But what about Father Farrell? He is also innocent of "conspiring." He denied under oath that he ever spoke to Potter about money to go to Atlantic City; he denied that he ever heard of the Strand Hotel, to which he was said to have directed Potter; he affirmed that it was physically impossible for him to have 'phoned to Potter at the time asserted, since at that very time and for a long while after he, together with three others, was at his mother's house, where there is no 'phone. The Grand Jury of Kings County heard Mayor Mitchel's version of this, heard Father Farrell's version, so did the Thompson Committee. The result we know. No conspiracy. The last conspirator is Dr. Higgins. Under oath he repudiates the conversation attributed to him. The Grand Jury of Kings County heard the Mayor's version of Dr. Higgins's crime, so did the Thompson Committee. The result we know. No conspiracy. What does the Mayor say to all this?

> "They (the priests) were only doing what you could expect people to do who are accused of crime." (N. Y. Sun, May 26, 1916). Innuendoes, lies and statements of these witnesses cannot change the situation. What can you expect from men accused of crime as they are? You don't expect them to tell the truth, do you? (N. Y. Herald, May 26, 1916.)

Note the splendid argumentum ad hominem here. It is a real boomerang with a backward flight much swifter than its forward flight. The Mayor asserts that the priests perjured themselves, because they were accused of crime. (Accused, and that without evidence!) What, then, are we to think of the Mayor, a politician who escaped indictment for crime by one vote and whose official friend, Kingsbury, was actually indicted? If four or five priests of known reputation perjure themselves because of an unsupported accusation, a politician who finds himself in the Mayor's quandary does not swerve a hairsbreadth from the truth! Risum teneatis, amici? There is an old story of a cat that climbed a tree in a fit of blind passion, could not get down and avenged itself on innocent people by mewing night and day.

But where is that conspiracy? It never existed. And have you not noticed that the very point at issue has been passed over by his Honor? He tried to justify the wire-tapping by pleading foreknowledge or reasonable suspicion of conspiracy; and then he endeavored to prove the existence of that conspiracy by conversation heard after the wires were tapped!

This paper is almost finished. Before summing up, it is well to record this resolution of the "Society of Certified Shorthand Reporters of Greater New York":

> Be it resolved that it is unethical, unprofessional and contrary to the tenets of this society for its members to engage or participate in reporting over the dictaphone, the dictagraph, the telephone, or to participate in such service where the speaker or speakers are unseen and unknown to the reporter.

It is also well to put down this resolution adopted in Assembly Hall, Brooklyn, by the United Independent Democrats, an organization that supported Mayor Mitchel in his campaign for election:

> Resolved, That the United Independent Democrats of Kings County present this matter to the Governor of the State of New York and that he be requested to take the necessary action for the removal of John Purroy Mitchel as Mayor of the City of New York, and that a committee of five be appointed to present these resolutions to the said Governor for action.

And now the summing up. The present question at issue between the Mayor and the priests falsely accused by him, is not the condition of private child-caring institutions; it is not whether those institutions shall audit their accounts or not; it is not whether those institutions shall be inspected by city officials or not; it is this and this only: Did those priests conspire to pervert and obstruct or control government, thus justifying the tapping of their wires? Those who have read this paper know the answer. They will agree with Moss, attorney for the Thompson Committee, who asserts that the Mayor's evidence (sic) "would not convict a yellow dog." New York is to be congratulated on its latest "No Popery" cry. Even Oshkosh and Kalamazoo cackle. May the sacred altar of this city's government be soon released from the grip—but the grip is like the conspiracy and his Honor's evidence. It does not exist.

THE EDITOR.

The Battle against Divorce

A CERTAIN popular magazine is at present waging literary war against divorce. The March issue presented a frank article, illustrated with two expressive pictures: one a decrepit "Scarlet Sister" slinking through the city's streets; the other, a lady, luxuriating in a splendid boudoir and enjoying divorce with alimony. Which is the worse?

Whatever may be said against Arthur I. Keller's brace of illustrations as offending taste and delicacy, it cannot be denied that they reflect an important truth, and this even more effectually than does the article which they introduce. The number of divorcées, these social parasites, who, as Anna Steese Richardson observes, "toil not, neither do they spin," has become large and notorious enough to demand the attention of our practical-minded country. We have connived at the immorality of divorce, but in these days when heart-strings have become so entangled with purse-strings, we can hardly fail to be moved at the economic waste of paying women magnificently for yielding the nation nothing. Miss Richardson quotes the shameful figure of 1,008 divorces in 1914 on the Island of Manhattan alone, the average annual alimony paid being $1,000 a year. She cites pathetic instances in which the wheel was broken on the butterfly rather than the butterfly on the wheel; how men have been reduced to penury and ill-health by the necessity of sending milady divorcée her monthly check; how a male is entrapped into matrimony by a wily woman with not a spark of love in her heart but a quantity of alimony calculations in her head; how the feminists' fair boast of the independence of their sex is weakened by the swelling ranks of the misguided creatures who profitably start to court their husbands with law the minute the latter cease to court them with love.

All these facts are but further evidence of the wisdom of the Church's stand in the matter of divorce, which the unreflecting have loudly criticised as archaic, unprogressive, intolerant, and unsuited to the exigencies of the twentieth century. The altogether outrageous abuse of alimony is the latest argument to support her attitude regarding our great national evil. As divorce is now so largely a question of finance, the Church's stand cannot fail to impress the American mind. For when the rupture of the marriage bond is proved poor business, the American public cannot but take notice of the evil. On seeing the extravagance divorce involves, the public may pay some attention to the Church's teaching on the subject and realize that her dogmas have corollaries suggesting material success and advantage.

It is to alimony that court-rooms owe their great popularity with the ladies. By clipping off the attractive pecuniary trimmings from decrees, except, of course, when wife and children would really be destitute, the State could keep the divorce-rate from soaring so high. As for religion's work, Joseph Morschauser, Justice of the Supreme Court, New York, wisely observes: "When the Christian churches combine to take drastic action against divorce and its effect on society, the statute will be repealed." The Catholic Church is the unquestioned model in this suggested campaign, and around her the others must rally, for was it not she who lost a whole nation rather than allow the marriage bond to be broken?

In a late issue of the magazine already referred to, appeared a well-written short story full of little lights on the details, incidents and consequences of divorce. The author dug beneath the social crust, and revealed the significant situation that even people who mutually and peacefully seek divorce may be quite dissatisfied with themselves and each other after they get it. If this be true, it is only another indication that the Church, in shielding her children from divorce, is really protecting them from themselves. The man and woman who have lived together for years, have grown so closely into each other's life, that when the sword of civil law cuts this intimate union, spiritual wounds, if not moral death, to say nothing of the unsavory repute which follows one or both persons, must be the results of the separation.

But, though the reasons against divorce, old and new, make a formidable array, those in favor of it are thought by many to be anything but slight. This opinion owes its popularity, in no small measure, to our up-to-date novelists. Divorce is replete with possibilities for salaciousness and "human interest." All a romanticist needs nowadays to be noticed, is sensation. Hence we have been having tales and plays urging the necessity of the divorce court. H. G. Wells, in his book, "The Passionate Friends," plausibly pleaded for a more liberal English divorce law. The plot of Rupert Hughes's "What Will People Say?" turns on the heroine's inability to gain freedom, for the reason that her husband's mother, a Catholic, is opposed to the simple modern specific. Eugene Walter's lurid drama, "Just a Woman," which pleased so well in New York, exploits the court-room as a climax in the lives of its characters. Such torrid fiction appeals to the emotional rather than the logical faculties of its patrons. Hence when the sexes get their lives into hopeless tangles, divorce seems the only obtainable way of cutting the Gordian knot. Consequently, the Catholic Church is censured as a disregarder of human values, even by many who are not blind to the evils of divorce. Indeed, some of her own children, who prefer Chambers, Morris and Johnson to Benson, Sheehan and Bazin, wonder at her lack of lenity.

If the world would look a little more deeply and sincerely into the Church's attitude, however, it would be found that she is really more considerate of her flock than any sect is of its members. Instead of divorce, she permits separation, which does not preclude future reunion, but invites it rather. She allows no trivial matter to tamper with the marriage bond, and so keeps her children from the ridiculous excesses which are turning our court-rooms into vaudeville theaters. While recourse can be had to civil law only at the price of painful publicity, the Church has a tribunal of her own in which matrimonial cases are investigated with quiet dignity and earnestness. It is a court, moreover, altogether free from reporters and scandal-hungry gapers.

The idea is inexcusably extant among non-Catholics that, if a priest once makes the marriage pronouncement over people, the Church cannot possibly be brought to think the couple are not validly married. Those outside the Church do not realize that there are several fully recognized impediments to the validity of the Sacrament of Matrimony.

Indeed the Church, by the decree of the Holy Office of 1889, permits a bishop, or his delegate, to settle certain cases even without trial and without appeal to Rome, when the nullity is evident and the defensor vinculi, or priest officially appointed to investigate such cases, is satisfied with the evidence. These cases respectively obtain, when one person is baptized and the other not; when one is already validly married; when both are related by consanguinity, affinity, or by a spiritual tie; when the marriage has been performed before an unauthorized minister.

In other instances the Church reasonably requires a trial. The most common of these latter instances is lack of consent in either person, without which, of course, there can really be no marriage. Strange that novelists persist in making their characters throw frenzied fists up to the sky and demand to know why it is that the "mumbling of a mere priest" should weld two lives together forever. The two lives freely weld themselves; if the union hurts, why blame the priest?

The heroine of David Graham Phillips' last story, forced against her will to marry an onion-eating yokel, in all probability did not marry him at all; and, if she had been a Catholic, instead of desperately plunging into the merciless tide of life, she might have quietly betaken herself to her parish priest or confessor, who would have told her how to put her case before the ecclesiastical courts. On the pronouncement of nullity by two of these courts, Susan Lenox would have been relieved from the obnoxious bond, and her sickening story, which unhappily is proving so absorbing to our morbid high-school misses, would have been halted at the start. To be sure, even ecclesiastical trials cost money, and this much-suffering damsel had none. The Church, however, never disregards a case for pecuniary reasons. The civil courts are not so obliging.

From even this little exposé of truth, it is clear that the Catholic Church deals with remarkable prudence toward mésalliances among her children: separating persons when they should not be bound together, keeping them bound when they ought to be, and, in either event, preserving intact the strength and beauty of the matrimonial ideal. As a result, Catholic marriages are not hasty, nor is the motive mere passion. For the most part they are pure, happy, fruitful, and genuine blessings to the commonwealth. Outside the Church no successful campaign against divorce can be waged without an investigation, adaptation and promulgation of her methods, which are neither excessive nor lax, neither adamantine nor over-sympathetic. They are just plain commonsense.

EDWARD F. MURPHY.

The Charities Investigation: An Oliver Twist School

LET us begin with a few choice headlines. Headlines are the fashion nowadays, especially with the New York press; direct, pithy, lying headlines. Those quoted below refer to the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, a training school for boys and girls at Mount Loretto, Staten Island, New York; they are taken from a pamphlet issued by one Moree, a salaried "charity" publicity agent and paid for by John A. Kingsbury, Commissioner of Charities of the City of New York, now under indictment for wire-tapping.

Orphans and Pigs Fed from the Same Bowl—Worse Than Anything in Oliver Twist—Likened to Oliver Twist—Children Live Amid Squalor—Had One Toothbrush for 400 Children—Boys' Home Looked Like Pig Pen—Oliver Twist Outdone in Staten Island Home.

Keep your eye on Oliver Twist. Brush up your Dickens, and picture a domineering, drunken, hypocritical brute, Mr. Bumble, and find his modern counterpart in the Rev. Malick Fitzpatrick, Rector of the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. This is what Mr. Kingsbury's pamphlet asks you to do. Recall a miserable, dirty, underfed little boy, shrinking from a look as from a blow; a parish child, as Dickens says, the orphan of the workhouse, a humble, broken-spirited, half-starved drudge, to be cuffed and buffeted through the world, despised by all and pitied by none. He will represent, according to Mr. Kingsbury's erstwhile anonymous pamphlet, the boys and girls of the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. And with these impressions firmly fixed, witness the deepening of the picture, as with a tear in his eye and a choke in his voice, he of the singular memory, Mr. John A. Kingsbury, testifies before the Strong Commission concerning "the melancholy picture" which he "can never forget" of little crop-headed children, "some without anything at all to eat," and others eating "with their fingers out of tin dishes" food "dished" from a bowl which also served the pigs of the establishment.

I do not know the condition of Mr. Kingsbury's eyes. I do not know what he regards as a proper standard of truth. But I know that on December 8, 1915, a few months before he sobbed out his sad story before the Strong Commission, Mr. John A. Kingsbury in company with his Deputy, Mr. William J. Doherty, visited the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. They were hospitably received by Mr. Bumble in the person of Rev. Malick Fitzpatrick, and in the afternoon were his guests at a play given by the little girl-drudges in honor of the Blessed Virgin. Furthermore, before their departure, Messrs. Kingsbury and Doherty publicly spoke in praise of the Rector, of the Sisters who are his aids, and of the excellent work that was being done in an establishment which, however, was "worse than anything in Oliver Twist," "looked like a pig pen," and was wont to feed "orphans and pigs from the same dish." Where does the truth lie? In December, 1915, the Commissioner of Charities and his Deputy are well pleased with the institution; at least, they publicly proclaim their satisfaction. Three months later, they search Dickens for types of wretchedness, squalor and misery.

I do not pretend to share the exalted standard of truth and morality raised by Mr. John A. Kingsbury. But this I know and assert: that to characterize the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin as "worse than anything in Oliver Twist" is an absolute untruth.

On Monday, May 21, unannounced I visited this maligned institution. Here, "Children Live Amid Squalor," says Mr. Kingsbury's headline; but as we drove through the park-like enclosure, a square mile in extent, I was struck by the singular beauty of the surroundings. A bright-faced, rosy-cheeked boy took my card and ushered me into the home that "Looked Like a Pig Pen," but which to me, looked immaculately clean. I must consult my oculist who, by the way, happens to be the oculist of this institution. Nothing more unlike Oliver Twist could be imagined than this boy at the door. He carried himself well; his teeth were good; and he had "washed behind his ears," final proof to all mothers that he was well instructed in the arts of personal cleanliness. I did not have the heart to insult this little chap by asking him if he had ever fed from the same bowl with a pig, but I did inquire if he had enough to eat. With a look in his eyes, much the same as the look in your eyes were the question put you by a total stranger, he answered simply, "Why, of course, Father."

Here let me dispose, once for all, of the question of starvation and dirt at this institution. Neither exists at the Mission, nor ever did. I noted but one suspicious circumstance during my visit. Every boy of the many whom I interrogated, replied that the food was plentiful. This does not square with my experience with growing boys; I have seen few who were not habitually hungry. I cannot explain the contrary phenomenon at Staten Island; but perhaps the simple abundant food which I saw served, and the typed dietary of which I have a copy, together with the refrigerators, storerooms, truck-farms, dairies, chicken-yards, the famous "piggery," and the shining, thoroughly-equipped kitchens of the institution, make it less of a mystery. The squalor and dirt are as imaginary as the famine. Messrs. Kingsbury and Doherty seem to have noted none on December 8, 1915; I saw none, though I looked for it, on May 21, 1916. I inspected the washrooms and the facilities for bathing; I was present when the boys, each with his individual towel and soap, were "washing up." Their skins are clean, also their uncropped heads, and at the risk of weariness it may be repeated that each boy has a toothbrush and uses it. Likewise their clothes, changed weekly or as required, are clean. The dormitories are large and airy; the floors, scrubbed to the grain, the beds and bedding, which I examined carefully, are spotlessly clean. I do not "remember" these facts from the report of another; I, a casual visitor, saw them myself. And anyone who knows boys and institutions will admit that this cleanliness is not a hurried reformation, established in a few months or a year, but must show that neatness and order are a tradition at the school. I freely mingled with the boys at supper. Now you do not expect a thousand boys to dine together with the quiet dignity of a party of Oxford dons. But I much doubt if a single boy of the more than one thousand before me could "Lap up His Soup from a Pail," as according to another headline is the custom, or, granted the skill, would care to do so. Mr. Kingsbury remembers this scene as a "melancholy picture"; what I saw was a crowd of typical American boys, tired and hungry after a well-balanced day of work and play, applying themselves to the evening meal in a boy-like yet civilized fashion. Mr. Kingsbury, by the way, continually harping on the note of melancholy, must be a veritable kill-joy in any company; while I, a gaunt person with none of the winning graces of Punchinello, found an answering smile on the face of every boy with whom I talked. I think I know the reason why smiles are common on the faces of these boys, rescued by a Christ-like charity from the streets, or from desolate homes broken by death, abject poverty or vice. It is written in an inscription near the door of the well-arranged library founded and maintained, by a singular perversity, for the pupils of this Oliver Twist school:

> My dear Boys: This hall is yours. Every board that has been built into it, every nail that has been driven, every brush that has been used to decorate it, every picture that has been hung, every touch that has been added to make it comfortable and neat, has been done out of a spirit of love for you, as well as a supreme faith in your manliness and honor. All that is asked is that you use it in a gentlemanly manner, and that you may be so interested in it as to see that proper care is taken of it. We confidently trust all this to your honor.

Such is the spirit of this Oliver Twist school, springing from love of its pupils and a supreme faith in their manliness and honor. This is easily "worse than anything in Oliver Twist"; I do not remember anything like it in Oliver Twist. I cannot say much in this paper of the Girls' Department, a splendid institution on a beautiful site overlooking Prince's Bay. But I cannot refrain from reprinting a card found in many of the classrooms:

WHAT EVERY GIRL SHOULD BE ABLE TO DO

To Sew. To Cook. To Mend. To be Gentle. To be Patient. To Value Time. To Dress Neatly. To Keep a Secret. To be Self-Reliant. To Avoid Idleness. To Respect Old Age. To Hold Her Tongue. To Make Good Bread. To Keep a House Tidy. To Make a Home Happy. To be Above Gossiping. To Control Her Temper. To Take Care of the Sick. To Sweep Away Cobwebs. Above All, to Attend to Her Religious Duties.

But what of the "constructive work" at Mount Loretto? I could not tell half of what I know—not "conjecture"—of this phase of the institution in ten articles. I might write, for instance, of the classrooms which I visited, and of the learned discourses which I held with the boys, on points of history, ethics, parsing, analysis, geography, and, somewhat fearfully, of arithmetic. I might note how out of a class of some forty boys, nearly all wrote a hand like copper-plate, and how these "beaten, under-fed drudges" answered me brightly and pleasantly, just, Madam, as I hope your Johnny will, at the School Inspector's next visit. Or I might tell of the gymnasium, of the bulletin-board with the standing of the American and National Leagues, and the results of yesterday's games; of Father Smith's four Home Leagues and their games at home and abroad; of the battalion drill and military calisthenics to the music of their own brass band and drum corps; of the Field Day, an annual event for which these broken-spirited little Olivers are eagerly training; of the "hikes," the visit to the circus, the ice carnival, the husking-bees, the football teams, the dramatic entertainments, the weekly amateur and "movie" nights; of the Holy Name Society, the Altar Boys' Society, the Drumgoole Library Association, the Dramatic Circle, the Literary and Debating Circle, the Officers' Club, in all of which, membership is held out as an incentive to hard work and good behavior; and finally I might descant on the sermons and religious instructions which the public inspectors do not like or at least ignore, and on the honor and demerit system and the Commission Form of Government at the school, which, very properly, they do like. I wish you could talk with the solemn Judge and the bright little District Attorney, who also happens to be the Drum Major, just to learn the remarkable resemblance between this school founded on faith, love and honor, and the horrors of Mr. Bumble's workhouse to which it has been brutally likened. Here I can only mention these activities and note that they are realities, not names; I must hasten to meet the charge that, whatever Mount Loretto now is, it was worse than the Black Hole of Calcutta before the sweetness and light of reform had been shed upon it by Messrs. Doherty and Kingsbury.

The charge is readily met, first by asserting, and then by proving, that it is false. In 1888, a period when our 1916 reformers were engaged in widely different pursuits, the Hon. Elbridge T. Gerry thus wrote to Father Drumgoole, founder and for many years rector of the institution:

> I sincerely trust that you will not forget the Society (the Childrens' Aid) in your prayers, and that the interest you have always so practically shown in your long and laborious work of caring for the helpless little ones of this city, will continue to find its echo in your appreciation of this Society, which stands always ready to second your praiseworthy and most excellent efforts in their behalf.

In 1888, while on a visit to Mount Loretto, this great child-lover publicly spoke of the institution as "a model, where children are reared and educated to be useful members of society; where they are taught that there is a God to worship and a religion to follow." "My heart goes out to the dear old home," writes Brother Adrian, of the Community of the Sacred Heart, twenty years later, "as I pause to think of the blessings that were mine while in its sheltering arms, fatherless, motherless, I found a mother's love and a father's care." "What pleasant memories," writes an alumnus, E. J. Gallagher, in 1908, "the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary recalls to us, the veterans of the dear old place." "If today," said the Rev. William Fogarty, in 1912, "I am able to stand at the Altar of God to offer Him the Sacrifice of the Mass, the credit of it all must be given to the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin," and there can be little doubt that his sentiments are re-echoed by the Rev. John J. Sheridan, late of the American College, Rome, and by other alumni, clerical and lay, who have won an honorable place in the world. This testimony, extending over more than three decades, is fitly closed by the resolutions, passed on April 13, 1916, by the Alumni Association, "composed of young men and men of mature years," proud of their Alma Mater, which "brand as false and misleading the statements and charges of alleged abuses and ill-treatment of the children of the Mission." They "declare that it is entirely inconceivable to the members of this Alumni," the majority of whom have kept in close touch with the institution, "that such unhappy conditions of living could exist at Mount Loretto even for one day." Granted for the moment that this conclusion is in error, there is no error in their "grateful acknowledgment of the long years of unremitting toil and self-sacrificing devotion of our beloved teachers and guardians . . . saintly men and women who have sacrificed their all for the poor." Oliver Twist schools do not call forth tributes such as this.

To conclude. Are children ill-treated at Mount Loretto? They are not. Are the children at Mount Loretto trained, as Elbridge Gerry wrote, "to be useful members of society; taught that there is a God to worship and a religion to follow"? They are. What, then, are the headlines quoted at the opening of this article? They are just plain falsehoods told and propagated for an unworthy purpose.

If these answers do not suit you, I trust you will investigate for yourself. Nothing would better please the directors of this maligned institution, who in spite of much persecution are doing a glorious work for God and for the State.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians

MEN must worship. It is inevitable. Either they will adore the Lord their God and Him alone will they serve, or they will set up in the desert places of their hearts "a rag and a bone and a hank of hair" and fall down and adore it with grimness of devotion. We have St. Paul for it that some worship their bellies. The object of right worship is God alone; the object of wrong worship may be anything from a peanut to an abstraction. The pantheist, for example, worships all "outdoors," the peanut included; that strange being, the superman, worships himself, which must amuse the peanut; the Tarahumare Indian gives devotional honor to the peyote, the grisliest of all vegetables that grow on the fierce Mexican mesas.

All men in their senses either obey or disobey the First Commandment. They adore God or they make images stand in His place. The instinct to worship is as much a part of man, and as necessary to him, as the instinct and necessity of eating. It inheres in him before skin clothes him; it remains with him after his skin has shriveled into dust. It is deep in his soul, and will be with him forever more intimately than flesh is welded to bone, and that whether he find his place in heaven or hell, for worship is not absent from hell. Hate and despair are gods there.

It is strange that the existence of this quality should be so little known, positively denied by some; and more surprising still, that multitudes, scientists even, are not aware that such an instinct is an essential element of human nature. There are numbers of people in the world, perhaps a majority, who have not the least idea that they carry about with them such an organ as a vermiform appendix; certainly only a minority of the race realize that they have stowed away in a pocket at the base of the brain an attachment called the pituitary. But these two contrivances are certainly a part of each human structure and in spite of the ignorance concerning them, all men carry these articles about with them more carefully than they do their watches. It would be amazing to hear of an anatomist who doubted, or went so far as to deny, the existence of the appendix or the pituitary. We should say of him what Charles Dudley Warner said of Tolstoy, "The poor man is locoed." Shall less be said of the pseudo-scientists who not only have not found out that they themselves have an instinct to worship, but, with all the suavity of the insane, let it be understood that those who teach the existence of such an instinct are a trifle rustic? Some scientists, like some of the insane, would be amusing if they were not distressing.

The root-principle of worship is the dependent character of our nature, or to put it the other way around, the failure of self-sufficiency. Every man seeks something outside himself to lean upon, or intensifies some power within himself in a effort to get from it the support he needs. Humanity is not sufficient unto itself. It needs a friend, a father, a personal God. If it does not find its true Friend and Father and God, it will build a substitute from a stick or a stone or from the airy substance of one or another of its own functions. It will actually attempt to raise itself by its boot-straps.

The lower the mental development of men, the more they will turn to the material objects around them and center upon some one of these their hope of help; whence the sun and the moon, the cat and the bull, the tree and the rock have been, and still are, as gods to innumerable children of men. As civilization, through its various agencies, expresses some of the grossness out of the flesh, and the intellectual life predominates, the tendency is away from the material as an object of worship. First the functions of the body are deified, then the operations and qualities of the soul, and finally the crystallized aspiration of a tribe or a nation; whence we have the spectacle of Greece bowing down before beauty, of Rome worshiping power, of France adoring liberty, of England placing its trust in wealth, and is it too much to say that America, in common with most of the nations of the earth, is steadily turning its heart to efficiency as the mountain whence help shall come to us?

Efficiency, the new paganism, is with us. Its temples are building in hamlets and cities, and quick feet are hurrying to the new worship. Beauty, power and wealth, even Christian Science, have been adored, but the clay in all of them has shown through the glaze, and each of these gods is wobbly on the pedestal. Not so with efficiency. This idol stands upright with a fresh face to the dawn, with joyous shoulders thrown back, ready to carry the burden of humanity, and with firm feet set toward the forefront. No soft, Grecian-rounded lines of flesh in this god as in beauty; no lightnings in the hand as in the power of Rome; no mawkish cap over hatchet features as in the liberty of France; no oily smugness as in the wealth of England! None of this in the new god, efficiency! We have made our graven image with a spring to it, with an air of going forward to meet problems in joy of heart and gladness of face, sure of the issue and trusting in nothing in all the world outside the splendid web of muscles and the stronger web of will behind the forward-looking eyes. "Who indeed is like unto our god?"

It cannot be gainsaid that the image is fair to look upon and is stimulating alike to fresh young blood and to jaded maturity. Salvation ought to be sure and swift at the nod of the new leader. But here's the rub. Will this idol go down the way already trod to the bitter end by beauty and power and liberty and wealth and all the other gods that stretch back even beyond Adam to Lucifer and his pride? It is to be thought and hoped it will, for it is of the same substance as all the broken gods, and at the end of the trail must come again the cry, "Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean." For efficiency is the product of men, and is less than beauty or liberty or power, which come direct from God, and is not more than co-equal with wealth or strength or refinement or any one of the mass of other ideals that men have leaned upon as they have not leaned upon their Creator. So it shall go to its place.

The failure to make eternal this latest idol will come from the same cause that has shattered all other gods that have ever been contrived. Men cannot be temperate when they leave the worship of the only God. Once they have forgotten God, they invariably and by force of law, fail, through excess, of final accomplishment of their purpose, whether the ideal they set before them be of itself good or evil.

Human efficiency, the exercise of the various powers of the mind and body to normal strength, is an end to be earnestly sought by all men; lack of such exercise to a proper degree is a sin and an evil; but carried beyond a proper limit it is equally a sin and an evil. The nature of the end to be reached must determine the reasonableness of the strain to be put upon energy to secure it. If the good to be gained be God, or the virtues leading to God, then there need be no limit to the amount of efficiency one may rightfully cultivate; this path is open and endless and delightful.

There are practically no limits when the energy is expended in behalf of others for supernatural motives, since this is really making God the end: "as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me." But when the end sought has reference only to temporal affairs, the pursuit must be well within the bounds of the strength of our mental and physical powers if failure and disappointment are to be avoided. It is a characteristic of efficiency that when it is exercised toward eternal things it feeds its own strength and never reaches the climax of its power; while if the object be rooted in this world each individual has a very definite point of efficiency beyond which effort becomes a weakness, and perseverance means exhaustion. Efficiency in the service of God can never be overdone; efficiency in our own service easily overreaches itself.

It is this last sort of efficiency that is fast becoming the modern Diana of the Ephesians. The schools teach it; the shops are ruled by it; the farms are coming to it; the armies of a large part of the world are being wiped out by it; the religious sects have not been dissolving fast enough through theological solvents and are reaching out in their agony to this fresh destroyer; it is in the universal air, and we must be efficient or nonentities. The doctrine of efficiency for its own sake is being taught and practised everywhere. The young are being trained to think that now at last they have the key to happiness here and hereafter; let them only keep their powers stretched and they will surely work out their salvation, spiritual and economic. Work and you will succeed is the principle; and do not waste time in worrying about the kind of work. Whatever may be its object, wealth, power, pleasure, philanthropy, honor, only work, and salvation in this world at least will come. Success is the summum bonum and the means to the end is work.

In answer to this call multitudes are straining every nerve in their eagerness to "accomplish." They have made the superman their ideal, and nerves and muscles, flesh and blood, virtue and recreation, and duties to God and State and family are brushed aside in the mad development of efficiency, that a few years of success may crown their lives. Often the success is attained, but even when it is not ashes of roses, as most frequently is the case, is it worth while, is it justified, is it wise?

There is no doubt that painful work may be a blessing, but it is well to remember that it was imposed as a curse, and the curse still abides. It is by acceptance of it as a curse that it may be turned into a blessing; refusal to accept it, out of sloth, or the attempt to direct it to a wrongful end is always doomed to defeat. Painful labor is a curse, but a curse subject to the law of reason. He who labors not at all or too little shall find no rest; he who labors too much or toward an evil end shall sweat in vain. Only those who work in patience and cheerfulness and with confidence in their Master shall reap a sure reward.

If there be any one thing in the Gospel more striking than another it is the ease and quietness and steadiness of Our Lord's work. There is no sign of strain, no excitement, no anxiety. He knew the end from the very beginning, betrayal, desertion, mockery, death, failure. But His work went on evenly, confidently, and as it were with a steady pull, with no jerks or violence. What a contrast this is to our modern teachers of efficiency, urging their pupils to more and greater endeavor, holding up accomplishment as the sole measure of merit, regardless of nerves, brain, muscles, or rest, with ever the call for more and yet more. And all to what end? That gold may be heaped up, that men may lift their eyes in momentary praise or envy, that wines may flow in heavier currents, that motors may speed with greater fleetness, that guns may blaze with mightier destruction, that lives of "submen" may be made more barren.

A false standard has been set up. Efficiency has been elevated to the dignity of a virtue or a sacrament. It is neither; directed to a wrong end, it becomes a vice and a sign of contradiction, and the end of it is destruction. No laborer has a right to give more of his strength even to a rightful master and for a large compensation than nature in her ordinary course will restore; much less has any man the right to give out of his powers in sweat and anxiety, and with the fervor of the gambler, to an evil master of his own creation, or to one imposed upon him by the convention of public opinion. No man merits praise for overworking himself in the service of the world, the flesh or the devil. And yet it is to this pass that many otherwise very decent folk have come.

How often we hear assigned as the cause of death, nervous break-down from overwork, or pneumonia induced by a run-down condition from too great attention to business, or heart failure brought on through anxiety over the outcome of plans; how often we read of commitments to asylums, of suicides and of physical breakdowns caused by overwork, in other words by efficiency carried to the breaking point. And how different is the attitude of the public toward misfortunes of this kind than toward those caused, for example, by drink. It is announced that the banker or the politician died of overwork, which means, of the struggle to pile up more gold, or to acquire more power, and palm is wreathed about his monument. He was a martyr. He was efficient. His neighbor dies of drink, and the verdict is that he came to the end he deserved. He was a disgrace. He was inefficient.

But in reality, is it any less honorable to die of unbridled animal appetite than of unrestrained avarice or pride? Is a man less guilty who shortens his days for gold or for power than he who does the same for drink or for the dreams that come from the poppy? Surely not. Why then is the one made a hero and the other an outcast? Because when we leave the Lord our God we make to ourselves false idols and fall down and adore them. There is no life, no power in these images. They will not save us, but if followed too long and too far they will destroy us. The objects we worship are our ideals, and by ideals we stand or fall. Our latest god is of unsubstantial stuff like all the others and when it crumbles we cannot escape the ruin.

After all the clamor of the cries to this new Diana of the Ephesians, after the turmoil and the strain of the worship of efficiency, how grateful it is to hear the voice of the Lord in its quietness and sympathy telling us: "Behold the birds of the air, for they neither sow nor do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not you of much more value than they? Be not solicitous therefore, saying: What shall we eat; or what shall we drink, or wherewith shall we be clothed? For your Father knoweth that you have need of all these things." M. J. RIORDAN.

"Caliban by the Yellow Sands"

WHETHER ten thousand or twenty thousand persons witnessed the masque at the stadium of the College of the City of New York on May 24, is not a matter of primary importance. The assistance of a huge audience certainly contributed to the artistic success of Percy MacKaye's conception; but with only the cold click of the cinematograph and the dull hum of the phonograph to record this pageant the result would still have been satisfying and appropriate as an act of homage to the sublime genius of Shakespeare.

Yet the crowd, straining ears to catch the excellent diction of the drama, and fastening its eyes on the feast of color and sensuous motion, was the most significant equation in this revival of community art in so blasé a theatric environment as New York City. It is not difficult to invent pretentious terms to describe the crowd's part in the performance; we can say that it exemplified the genuine democratic love for concrete poetry, and a purist could not quarrel with the truth of the expression, but even a poet might question its accuracy. For a hundred psychological items make up the sum of the masque's attraction, not the least prominent of which are its occasion and its novelty.

Perhaps many among players and spectators were familiar with the epithet "Dark Ages" as a derogation of uncommercial Christendom, and for these, if they think of it, the masque should make a portrait of medieval milieu; a vindication of the claim, tendered under provocation, that the world has seen fewer things as beneficently beautiful as romantic Catholicism.

In designing "Caliban," Mr. MacKaye approached his task like the true poet he is. The creation of so noble a pageant as that of St. Louis had taught him what could really be done with the stars as the fourth wall of his stage, and he worked zealously and evolved a scenario which, with Mr. Urban's scenic and light endowment, constitutes a theatrical epoch and an historical event. It was little less than a stroke of genius to blend a basic allegory of the human soul with the majestic movement of drama through the civilized ages, and any slight limitations of full effectiveness were more circumstantial than artistic. The idea of an inner stage, where Shakespearian tableaux formed the core of the magnificent episodes staged in the wide and artfully illuminated arena, was almost demanded by the conditions of the production; but the perfection of its accomplishment could not have been attained without the zealous cooperation of all concerned, which had something nobler than personal credit for its incentive.

After a man of poetic gift and classical education, with a subtle mastery of technique, has given himself to dream of the reunion of Prospero, Ariel and Caliban as the starting point of a pageant not only of Shakespeare but of the Immortal Muse, it is no wonder that he should strikingly insert Caligula and the Cross of Christ in gripping contrast. Mr. MacKaye had the dream, and it was greater than his interpretation of it; but there is an absolute excellence about the interpretation that can review the prophetic path of drama and hold thousands spellbound with a picturesque recital of humanity's spiritual conquests. And the final note of hope, struck in the face of war and the more terrible chaos of triumphant materialism, is one that Religion will applaud more conscientiously than Art.

Prospero's magic in summoning to earth epochal poets and their poetry provided an entertainment unprecedented in theatrical annals; but Prospero's logic was even greater than his magic, for the solemn, pagan tread of Euripides is a forceful premise to the free, joyful procession of Christian chivalry and folk-play. The synthetic argument of the masque, which is too lengthy to bear inventorial epitome, accentuates the delight that must have been Shakespeare's. And a Catholic can well understand Shakespeare's delight, for the Creator placed this master-brain in an atmosphere pregnant with religious emotion, and an environment that gave England her vanished title "merrie."

The participation of eminent actors and actresses in a performance essentially amateur testifies that the community endeavor is not suspected as a possible competitor of the professional stage. This may seem an unimportant consideration in connection with a tercentennial; but "Caliban" is an experiment as well as a celebration. Its success will stimulate the worthy endeavors of those who are ambitious to see the community masque regain its place as a democratic institution.

And this leads to the thought of what the old-time masque might have become as a force for moral stamina if it had never been totally supplanted by the footlights. Modern invention, as depicted in "Caliban," can certainly raise the spectacular virtue of the masque to a height beyond anything the closed theater can achieve, and this speaks strongly for commercial practicability—an indispensable consideration. So it may be safely averred that with capable management and a supporting press the popularity of the community masque, and its consequent social good, would be assured.

The charming traditions of European cities provide a fruitful field for pageantry; but there is no reason why America should envy this avenue of art when she has the key to it in her possession. "Caliban" synchronizes well with the pageant of Newark, and the two events unite to prove that the community spirit needs only proper evocation and happy purpose to flower as promisingly as our circumscribing economic life will permit.

Being a true work of art, where fifteen hundred persons work in exemplary unison, the simple eusynopton of the masque should make the observant realize that there is a spirit in the thing well worth study and reflection. That spirit is not suited to cold analysis, however clear, because the warmth of religion inspires and pervades it. The mere fact that several hundred people dressed beautifully, spoke beautifully, and danced beautifully in interludes and incidents is something singular for technical record. What is permanent and particular is that all this was done for a reason besides public entertainment, and we do not have to trace this reason far before we touch the human love of ritual, which has its human purport in the "traffic of the stage," and its deep supernatural significance in the rich practice of the faith which was fresh in Shakespeare's mind. Otherwise he might have been England's greatest dramatist, but certainly not her finest dramatic poet.

Mr. MacKaye and all others interested in this wholesome revival of pageantry and community play are artists who will acknowledge the immediate descent of their elaborate scenes from the miracle plays of old; and they will surely recognize that the same democratic, robust religious spirit that made the miracle play successful is not wholly eradicated by the blights that have marred our spiritual history since knighthood was in flower. It will respond to the right touch, but that touch must be artistic, and above all, sincere.

So whatever cultural value we attach to "Caliban," the lesson is well learned that the democratic love of pageantry, simply poetic despite the high elaboration of mechanics and chorus, survives amid the glitter and glare of "hustle" and "punch." New York is a city of five million population, mostly poets.

JOHN B. KENNEDY.

COMMUNICATIONS

A Call to the Colors

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The recruiting campaign offers a special task to the Sixty-ninth Regiment, and we invite the cooperation of all men of Irish race in accomplishing it. We have to do our own recruiting if we wish to maintain the character of the regiment; and we must do it quickly.

The old Regiment is in this community the organization which represents the military valor of the Celt. It has a history which is a source of patriotic pride to every man of Irish name. Its flagstaff has silver ferrules recording the names of our fifty battles in which the regiment has been engaged. If our people wish to maintain the fine traditions of our fathers, they should not only lend their support to this regiment, they should make it, as they could easily do, the banner regiment for numbers and military efficiency in the National Guard.

The Sixty-ninth Regiment, though not a Catholic organization, has also rendered distinct services to the Catholic cause. The main attack upon the Church has always been that it is unpatriotic, un-American. In time of danger, thousands of Catholics all over the land will flock to the standards, but their bravery and patriotism will not redound to the credit of the Church that inspired their virtues in the way that they should, unless they find an outlet in a regiment like ours. In the event of war the Sixty-ninth Regiment will probably be the nucleus of a new Irish Brigade, whose valor and devotion will stop the mouth of bigotry for another generation. Now is the time to come to the aid of this regiment. The internal discussions which injured its standing are now happily ended, and the old drinking element is practically gone from the National Guard. We have a very fine lot of men in the ranks, capable and gentlemanly officers, and for commanding officer a gallant and high-minded Catholic gentleman who has the respect of the whole community.

It is a regiment that any man should be proud to belong to. Leaders of the Irish race in this city, clerical and lay, should cooperate at least to the extent of swinging to our direction the enlistments of young men of that race who feel the call to military service. A good half of the members of the militia in New York are Catholics, the bulk of these being Irish. If the eligibles for our organization who have entered the Guard during the year had come to us, we should have a regiment on parade Memorial Day that would be a source of jubilant pride to every man that bears an Irish name.

FRANCIS P. DUFFY,
Chaplain; 69th Infantry.

New York.

A Good Suggestion

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On May 15, a quarter of a century ago, the famous Encyclical Rerum Novarum went forth from the Vatican on its beneficent mission throughout the civilized world. I learn from the Dutch daily papers that the twenty-fifth anniversary of this important Pontifical document is being celebrated in almost every city and village of the Netherlands. In some places open-air meetings are held, because there are no halls or theaters spacious enough to accommodate the large audiences of eager listeners. In the United States little or nothing is being done in commemoration of this epoch-making epistle to the Catholic Bishops, clergy and laity of every country of the globe. Many of our Catholic workmen and employers are still ignorant of the sane and solid principles of social reform, expressed in this, the greatest Papal pronouncement of the nineteenth century. "Since the Divine words, 'I have compassion on the multitude,' were spoken in the wilderness," says Cardinal Manning, "no voice has been heard throughout the world pleading for the people with such profound love and loving sympathy, for those that toil and suffer, as the voice of Leo XIII." Would it not be a good thing to commemorate this anniversary during the first week of September in every Catholic parish of the country?

De Pere, Wis. A. F. T.

The Boy Scout Movement

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a reader of your publication, I have been interested in the various articles entitled, "The Boys of Our City." The suggestions contained in those articles are valuable, but I have been forcibly impressed by the failure of anyone to speak of the Boy Scouts, as a possible solution of the boy problem. The Boy Scout movement is one that is rapidly growing throughout the country, and affords a great attraction to every boy; so much so, that boys of Catholic faith are seeking troops wherever they may find them. I have in mind that in New York City the Catholic Boy Scouts are recognized by the ecclesiastical authorities. I myself have been interested in the movement, and have talked with other Catholic gentlemen who have a like interest I have not seen anything anti-Catholic connected with it. The work is educational and appeals to every boy with blood in his veins. It is also American.

Why then should not the Catholic Church take advantage of this organization in behalf of its boys, and not wait until it has attained the utmost success? We have seen what the Y. M. C. A. has done, and we are seeking to find something which will afford a like attraction for our lads. Though the Boy Scout movement is not in the main, military, the broadness of its training takes a boy over the rough places of a military training, and familiarizes him sufficiently with drill work to insure that he will not throw himself away in battle.

Norwalk, Conn. EDWARD J. QUINLAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Attention is called to the articles: "A Mayor, a Church, a Conspiracy" and "The Charities Investigation: An Oliver Twist School" in this issue.

The Gospel at Atlantic City

THE Presbyterian General Assembly, lately in session at Atlantic City, was engaged with a number of topics; divorce, for instance, and reunion. Even when the good-will of the delegates is admitted, the wisdom and prudence of some of their conclusions seem open to criticism. Touching the plague of divorce, overlooking the simple but effective expedient of forbidding the clergy to officiate at adulterous unions, however sanctioned by the civil authority, the Assembly weakly suggests that the clergy preach at least once a year against divorce, seeking at the same time uniform and more stringent State legislation. Any mention of the Catholic Church in this regard seemed, no doubt, inopportune; the subject of reunion, however, afforded an opportunity that was not lost. When a report recommending closer union between the Presbyterian Church and the Commission of Christian Unity was read, a scrupulous delegate arose to remark that he would withhold his assent if the report included "Mormons and Catholics." His scruple was removed by the Rev. W. H. Roberts, clerk of the Assembly. "They are not included," said this gentleman. "I, for one, never want them included. They are not evangelical." Whereat, reports the New York Times, "Dr. Roberts was long and loudly applauded." One wonders if this evangelical applause was interrupted when fifteen presbyteries presented to the Assembly the following request:

That the Assembly use whatever constitutional power it possesses to exclude from the ministry of our churches, those who are assailing the fundamental truths of the Gospel, especially those charged with the instruction of the candidates for the ministry.

Whether or not Presbyterian clergymen and professors in Presbyterian seminaries, may assail "the fundamental truths of the Gospel" and retain their official positions, is a question which the Assembly may or may not answer at a future session. But pending the answer it would seem fitting that Dr. Roberts rank his own communion with the Church of the Latter Day Saints and the Abomination of Rome, as a non-evangelical body.

Logopathy

"LOGOPATHY," in the jargon of the doctors, means "disorder of speech due to disease of the brain." Acute cases of the malady do not appear to be common, but in its milder forms the infirmity is widespread. Indeed almost everybody suffers from occasional attacks of the disease and unless effective remedies are applied it easily becomes chronic. Early symptoms of the disorder are a fondness for solemn platitudes, old wives' proverbs, and threadbare quotations. The frequent use, for example, of observations about the importance of being in earnest, of apothegms that emphasize the commercial value of thrift or honesty, and of Shakespeare's reflections on the deceitfulness of appearances, are generally signs of incipient logopathy. The further progress of the disorder is marked by the patient's addiction to senseless catchwords and meaningless slang. Men and women who often have on their tongues such words as "uplift," "efficiency," "service" and "preparedness," or who use without discrimination metaphors borrowed from the ball-field, are seriously infected with logopathy and should consult a specialist without delay. For those, however, who are in the last stage of this dreadful malady practically nothing can be done.

You can easily tell the chronic sufferer from logopathy. An aggravation of the symptoms just described indicates that for him words have ceased to be the signs of ideas. Moreover, he or she is, as a rule, an emotional creature, much given to using expletives and interjections. He regards the "wonder-point" as the most important punctuation mark and hyperbole the noblest of the figures. All the intensive adverbs and adjectives are his prime favorites and his only aversion is understatement. Such words as very, perfectly, exceedingly, absolutely, singularly, exceptionally, superb, lovely, awful, charming, amazing and most extraordinary, reinforced by the oaths peculiar to velvet guards and Sunday citizens are constantly used by the victim of chronic logopathy to describe the marvels of familiar things and commonplace people, or to express his opinion of ordinary occurrences. His remarks, so to speak, are all in italics.

"But is there no cure," it will be asked, "for this dread disease?" Not for its acute form. But if the proper treatment is employed during the earlier stages of the malady a permanent recovery generally follows. With a really submissive patient, an experienced logopathist can indeed work wonders. The regimen is similar to that prescribed for the victim of the drug habit, only more severe. For the sufferer from logopathy must be gradually withdrawn from the use of all his cherished adverbs. During the first day's treatment he will be allowed to say very, for instance, only fifty times; the next day, forty; the next, twenty-five, and so on. In like manner he must learn to avoid slang, catchwords, platitudes, proverbs, and stale quotations, and under no circumstances will expletives, interjections and wonder-points be permitted. To hasten the patient's recovery his English reading must be confined to books written prior to the beginning of the sixteenth century, and he should be encouraged to thumb assiduously a good volume of synonyms. So if a skilful specialist is called in betimes, even logopathy can be cured.

City Brides

HAPPY the city whose Corporation Counsel is gifted with imagination, and by this token New York is to be congratulated. An entirely new marriage ceremony has been drafted for the great metropolis. No longer will Aldermen intrude where Hymen alone should be supreme. Those grim arbiters of charters are banished henceforth from civic bridal celebrations. What if the City Clerk must now join all the willing hands? If he be worthy of his office, he should be glad to spend his day radiating blushing happiness.

Poetic fancy is not indeed of much assistance to logic, but who would be so dull as to demand consistency, where orange blossoms and June brides are in question? Nevertheless it was somewhat incongruous to insert in the new marriage formula, pretending as it does to be wholly unsectarian, a modified form of Catholic banns, and it must make atheists smile to have God's blessing invoked upon their union. And what a mockery to ask of those who intend nothing more or less than a "trial marriage," and many such will stand before the City Clerk, whether or not they take their partner, "as long as you both shall live"! It is comforting however to know that the Corporation Counsel still believes in God, and that the old Catholic insistence on indissolubility and the old Catholic horror for divorce are still strong enough to be felt. Some Catholic ideals are still in honor, even if they are not in high vogue. New York, it would seem, is not so bad after all.

A "Practical" Catholic

"ONE must have the heart of a child toward God, of a mother toward one's neighbor, and of a judge toward oneself." This was the counsel Père Henri Joyard, a distinguished Jesuit preacher who died a dozen years ago, used to give his hearers. The words admirably describe a practical Catholic who "lives" his religion. Little children's virtues are the very ones that best become God's servants. Their affection, innocence, lowliness, gratitude, docility, trustfulness and simplicity are what make children so dear to parents, and these are likewise the qualities the Heavenly Father loves to find characterizing His older children in all their relations with Him. So in things of the soul a man's practical hold of amiable children's virtues can be made the measure of God's love for him.

Being a "mother toward one's neighbor" is the second mark of the practical Catholic. It means a readiness to overlook in others, as does a mother in her children, defects and shortcomings, to interpret words and deeds charitably, to be as tender of a neighbor's fair name and to be as kind to him as a mother is toward her little ones. Just as mothers, moreover, are always at their children's service, have ready for them whenever it is needed a word of counsel or comfort, and are glad to make sacrifices for them, in like manner our ideal Catholic's relations with his neighbor will be characterized by the motherly virtues of kindness, patience and self-sacrifice.

The third mark of the practical Catholic, according to Père Joyard, is the virtue of being a fair "judge toward oneself." That is difficult, because this judge, as a rule, is biased. He always enters court predisposed to favor the defendant. For that litigant's crimes and misdemeanors he easily finds a thousand extenuating circumstances, so conscience, the plaintiff, generally loses his case and has to pay the costs. Well has it been said, nevertheless, that "There is only one person in the world to whom I may always be severe, there is only one who richly deserves it, and that person is myself." But the Catholic whom self-will, self-seeking or self-love never keeps from practising this salutary judicial severity toward himself is a practical Catholic indeed. "Who is he and we will praise him? for he has done wonderful things in his life."

Government by Rebellion

BY supposition, America is a land of law and order; a supposition borne out, on the whole, by facts. Our manner of government is, in theory, simple. Our legislative bodies pass ordinances for the good of the community; executives see that they are put in effect; the judiciary applies the sanction. If any of the three functions of government invades what we deem our undoubted rights, we seek constitutional means of relief. That is, if we are good citizens. If we are not, we rebel, and call the rebellion holy. For the fourth function of civil government, sacred to the individual, is rebellion. Some would rank it not fourth, but first. We have progressed since the days of Chief Justice Marshal.

Happily for civilization, this theory has not made much headway in America. At present, it is largely confined to professional criminals, in captivity and at large, and to associations of the unthinking, such as the Woman's Peace Party of New York. Speaking through Mrs. Amos Pinchot, this organization has denounced the recently approved legislation providing military training in the public schools, as a "crime against the principles of free government." "If no other method can be thought of to cause its repeal," said Mrs. Pinchot, "it is the duty of all school children to protest against its enforcement." To counsel rebellion to school children was a happy thought; but Mrs. Pinchot's plan seems tameness itself when compared with the campaign suggested by the secretary of the Party, Miss Crystal Eastman. "What we need," declared this pugnacious lady, "is a sort of rebellion of those affected by these laws. I suggest a parade of school children, carrying banners stating that they absolutely refuse to obey the law."

The authority denounced by the Woman's Peace Party protects that organization in its corporate existence, its goods, chattels and appurtenances. There are, however, those who hold that the community would profit by the absence of this body. Yet they do not follow the plan advocated by the Peace Party, and counsel a rebellion, ending in the complete destruction of this association. The reason why they do not is plain. They are good citizens, pledged to the ancient principle that ours is a government by law, not by rebellion. When the time comes, they and their representatives may be relied upon to impose a sufficient check upon the rebellious tendencies of the Woman's Peace Party of New York.

Infected Magazines

IN a paper on "Magazine Deterioration" contributed by Mr. Frederick W. Faxon to the May Bulletin of Bibliography, he deplores "the general lowering of the popular magazine standards," that is a noticeable development of the present time. He writes:

> Within the last three years an ever-increasing mass of trashy and oftentimes debasing "literature" has appeared in new magazines. In fact we see two types of story periodicals on all our news-stands today—the poorly written, colorless story, and the "high-life" or "breezy" kind. We are now on the crest of this flood, and our better magazines begin to show its baleful tendencies. . . . [There is an] enormous output of story-magazines at ten cents and fifteen cents a copy, which flaunt their "girlie covers" on news-stands east and west, north and south. A flood of stories cheap, and many worse than cheap, fed to a public that is not reached by the public library. These and the moving-picture magazines seem to the casual observer to be the only periodicals on sale. It is possible the moving-picture craze has caused the demand for such reading. These pernicious monthlies are bought by the thousands, as the tons in the second-hand shops will testify.

In a large proportion of the magazines "everybody is reading" nowadays, the leading stories are those euphemistically styled the "ginger," "snappy," "breezy," or "pepper" type: in other words, stories that are written on purpose to minister to their readers' passion of lust. Carried by the mails to the remotest villages of the land, these vile magazines are openly displayed on the news-stands and are eagerly read by boys and girls whose hearts and minds are thus permanently stained. As there seems to be no effective way of preventing the circulation and sale of this pernicious literature, parents must ceaselessly strive to keep their children from reading it and it should be rigorously excluded from the home.

Findings of the Panama Commissions

THE voluminous reports of the Protestant Panama Conference have been made public. They consist of the findings of eight special commissions whose "expert testimony" deals with every phase of Latin American conditions, social, educational, moral and religious. Their attitude toward the Catholic Church is in general one of unfairness and bitterness. A more kindly tone is assumed, however, by the Commission on "Cooperation and the Promotion of Unity," which at least credits the Church with having been "instrumental in lifting whole communities of barbarians to a higher level of life." How far the repeated attacks upon "the Roman Church" are based upon mere prejudice and incapacity to comprehend her true spirit, it is difficult to say. Even her earliest preaching of the Gospel is described as "a lamentable misrepresentation of true Christianity." We are told that "With notable exceptions its priesthood is discredited by the thinking classes. Its moral life is weak, its spiritual witness faint. At the present time it is giving people neither the Bible, nor the Gospel, nor the intellectual guidance, nor the moral dynamic, nor the social uplift which they need." Its spirit and influence is, in short, found to be "unscriptural and unhealthy." Such "expert" findings are somewhat modified by the eighth Commission, when it recognizes, according to the Churchman, that Catholic teaching "has had moral and spiritual value of large benefit," although "the purest streams of thought and life flowed along the northern parallels."

To discuss in detail the accusations brought against the Church in these extensive reports would call for a library of controversy. Abuses doubtless exist. They have existed in the Church from the days of the Apostles. The actual success of the work accomplished varies greatly with the zeal of respective pastors and the response given by the people. But one thing is certain, and that is the inherent sanctity of the Church and the power of her Divinely instituted Sacraments to make the world holier. They have not lost their efficacy in Latin America. It is a perversion of the truth to accuse the Church of not bearing witness to the Gospel, when every letter of the Sacred Book is defended by her against the world and against Protestants themselves who today are denying the fundamental teachings of the Bible and its Divine inspiration.

The old accusations, too, are resuscitated that the Church is a political body and as such is opposed to democratic institutions. These statements have been answered by Pope Leo XIII in his Encyclicals. A government's form, provided it is not opposed to the law of God, is all a matter of indifference to the Church. The adhesion of individual Catholics, in their capacity as citizens, to one kind of government or another, must not be confused with the attitude of the Church. It neither favors monarchical institutions as such nor opposes democratic governments, but seeks to infuse into both the spirit of Christianity.

The work of the Protestant commissioners will not be without fruit if it arouses the Catholic clergy and people of Latin America to conceive a more intense loyalty to their Divine Faith and to the Sacred Scriptures as handed down to them unchanged from the days of the Apostles. For American Catholics the efforts of the Protestant denominations should be an example, a reminder of the grave duty to enter more actively and zealously into the missionary field and to contribute generously toward the support of our mission workers. Apart from other considerations the example of Protestant generosity should not be lost on us and our own resources should be given more freely to promote the spread of God's Kingdom over all the earth.

LITERATURE

Gilbert K. Chesterton's Poetry

GILBERT K. CHESTERTON and the late Henry James are not very often thought of as intellectual or spiritual brothers. And yet there is a startlingly obvious resemblance between these two writers. Both are stylists; both have thoroughly mastered certain peculiar methods of speech, and both are, it must be confessed, hampered by their undeviating loyalty to these methods.

This is not the place to analyze the style of Mr. James. It is sufficient to recall to the reader's mind the fact that the author of "The Golden Bowl" was not concerned so much with the presentation of extraordinary ideas as with the extraordinary presentation of ordinary ideas. And the extraordinariness of his presentation consisted in its thoroughness; he was not content to suggest the thing or to show one aspect of it; he was able, and seemed to feel a certain moral obligation, to present every aspect of the thing, to give all its dimensions, characteristics, origins and possibilities. His method may roughly be indicated by saying that it is the opposite of impressionism.

Gilbert K. Chesterton's method, which is more readily observed and defined in his poetry than in his prose, also consists chiefly of the extraordinary presentation of ordinary ideas. But he does not attempt to give every aspect and shading of an idea. Rather he attempts to present that aspect of an idea which, while true, is sufficiently unusual to surprise the reader; the theory being that the attention attracted by the unusualness will be held by the truth.

This method is admirably suited to the uses of fiction, as "The Ball and the Cross" and "The Man Who Was Thursday" show. It is effective in debate, and in controversial essays on matters ethical and political, as is shown by the writings of Mr. Chesterton himself and of that school of popular apologetics which he may be said to have founded. In poetry it is sometimes almost magically effective, and sometimes grotesquely inappropriate. The perfect, and most lamentable, example of the use of this method is to be found in a poem called "E. C. B.," which appears in the volume called "The Wild Knight." In this serious and, for the most part, beautiful poem, Mr. Chesterton tells us that because of the virtue of one man, evidently Mr. Edmund Clerihew Bentley, he finds something to love in every man. Bentley is a man, he says, therefore, for Bentley's sake no man is to be hated. For the sake of Bentley's humanity, Chesterton says that he loves every one, the murderer, the hypocrite, even—and this is the great climax—himself.

I should say, this was to be his great climax. But the method seizes him, and keeps him from saying anything so strongly simple as "I love myself." Instead, he says:

> I love the man I saw but now
> Hanging head downwards in the well.

But in justice to Mr. Chesterton it should be said that "E. C. B." is an early poem written before the poet had found "Marriage and a Creed." For it is pleasant to see that, unlike Henry James, Chesterton has been steadily mastering his style, mastering it so thoroughly that he can lay it aside when it is inappropriate. He lays it aside, for instance, in some of the most passionate and effective chapters of "The Crimes of England." And he lays it aside in such of his writings as best deserve the name of poetry.

There are delightful things in "The Wild Knight." The symbolism of the title poem is so extravagant that in spite of some sonorous blank verse, and some radiant imaginings, this little verse-play must be regarded rather as a boyish tour de force rather than as a contribution to literature. But "The Ballad of the Battle of Gibeon" is a splendid thing, full of the thunder of crashing arms, of courage and of faith. It is the sort of ballad that would have made Macaulay envious. In this book, too, are "The Donkey," a restrained and powerful poem, and "Gold Leaves," which is ingeniously lovely, and "Modern Elf-Land," which is a poetic rendition of the novel "Manalive," and "A Christmas Carol," which is not the less beautiful because in the last two lines Mr. Chesterton unconsciously echoes Elizabeth Barrett Browning's:

> The tropic flowers looked up to it,
> The tropic stars looked down.

There are, I have said, delightful things in the book which is called "The Wild Knight." But it is a book of experiments; it is the work of a man conscious of his own ingenuity and artistry. It lacks, for the most part, that spontaneity which is characteristic of poetry. That spontaneity we find in the later volume, the volume called simply "Poems." Here are a keener wit, a truer music, even a bolder fancy than in Mr. Chesterton's earlier verses, and here is almost great and noble passion, no longer hampered by fetters of paradox. The paradox is here, of course, but it is used, it does not use the writer. The verbal dexterity no longer obtrudes itself.

Some of the poems in this book have been so widely quoted that they seem already to be classics. There are the two war poems, for example. No poet, not even Verhaeren, has presented Belgium's case against Germany more forcefully, more conclusively than it is presented in "The Wife of Flanders." And in "Blessed are the Peacemakers," Mr. Chesterton speaks with the authority of the true poet for all those Englishmen, pro-Boers, anti-Imperialists, Democrats, who have found in their country's war against Germany a national cause which they can whole-heartedly support.

"Lepanto" is a better martial ballad than "Gibeon," and that is saying a great deal. The ballades are irresistible in their keen satire and rollicking humor. Better than any other writer of our day, Mr. Chesterton knows how to drive his rapier of rhyme to the very heart of hypocrisy. His "Anti-Christ, or the Re-union of Christendom" will be remembered long after Mr. F. E. Smith, who had the misfortune to inspire it, has passed into oblivion. Incidentally it may be remarked that some of the shrewd thrusts of "The Shakespeare Memorial" seem to find appropriate targets among the New Yorkers now engaged in celebrating the Shakespearian Tercentenary.

But the poem which most thoroughly justifies its author's claim to the title of poet is "The House of Christmas." This is indeed the beautiful expression of a beautiful impression; it has in every line the unmistakable glow of noble poetry; it is musical, imaginative, direct, and it is passionately Christian. It is the sort of thing which makes it easy to understand why many people, including, it is said, Mrs. Chesterton, believe that this great humorist, this formidable debater, this brilliant novelist, this sound critic, this accomplished essayist, is, before and above all other things, a poet. JOYCE KILMER.

REVIEWS

The Life of the First Duke of Newcastle and Other Writings. By MARGARET, DUCHESS OF NEWCASTLE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.35.

The fact that this seventeenth-century book has found a place in "Everyman's Library" is largely due, no doubt, to Charles Lamb's fondness for the eccentric author. To him she is "the thrice noble, chaste and virtuous—but somewhat fantastical and original-brained, generous Margaret Newcastle." Pepys, on the other hand, records in his renowned diary that she is "a mad, conceited, ridiculous woman," whose husband is "an ass to suffer her to write what she writes to him and of him." Though authorities thus differ about the character of the Duchess, this quaint biography, nevertheless is very amusing reading. She never meant it to be precisely that, however, for there never lived a more serious, naive and "philosophical" author than Margaret Newcastle. Her admiration for the Duke's moral and literary gifts for example, is quite unbounded. She says of him:

> As for my husband, I know him to have the valour of Cæsar, the fancy and wit of Ovid, and the tragical, especially comical art of Shakespeare; in truth, he is as far beyond Shakespeare for comical humour as Shakespeare beyond an ordinary poet in that way; also he is the best heroick poet in this age, nay in my judgment, in any, for I have seen him make twenty songs upon one theme or subject, as musick, and not one song like another; and for comedies, he hits or meets, or imitates the humours of men so justly, as he seems to go even with Nature. Indeed he is such a person, that I glory more to be his wife, than Livia to be Augustus's wife, or had I been Titus's wife.

Of her mother's high qualities she speaks with similar enthusiasm, and gives this glowing description of the perfections her own brothers and sisters had:

> She was an affectionate mother, breeding her children with a most industrious care, and tender love, and having eight children, three sons and five daughters, there was not any one crooked, or any ways deformed, neither were they dwarfish, or a giant-like stature, but everyways proportionable; likewise well featured, cleer complexions, brown haires, but some lighter than others, sound teeth, sweet breaths, plain speeches, tunable voices, I mean not so much to sing as in speaking, as not stuttering, nor wharling in the throat, or speaking through the nose, or hoarsely, unless they had a cold, or squeakingly, which impediments many have: neither were their voices of too low a strain, or too high, but their notes and words were tuneable and timely.

Who would not have enjoyed meeting such a beauteous and melodious family! But without question the fair Margaret was the bright, particular star in this galaxy of brave sons and lovely daughters, for does not she herself catalogue for us her most striking virtues? And who should know them better than their owner?

> As for my disposition, it is more inclining to be melancholy than merry, but not crabbed or peevishly melancholy, but soft, melting, solitary, and contemplating melancholy; and I am apt to weep rather than laugh, not that I do often either of them; also I am tender natured, for it troubles my conscience to kill a fly, and the groans of a dying beast strike my soul; also where I place a particular affection, I love extraordinarily and constantly, yet not fondly, but soberly and observingly; not to hang about them as a trouble but to wait upon them as a servant, but this affection will take no root, but where I think or find merit, and have leave both from divine and moral laws; yet I find this passion so troublesome, as it is the only torment to my life, for fear any evil misfortune or accident or sickness, or death, should come unto them, insomuch as I am never freely at rest. Likewise I am grateful, for I never receive a curtesie but I am impatient, and troubled until I can return it; also I am chaste, both by nature and education insomuch as I do abhorre an unchaste thought.

One reason, perhaps, that her Grace's contemporaries considered Duchess Margaret queer and eccentric, was because she proved such a loving and faithful wife, for such women were not in great favor at the court of Charles II. W. D.

Christian Feminism: a Charter of Rights and Duties. By MARGARET FLETCHER. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.20.

Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies. By Mr. and Mrs. JOHN MARTIN. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

Everybody is sufficiently interested in the movement called feminism to want to take sides. One cannot as a matter of fact be neutral. Not to be with the feminist is to be against her. What side shall we take? Margaret Fletcher's pamphlet, which is the seventh of a series of manuals edited by the Catholic Social Guild, undertakes to decide this question. She sets the whole issue on the plane of the law of God, where it belongs, and bases all her subsequent conclusions on a chapter called "Principles," which are only the well-known declarations indeed of the universal law of morality. Armed with such principles, the author is ready to determine what is needed in the present laws of England to give back to womankind her most ancient birthright, true equality of justice with man. "Can we sum up in one sentence," she asks, "the principle upon which we as Catholics take our stand? I think we can. While in the moral sphere woman is the equal of man and her position identical with his, in the physical sphere her case is separate, and the only way in which justice can be done is so to arrange the conditions of her physical life as to leave her moral freedom intact." This little book is not a bundle of theory only. Readers can find in it the present position of women, as affected by civil law, set forth clearly and the origin of this position traced definitely back through history. Readers are also shown how false is the exaggerated feminism that receives the notice of the world, and they are cautioned against allying themselves with movements that, identical indeed with Christian feminism in some aims, differ radically from it in convictions and ultimate ambitions. The style of the book deserves especial mention for its precision, vigor and persuasiveness.

"Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies" is an excellent example of how one may hurt a good cause by a poor argument. The aim of the two authors, Mr. and Mrs. Martin, each of whom writes a half of the volume, is to show the absurdities of the feminist movement, meaning, of course, the exaggerated tendencies of the ultra-feminists. Their aim is of course good. But their whole argument considers the question of feminism chiefly as a political or economic theory rather than as a moral or ethical question. They give considerable information about the demands of the leaders of the movement in many countries, and for this the book is worth while. But the authors have no solid principles of human life with which to combat such errors. Mr. Martin would substitute for feminism the ideal of humanism. And it is hard to choose between them. Feminism has at least the advantage of being definite and practical, while Mr. Martin's false ideal of humanism is vague and sentimental. Just to show the absurdities into which his baseless convictions force him, the author professes his belief in birth control and the ideals of eugenics, because forsooth his plan of humanism permits such conclusions. J. P. M.

A Thousand Years of Russian History. By SONIA E. HOWE. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.50.

This is a book inspired by the world-war, without, however, being in any way concerned with the war. Consequently it will be read with interest long after the roar of guns and the passions of combatants have been hushed in the silence of the coming peace. It was an ambitious project to undertake to narrate in 420 pages the history of the largest and most complex empire of Europe. Within such limits thoroughness is impossible, yet the story is well told and keeps the reader's interest to the close; for the style is clear, the facts selected are fully grasped and the writer is in full sympathy with her subject. The student misses, however, just those points he would like to see emphasized: an account, for instance, of the various peoples, tribes, and tongues the Russian Empire embraces; of the means by which the unity that prevails under the Czars was effected; a fuller description of the peculiarities which make Russia so different from other European nations and from other Slavic peoples. Chapters on the Cossacks, the Baltic Provinces, Poland, and Finland supply useful information about these peoples who have not yet been amalgamated, but others are left out of consideration. The period from 862 to 1612 is covered by sixty-four pages which have to do with the establishment and growth of the central Russian power, its temporary eclipse by the Tartars and its reestablishment on a firmer base than ever, despite a period of anarchy and threatened dissolution. Nothing could be better or more clearly said about those events, though the account is lacking in comprehensive treatment. On the coming of the Romanoffs to power the author broadens out and becomes more diffuse. Of course her sources of information grow more abundant on account of Russia's contact with Western nations. But it is just here that we do not stand in need of a new book. The facts are ready at hand in the ordinary histories. The author takes no pains to hide her religious bias, and displays the usual ignorance of Protestants regarding the Latin Church and the ubiquitous Jesuit, who is always a plotter to those who know nothing about him. P. J. D.

Kitchener's Mob: the Adventures of an American in the British Army. By JAMES NORMAN HALL. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

Most of its readers will doubtless vote this the best war-book that has yet appeared. A young American with the gift of literary expression tells a vivid story of his adventures from the time he joined "Kitchener's Mob," in the summer of 1914, until he found himself fighting in the trenches last fall. First the humors and rigors of his year's training in England are graphically described. One day when the author and his fellow-recruits had made what they considered a particularly brilliant charge, the umpire indignantly exclaimed: "My word! You've made a beastly mess of it! . . . Three batteries of field artillery and four machine guns have blown you to blazes! You haven't a man left!" Respect for his enemies was one of the first lessons Private Hall was forced to learn, as he had come to the firing line full of absurd newspaper stories about the German soldier's inferiority. His description of the horrors of trench fighting, "of the tremendous sadness and awful futility of war," while artistically restrained, are always striking. He is full of admiration for the courage of the Cockney soldiers whom he learned to know so well. Their religious needs, however, were neglected. "Our chaplain was a devout man," attests the author, "but prudent to a fault. Never to my knowledge did he visit us in the trenches." We have yet to hear of a Catholic chaplain in any of the armies shirking his duty. W. D.

The Church in the City. By FREDERIC DELAND LEETE, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. New York: The Abingdon Press. $1.50.

Bishop Leete is to be congratulated on making the best of a weak case; yet few books expose more completely the hollowness of the Protestant system, with its inability to meet modern conditions, than this professed defense of the Protestant organization in the large city. Repudiating the principle of a supreme authority and rejecting the Sacraments, Protestantism can neither exact an unswerving loyalty to its teachings, nor lead its followers to these Divinely-appointed means of grace. What hold it retains upon the multitude must, therefore, be effected by means of human devising. Judging from the printed reports of many metropolitan churches, it is often difficult to see in what essential points these presumably Christian organizations differ from the modern synagogue, the moving-picture theater, or the lecture-hall of the Ethical Culture Society. It is indeed to Dr. Leete's credit, that he protests against the "unspiritual tone" and mountebank methods of certain Protestant pulpits, and that he condemns without reserve the growing practice of making "soup-kitchens, gymnasiums, works of physical healing, social and political reforms" do duty as religion. His position, too, on the influence which the clergy should exercise over the amusements of the young is in general, sound, although it is impossible to second his approval of the statement credited to Jane Addams, that "recreation alone can stifle the lust for vice," nor, without a careful distinction, the further claim that athletic games are "a practical means of grace."

It is unpleasant to note that Dr. Leete is not a stranger to the practice of suggesting certain base charges incapable of proof, and that he never refers to the Catholic Church, except by an opprobrious party-name. Passing over the question of truth and Christian charity, it may be said that Dr. Leete's wide experience "in five city churches" seems to have left him somewhat deficient in elementary courtesy.

P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In his introduction to "Adventures in Common Sense" (Lane, $1.00) Dr. Frank Crane explains that he gave up, at forty-eight, the Congregationalist ministry because he realized that "my Maker had intended me for an Outsider." So he became a journalist whose mission in life was to make the "dead essay" a "living thing." The eighty or more cleverly written editorials that fill this volume are characterized, for the most part, by that false superficial philosophy of life that appeals to the so-called "man in the street" and contain not a few historical errors. Those who are eager to grow great in soul are advised to repeat thoughtfully every day such words as "stars," "mountain," "ocean," "tree" and "more." One of the best papers in the volume is written "In Praise of Laziness," for the author shows that many of our modern conveniences were born of mankind's aversion to hard work.

The Encyclopedia Press, 23 East Forty-first Street, New York, will publish early next fall a "Memorial Volume" of the late Andrew J. Shipman's writings and lectures. His schoolmate, Condé B. Pallen, will edit the book and contribute a sketch of the author. As Dr. Shipman was an admirable type of the Cathoic layman and a high authority on the languages, customs and liturgies of Eastern Europe, his many friends will doubtless be glad to secure a copy of the forthcoming work—The six "best sellers" for April have already been noticed in AMERICA. They are these: "Seventeen," "Just David," "Nan of Music Mountain," "The Real Adventure," "Life and Gabriella" and "Held to Answer."

Dr. Washington Gladden's "A Book for Graduates" (Macmillan, $1.25) shows that he is possessed of a wise and understanding heart and commands an experience in authorship and pastorate alike that extends over some fifty years. The subject of his eleven essays are those moral topics which have tried the minds of all true "Ecclesiasts" since the first and wisest of them began his speculations. The author's conclusions too are theirs; while his processes display the insight, mellowness and moderation to be expected from so long a career. In his essays "What For?" and "What Is Worth While?" he observes that the purpose of man is "service and sacrifice . . . sowing the earth with light and gladness." And here he rests his inquiry, so that his philosophy seems to be too natural and at bottom insufficient. There is a relish, though, in what he says of actual living, that "its perfection" is "in its relations," "in giving as well as receiving."

Since public speaking is assuming so definite a position in the English course, many textbooks have been prepared for the sole purpose, apparently, of developing orators. The central idea, however, of John M. Brewer's "Oral English" (Ginn, $1.00) is to fit a student for the many occasions in life when he will be called upon to express himself with force and simplicity before an audience great or small, in business, social or public gatherings. The book, accordingly, takes up the various elements that enter into effective speaking; practical precepts concerning a vocabulary, the divisions of the speech, and style are clearly enunciated; valuable hints are also suggested in regard to the speaker's appearance and voice development and control. Since the manual is designed for speaking in all its branches, speeches for special occasions are thoroughly but not exhaustively treated. The chapters on "Debates and Parliamentary Law" are especially commendable; likewise the appendices on the method of conducting a mock trial or political convention. Since the book is practical in purpose, numerous exercises and topics for speaking, adapted to almost every age, are interspersed.

Here are some little books of piety: "Devotions from Ancient and Mediæval Sources (Western)" (Longmans, $1.75) is a collection of Catholic prayers that the Rev. Charles Plummer has translated and arranged for the use of Ritualists. He has gone through a number of Missals, Breviaries, Sacramentaries and Pontificals, and omitting passages that are "at variance with the teaching or practice of the English Church," selects what will eke out "the poverty, not to say destitution of our own Book." For the "spirit of prayer," as the compiler naïvely remarks, "harmonizes the devotions of different branches of the Church of Christ." The publication of such books as this ought to make Catholics better appreciate the beauty of our liturgical prayers.——Father Thomas McGrath has prepared an attractive little "Prayer Book for Boy Scouts" (Kenedy, $0.35 and $0.15). Half its pages tell how the Boy Scout can supernaturalize the virtues that are considered peculiarly his, and the rest of the book contains the prayers he needs to say.——"The Mirror of Justice" (Benziger, $0.30), by Robert Eaton of the Birmingham Oratory, is made up of fifteen short sermons on Our Lady's feasts and ends with a good homily on the Magnificat.

"He Kept It White," by F. J. Finn, S.J. ($1.40 a hundred). "Little Peter," by Albert Bessières, S.J. ($0.75 a hundred). "And a Little Child Shall Lead Them," by J. F. Weir, S.J. ($0.75 a hundred), are three charming little stories in pamphlet form which Father Finn, of St. Xavier's, Cincinnati, has on sale. He announces that 20,000 copies of the first have already been published. This is an encouraging beginning, but the story should be put in the hands of every Catholic boy or girl in the country. Father Finn never wrote a story which does not convey a moral lesson, and the popularity of his books for boys shows that he has the gift of making real piety attractive to the youthful mind. His characters are typical boys owning to a relish for noise, football, base-hits and dog-fights; good, but by no means "goody-goody." To adapt a judgment passed by Coventry Patmore on the Saints, "They simply do what most respectable boys do, but from an entirely different motive." Father Finn purposes to show that the source which gives this motive vitality is prayer and the Sacraments. More than one teacher has noted the influence of "He Kept It White," in drawing his pupils to a more frequent reception of the Sacraments. The other pamphlets are described by Father Finn as "The best stories I have been able to discover on the question of Holy Communion and children. Both stories are marvelous; both stories are true."

In Wilfrid Wilson Gibson's "Battle and Other Poems" (Macmillan, $1.25), there are no finer lines than this bit of word-painting entitled "The Ice-cart":

Perched on my city office stool,
I watched with envy while a cool
And lucky carter handled ice . . .
And I was wandering, in a trice,
Far from the gray and grimy heat
Of that intolerable street,
O'er sapphire berg and emerald floe,
Beneath the still, cold, ruby glow
Of everlasting polar night,
Bewildered by the queer half-light,
Until I stumbled, unawares,
Upon a creek where big white bears
Plunged headlong down with flourished heels
And floundered after shining seals
Through shivering seas of blinding blue.
And as I watched them, ere I knew
I'd stript, and I was swimming, too,
Among the seal-pack, young and hale,
And thrusting on with thrashing tail,
With twist and twirl and sudden leap,
Through crackling ice and salty deep—
Diving and doubling with my kind,
Until, at last, we left behind
Those big, white, blundering bulks of death,
And lay, at length, with panting breath
Upon a far, untraveled floe
Beneath a gentle drift of snow—
Snow drifting gently, fine and white,
Out of the endless polar night,
Falling and falling evermore
Upon that far, untraveled shore,
Till I was buried fathoms deep
Beneath that cold, white drifting sleep—
Sleep drifting deep,
Deep drifting sleep. . . .

There is not much poetry in the author's war-verses, but the seven little plays dealing with English rural life will remind readers of his "Daily Bread."——"A Song of the Guns" (Houghton, Mifflin, $0.50) is made up of eight spirited poems, composed while the author, Gilbert Frankau, R.S.A., was fighting in Belgium. "We are the guns and your masters!" is the keynote of the little book. Machines, rather than men, win battles today.

EDUCATION

III—Going to College

I DO not believe that the question of a college youth's education is a matter for fault-finding; there is really nobody to find fault with. The college professors try to do their part in developing in the students a cultivated outlook upon life; the fathers and mothers of the boys, their critical faculties lulled, perhaps, by parental love, seem for the most part rather satisfied with the four years' progress; the boys themselves, happy in the friendships made in the years when the heart beats fullest, are conscious of no regrets. Ave atque vale sums up the whole incident of college life. Between the hail and the farewell is that long bridge of happiness, and beyond the parting is the voice of memory, cadent in its whisperings and tender in its song.

I have been speaking of the average college student attending the average American college, of the larger number of youths in the process of becoming Bachelors of Art. But in every group there are frequently variations from the type; in every community there is often a strong and active minority that succeeds in making itself felt. And while it is undoubtedly true that the larger number who enter the college doors do not finally go forth with an adequate grasp on life's activities, with carefully trained powers of discrimination between the best things and the things that are second-best, with such a knowledge of first principles that success in life will be one with success in living, there is not the entire picture nor the story complete. There have always been, as everybody knows, boys at college who have had that particular kind of sense of humor to know that life, even college life, is not solely a humorous undertaking; they have returned home from their four years' absence with hearts open and minds full; and they have been able to translate the Latin on the symbolic parchment without sighing in remorse over the sentiments engraved thereon.

THE INTELLECTUAL LEADERS

It is one of the good signs of the times that this class of students is increasing, and becoming more and more considerable as a factor in determining the tone of academic life. There is a noticeably growing disposition on the part of the rank and file of the students to love the victor in intellectual competition no less than to respect him; to consider the medal winner in physics a hero no less than the ranking player in golf; to feel as warm a fellow-affection for the clever verse-writer as for the tennis champion; to offer the brilliant debater a fraternity not a whit different in kind from that accorded to the member of the crew. This condition of things up to a comparatively recent time has been the exception rather than the rule. Intellectual leaders in college have always been held as heroes, as supermen, but not as heroes or supermen of the flesh and blood that asked kinship with the crowd. By a few, more hedonistic than the rest, they have been thought even to hold communion with the gods, to possess in some superior, Miltonic way the gift of forgetting themselves to marble, and incidentally of forgetting that the conventional way of walking through this world is with the feet set firmly on the ground.

The perceptible change in college public opinion is a healthy one; and it is due in no little measure to the gradual growth of the yet small group of youths to whom college is vastly more than four years of clubdom. It is due, too, to the fact that the man of mind has challenged the man of muscle at his own game. There is no longer a necessarily truthful antithesis between the scholar and the athlete; you might have read in this morning's paper of the prowess of a noted half mile runner of a New England college, who is also editor of the monthly literary magazine. Brain and sinew and bone are more harmoniously developed than in the days of old.

REASONS FOR VIGOR

One is tempted to refrain from inquiring too closely into the reasons for the appearance of a new vigor and a quickened mental buoyancy in college life; a fear arises that the phenomenon may prove to be ephemeral and occasional, and that the old intellectual ptomaines cannot be permanently banished by antidote. But we must be more hopeful than that; desirable results must have adequate causes; and we should very much dislike to feel that the causes themselves may lack the principle of life and growth. It may be that college teachers are less detached from the realities of life than some people think them once to have been; it may be that fathers and mothers in their parental love include a larger measure of intelligent interest; it may be that the period of muck-raking, a diversion not quite so popular as it was, has imbued the youth of America with a stronger feeling of responsibility, with a finer set of ideals, with a truer moral standard But all this is a story in itself, and the whole truth we know not yet.

HIGH IDEALS FOR ALL

We should like to believe that the day may come when all boys who go to college will go for a real education; to seek the means of a fuller mental development, to strive for the perfection of physical hardihood, to pursue the quest of the things that bring the fairest peace to the heart and the highest glory to the soul. We should like to believe that a time will come when every winner of the Bachelor's degree will know the chronicle of history, the expression of literature, the evolution of art, the development of science, and be able to interpret the facts of the past as elements in the growth of civilization; when he will have such a grasp of right principles in logic and ethics that he will be able to think with precision, and to apply his knowledge with a well-ordered mentality to the problems of individual and public life; when he will realize, moreover, that to be sound in mind demands of him to be well in body, and that to despise physical exercise and play and recreation is the road to inefficiency; when, as a result of a wide cultivation of his sympathies, he will possess an easy savoir faire in the society of his fellows; when he will without condescension be tolerant of those who in ignorance differ from his just opinions, or who in prejudice combat them; when he will without impatience listen to the views of those who enjoy superior wisdom; when he will have a gentle forbearance toward those who are less gifted or less fortunate than he; when he will be aware that the heart of man is no less to be trained than the intellect, and that most of the greater achievements of men have had their impulse from the longings and enthusiasms of the heart; when he will realize that to be kind to one's fellowman, to be faithful to one's best ideals, to be true to one's conscientious interpretation of God's will is the only way of life that will give satisfaction to the soul.

All students strive for some of these ends, and a small number for all of them; we should like to believe that the day is not distant when a large majority of our college youth will look upon the culture of the whole man as the most wonderful adventure and the most joyful search in the world; when the phrase to be a gentleman and a scholar will asume a larger meaning and a finer significance than it has today. But that day will be a long time on its way; it may, indeed, never come. Youth is too full of wonderment, of illusion, of thoughtlessness, of youth. Si jeunesse savait—ah, there would be no need of going to college then; and perhaps it makes life seem happier to be a little less full of the wisdom of some things when we are young, and a little more eager of boyish romance and questioning and surprise.

THE WINDOW OF LIFE

Perhaps we ask too much of college; perhaps, in some degree, at least, it is only in the retrospect that the college years seem to need a tonic. More than one of us remember those nights of old when through our half-open dormitory windows would come the distant echoes of the town. They were little sounds from the outer world, detached, fragmentary, meaningless in themselves, but they somehow filled us with the love of quest and ambition and high emprise; they told us of a mysterious life that was waiting for us; and they led one's imagination through long avenues uncharted and little lanes unlighted by the lamp of experience. Well, probably college years will always be somewhat like that; the window of life will be but half open, and life's voice will hardly be full. Youth must be served, but it also must wait. And the prayer of wisdom is that it wait not with idle soul and empty hands.

THE END OF THE JOURNEY

We had nearly reached the journey's end; we were almost home. The lights of the great city had been multiplying as we came closer and closer, and now we were in the heart of the metropolis. We stepped from the train at the marble station and went out into the brilliant streets. The ways were thronged, and I knew that restaurants were filled and that the theaters would soon be crowded. The peace and repose of West Point seemed very far away; the towers, and the sleeping parade grounds, and the high hills watching through the night. But as I mingled with the multitude of the city, where every man is a dreamer and every man a soldier of fortune, I felt how much oftener the dreams would come true and the battles bring victory, if all these men and women had the unswerving devotion to ideals and the fine purpose of attainment that stamp with a large heroism the nation's defenders at West Point. This devotion, this purpose, this strengthening of the fibers of American character, this conservation of the things that quicken man's body and man's soul, is the work of the American college. America will be blest when she fully realizes what this really means, when she is ready through her colleges to give her sons and daughters not only what is pleasant, but what is salutary, when she is anxious to teach them that man does not live by bread alone, and that the end of life is not the glitter of gold. To be truly great, a nation, like an individual, must be willing to pay the price, even to the uttermost farthing.

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM.

SOCIOLOGY

Is Charity Work a Sinecure?

A REPORT of the New York School of Philanthropy estimates that there are more than 4,000 men and women in New York City making their living in social work supported by private philanthropy. One social worker is paid $10,000 a year, eight others receive $5,000 or more, and the salaries of 758 subordinates aggregate $859,000. "If the workers who did not make returns are earning at the same rate, New York is spending more than $4,000,000 a year in salaries to those engaged in dispensing its private charities."

Commenting upon these figures the New York World sarcastically remarks that this is surely an excellent record for a comparatively young industry. "Conceived of as a white-collar charity for the support of deserving persons looking for an occupation that is entirely respectable and not arduous, organized social work is an admirable institution. It is something to provide for the financial needs of 4,000 citizens annually." In respect to results in the way of direct social service and humanitarian efficiency, the World somewhat cynically adds that estimates of the net profit accruing to society from the lavish expenditure for social work are not so easy, "after the disbursements have been made for rents, furnishings, salaries for managers, supervisors, agents, inspectors, stenographers, expenses for stationery, postage and what not."

THREE CLASSES OF CATHOLIC SOCIAL WORKERS

How, we naturally ask, does all this apply to the charity dispensed by the Catholic Church through its institutions and individual workers? There are three classes of social workers in the Church: the religious consecrated to the service of their neighbor and of God; the Catholic laymen and women who without any monetary recompense devote themselves to charity according to the measure of their possibilities and the time allowed them; and finally an almost insignificantly small class of salaried social workers who give their whole energy exclusively to organized charity work.

The religious receive no salary in the proper sense of the word. They are devoting their lives to this labor of love with absolutely no personal returns except the bread they eat and the lodging that shelters them in common with those entrusted to their care. The houses they build, the donations they receive, the means they secure by arduous labor and self-sacrifice, are all devoted entirely to the service of the poor, the suffering and the unfortunate, in whom they gladly serve Christ, their Lord. The second class of Catholic social workers are no less unselfish in their labors for the afflicted members of Christ and no less noble in their ideals, though they cannot give their entire lives exclusively to the twofold service of religion and charity. They represent the great body of Catholic laymen and women who, individually or through organized efforts, are going about doing good and dispensing blessings, after the model of the Good Samaritan and the Divine Healer of the souls and bodies of men. They give liberally, not merely of their means, but of themselves. Such is the work of that magnificent organization, the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

CATHOLIC SALARIED AGENTS

There are instances, lastly, where salaried social workers are employed to perform duties that call for such undivided attention as can only be given by men who make this service their life-work, yet for good reasons cannot serve without some remuneration. These workers are a very few in number and worthy of their hire. The general purpose in calling for their help is not to relieve Catholics from the task of personally interesting themselves in the poor and the afflicted, but rather to make this personal attention more fruitful and to prevent all interruptions in the systematic service of those urgently in need of assistance. The remuneration of these social workers is not likely to be extravagantly large. Their lives too may be filled with the purest supernatural motives. Their labor is highly honorable and can be made most salutary for the spiritual as well as the bodily welfare of the neighbor. Indeed, to be truly Catholic, it must always keep both these ends clearly in view.

MR. ROCKEFELLER'S TESTIMONY

There is little possibility of sinecures in Catholic organized charity. There is no "middleman" in the field. The alms dispensed are given almost directly to the poor, since expenses are everywhere reduced to the minimum. Unprejudiced testimony to this effect has been given by Mr. Rockefeller in the Saturday Evening Post, as follows:

> Just here it occurs to me to testify to the fact that the Roman Catholic Church, as I have observed in my experience, has advanced a long way in this direction (i. e. in the direction of efficient service for the welfare of our neighbor in the cause of charity). I have been surprised to learn how far a given sum of money has gone in the hands of priests and nuns, and how really effective is their use of it. I fully appreciate the splendid service done by other workers in the field, but I have seen the organization of the Roman Church secure better results with a given sum of money than other church organizations are accustomed to secure from the same expenditure. I speak of this merely to point out the value of the principle of organization, in which I believe so heartily. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the centuries of experience which the Church of Rome has gone through to perfect a great power of organization.

WASTEFUL METHODS

While, therefore, there is much point in the application of an editorial remark made in the New York World, as applied to many non-Catholic private charity organizations and perhaps no less when applied to our public administration of charity funds, there can be no reasonable application made of it to private Catholic charity. The World says:

> It is clear that the middleman furnishes the same problem for philanthropy as for regular forms of industry. Here again the point is to bring the producer in closer touch with the consumer and effect economies of distribution which are impossible under the present wasteful methods. Private charity in particular has much to gain from the abolition of sinecures and the elimination of extravagance.

CATHOLIC EFFICIENCY EXPERTS

The ideal of charity was never more closely approached than in those "Dark Ages" when "the economics of distribution which are impossible under the present wasteful system," outside the Catholic Church, actually did exist. There is apparently need of efficiency experts in organized charity "to put it on a Taylor system," the News Letter of the American Federation of Labor suggests. There has never been a more efficient "Taylor system" than that voluntarily employed by many of the religious orders in the Ages of Faith, and no less skilfully applied by them in our own day, though with less ample support. The "Reformers" realized the efficiency of Catholic charity work in their day, as clearly as does Mr. Rockefeller in ours. Only with the suppression of the monasteries and the confiscation of their goods, which were the dower of the poor, did pauperism first appear and lift its hideous head in Christian lands.

Slowly the world is perceiving the truth of all this. A full understanding of it can only come when the parrot school of history, whose methods consist in ceaselessly repeating the same ancient slanders, a school particularly popular among present-day sociologists, has been replaced by a scientific and honest investigation of facts and a deeper and truer knowledge of the past.

Non-Christian organized charity, public or private, and non-Christian schools of philanthropy neglect the most necessary part in the training of social workers. They overlook the spiritual element, which even a non-Catholic writer describes as the most important of all factors. The social worker must be deeply imbued with the realities of the supernatural life, if he would properly fulfill his responsible task of ministering to the poor and the afflicted, if he would bring back order out of chaos, if he would restore to Christian life a disorganized family.

"The threads of the spiritual, the social, and the material so intricately cross and recross each other in our nature that it is seldom that one can mend rents in the pattern without catching up the broken ends of all three." Profound religious convictions and high supernatural motives are the first conditions of true and lasting charity work.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A beautiful example for Catholic women is given by a Chicago lady. In memory of a son whom God in His goodness took to Himself she makes it her sweet occupation to mother as many of the poor, neglected little ones as she can receive into her house. Three of her own children are still left to her, yet the children of the tenements are hardly less her own. These she herself clothes and feeds and cares for in her home. Sick little ones are nursed by her and returned to their parents in good health. Others are legally adopted as her own. Needless to say, she finds no time for club life or the frivolities of social events. The complaint of "empty hands" will never be heard from her. There are many Catholics able to confer the benefits of a good home on one or more such little ones, through whom they would receive into their midst the Babe of Bethlehem. We are told of a Catholic family where a child is adopted for every baby born into the family. In this as in every other form of charity, the Catholic poor of Catholic countries have shown themselves the most generous.

At no time, perhaps, are the cruelty and horror of war more keenly realized than when trainloads of maimed and wrecked humanity return as wastage from the fields of battle. Then the sadness and the pity of it all become appalling. William T. Martin, who witnessed the home-coming of the grands blessés in Paris, released from their foreign prison camps at the Holy Father's mediation, attempts to describe such a scene. In one of the glimpses given us we behold a mother anxiously seeking for her son among the new arrivals. Suddenly with a shriek she faints. She has recognized her boy. As she recovers from her shock she throws her arms about his neck:

> He stands on one leg and a wire substitute for the other. An arm clasped about the waist of the woman is handless. The soldier, he is very tall, bends over the woman stiffly and gives her a long, passionate kiss. I shall never forget the look on his face. It is a smile, full of pain concealed, but a smile, and therein is written a knowledge of the dream of youth gone and the earnest ambitions of a little more than a year ago crushed forever. The woman is very happy, for he was long dead and is alive.

Other scenes, no less pitiful and even more soul-harrowing follow:

> A soldier holds his sweetheart but sees her not, for he is blind forever, so he feels her face and smiles. A woman rushes into a soldier's arms and suddenly recoils to make doubly sure of his identity. Part of his face has been shot away. But he can see, and he stands up and throws his arms about her. He can only mumble indistinctly from a semblance of a mouth. But he does his best.

So the tale continues, too sad indeed for words. Yet men will blindly clamor for war where compromise or arbitration, a little patience or tolerance, might save thousands and millions of lives. A venal press agitates the people, brings pressure to bear upon rulers and politicians, misrepresents and exaggerates, intensifies disagreements and prevents attempts at reconciliation. So the stage is set for the dismal tragedy. Even a handful of capitalists and agitators may suffice to drive a nation into war and misery where there is no need for either.

Our Catholic schools no longer call for a defense such as was once deemed necessary. Their success has become their own best eulogy. Pitted against the public schools our institutions bring the highest credit to the Sisters and Brothers who teach in them. In a city-wide essay contest recently conducted by the Cleveland Press thirteen out of twenty-five prizes went to the pupils of parochial schools. In another contest conducted in the same city by the Leader four out of six prizes were awarded to pupils of Catholic schools; the first prize itself being included among their trophies. The Brooklyn Daily Eagle spelling contest had similarly been won by the "Brothers' School" each time the contest was held. This year "A Current Topics Bee" was substituted for the spelling. The contesting pupils of the schools of Brooklyn were placed upon the stage of the Academy of Music and made to face a densely crowded hall. Just 331 questions covering current history, politics, the Mexican difficulties and matters of purely local import were asked in quick succession. The winner of the bee was Clarence Smith of St. Francis' Preparatory School. "Comparing the Hay bill with the Chamberlain bill, which provided the larger measure of 'preparedness'?" and "How could the British House of Commons force the British Cabinet to resign?" are samples of the problems given to the students. Out of 331 questions 255 were answered without hesitation. As another instance of the proficiency developed in our Catholic schools, the winning of the school championship of typewriting, of the New York City metropolitan district by St. Leonard's Academy of Brooklyn may finally be mentioned. No school which cannot present fifteen pupils able to maintain a net speed of over thirty words a minute for fifteen minutes of the contest is admitted to this test. The extraordinary work of the Brothers' class is thus summed up by the New York Globe:

> Brother Gerard's boys last year maintained an average net speed of 38.45, and this year of 38.44, lost none through disqualification, and made a total of 1,438 points out of a possible total of 1,500, exactly the total they made last year. This gave St. Leonard's a lead of 69.16 points over its nearest competitor, Wood's School, and the championship for 1916.

The pennant for the championship for the evening schools was likewise won by the team from St. Leonard's Academy Evening School. The contests were held at the Merchants' and Bankers' School, New York.

A unique set of tables has been prepared by the United States Census Bureau, which are said to be the first of their kind. They show the death rate and "expectation of life" at all ages for an area comprising eleven States. Though similar to the "life tables" prepared by life insurance companies, they differ from them inasmuch as they relate to the entire population of the area covered, whereas the former concern those only who apply for insurance and relate to the risks incurred only. One of the remarkable facts clearly established by new tables is that women live longer than men. Within the given area the average expectation of life, at birth, for males is 49.9 years; for females, 53.2 years; for white males, 50.2; for white females, 53.6 years; for native white males, 50.6; for native white females, 54.2; for negro males, 34.1 years; for negro females, 37.7. It is shown by these statistics that women outlive men by more than three years. The expectation of life at the age of one year is considerably greater than at birth, and reaches its maximum at the age of two years, when it is 57.5 for native white males and 60.1 for native white females:

> At the age of 12 the average native white male's expectation of life is 50.2 years; at 25 it is 39.4 years; at 40, 28.3 years; at 50, 21.2 years; at 60, 14.6 years; at 70, 9.1 years, and at 80, 5.2 years. Similarly, at the age of 12 the average native white female's expectation of life is 52.6 years; at 25 it is 41.8 years; at 40, 30.3 years; at 50, 22.8 years; at 60, 15.8 years; at 70, 9.8 years, and at 80, 5.5 years.

The violent deaths among the male population explain in part the difference in longevity between men and women. Nearly four-fifths of the suicides, homicides and fatal accidents, which account for from seven to eight per cent of the total number of deaths, occur among men. This fact, however, does not fully explain the greater longevity of women. Even during each of the first twelve months of life the death rate for females is lower than for males. During the first month of life the death rate among native whites is nearly twenty-eight per cent higher for boys than for girls, and during the first year it is still twenty per cent higher.

The most modern conception of the ideal church is that of an institution entirely dissevered from all belief in the supernatural, from all rites and ceremonies, and devoted exclusively to the material or intellectual service of humanity. It is a philanthropic or a socialistic center, according to the school of sociological doctrine adopted by its membership. "Gone is the divinity of the preacher's church!" exclaims Prof. George Burman Foster of the University of Chicago, writing in the American Journal of Theology. Gone is the "old miraculous supernaturalism of regeneration."

> The dream is of a scientific ministry instead of the old religious ministry. The minister is not so much prophet and priest of God as an administrative officer of a philanthropic and humanitarian institution endowed by capital, which he is competent to execute. The church is not a temple, but a plant. The idea seems to be gaining favor that if men are fed and clothed and sheltered and washed and amused, they will not need to be redeemed with the old terrible redemption.

Such certainly is, in brief, the sociological religion which is finding favor in many non-Catholic churches. It is the last development of the Reformation. Few perhaps have gone to the full length indicated in the citation. They still retain at least the pretence of a religion, though in substance they deny the existence even of a personal God and of an immortal soul. What place the doctrine of Professor Foster can find in a "journal of theology" it is difficult to see. But recent religious events show how little of the doctrine of "the old terrible redemption" is left outside the Catholic Church, the redemption from sin and eternal death from which all his sociology will not exempt even a learned Chicago University professor. The situation is not entirely new. Our Lord Himself partially described it in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, when He said that even should a lost soul be permitted to return from hell its warning would be of no avail.

From the Abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani, nestled amid the picturesque hills and valleys of Kentucky, where the awakening beauties of the spring or the splendors of the fall "form a picture that raises the soul almost instinctively to thoughts of our heavenly home, making even the most severe penance seem but a light price to pay for what we hope will be ours in the future," comes a pamphlet, "Trappist Life," intended as a guide to postulants. It shows us that the Cistercian rule, fostered for many ages within the bosom of the Church, was not adapted to the Middle Ages only, as men might think today, but is likewise suited to our own modern life. At least half of the Trappist community in the spacious buildings of the Abbey of Gethsemani are native Americans.

> Prayer, penance, labor are the principle traits of the Cistercian life. The religious prays for himself and his neighbor; he prays in the name of the Church; he expiates his sins and the sins of the people and gains new merit for heaven. He labors, not to amass riches, for he is bound by vow to be poor; he labors to earn his living, and to be able to help the needy. Our Order is at one and the same time a shelter for innocence, a refuge for weakness, and an assured harbor for souls tossed about on the sea of life, where they have met fatal rocks and suffered sad shipwreck. It is a life most beautiful, most sanctifying, most sure. It has in store sweet and most unexpected consolations.

The suppression of the use of speech, except for particular reasons, is a characteristic of the Cistercian or Trappist rule. Choir and prayer alternate with labor. Studies likewise are duly provided for. Many and wonderful are the ways in which the Spirit of God leads the souls of men to an intimate union with Christ.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 9
WHOLE No. 374

JUNE 10, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 31, p. m.-June 6, a. m. — Fighting in the Verdun Region — Austrian Success in the Trentino—A Big Sea-Fight. Austria-Hungary: Russian Barbarities. France: Combes and a Sister—A Nativity Prize. Germany: German Navy Honored. Great Britain: Colonel Churchill's Criticisms. Ireland: Statement by the Irish Party. Mexico: Carranza's Note—An Estimate of Carranza.....197-200

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Charities Investigation: A Dominican Convent—Little Things and Health—Preparedness and the Scriptures—Fordham University's Diamond Jubilee—Catholic Landmarks of Cincinnati 201-208

COMMUNICATIONS
Expediency or Principle—A School for Social Workers—Dr. Badé's Book.....208, 209

EDITORIALS
Mr. Carranza—An Era of Strikes and Lockouts — The Turk and the Armenian — The Light Eater's Self-Righteousness—The Burned Flag—Apologetics in Fiction Form.....210-212

LITERATURE
The Irish Insurrectionary Poets.

REVIEWS: The Irish Orators: a History of the Irish Fight for Freedom—Travels in the American Colonies — Because I Am a German — The First Seven Divisions—Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper—German Atrocities —They Shall Not Pass—The Life of Père Joyard—Shakespearean Studies.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "The Life of St. Paul"—"Memoirs of Sister Mary of Mercy Kéruel" — The Catholic Mind — "Jaunty in Charge" The Atlantic's Guests — "The Conquest" — "Chapel" — "The Finding of Jasper Holt" —"The Dark Forest" — "The Round-About"—"Blackfeet Tales of Glacier National Park"—"Unhappy in Thy Daring"—"Come Out of the Kitchen"—"The Garden Child."

BOOKS RECEIVED 212-216

EDUCATION
A Thought for Our Times.....217

ECONOMICS
What Is Economic Socialism?.....217-219

NOTE AND COMMENT
National Conference of Catholic Charities—Monument to the Author of the "Star-Spangled Banner"—The Irish Relief Fund Committee—The Immigrant Problem Solved—Loyola University Medical Graduates—Our Lady Honored by Protestants—The Vatican Catalogue of Fixed Stars—Diurnal Variations in Memory. 219, 220

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Flanders there have been violent artillery duels, followed in a few cases by infantry attacks, at many points, especially at Ypres, Neuve Chapelle, Loos, Vimy and Souches, but except near Ypres where the Germans have advanced their line, and near Vimy where the British have had some success, there have been practically no gains made by either side. The Russians have renewed their offensive against the Austrians, apparently on rather a large scale, and as a result there have been numbers of spirited but ineffective encounters on the Volhynian and Bessarabian fronts. In Armenia the Turks have shown unexpected strength, and not only have halted the Russian advance but have retaken Mamachatun and driven the Russians twelve miles east of that town. They attacked the Russians at Baiburt and near Diarbekr, but were repulsed. In Persia the Russians report that the Turkish resistance near the Mesopotamian frontier has been noticeably strengthened.

Bulletin, May 31, p. m.-June 6, a. m.

In the Verdun region there has been violent fighting on both sides of the Meuse. On the southwestern slope of Mort Homme Hill the French have won back some trenches, which they lost recently; but the main fighting has taken place between Mort Homme Hill and Cumières. Here the advantage on the whole has been with the Germans, who have advanced a short distance further to the southeast of the hill. At one time they had forced the French back three-quarters of mile, but a French counter-attack succeeded in restoring the line to its original position. Further to the east a similar thing took place. The Germans fought their way south from Cumières until they had almost reached Chattancourt, but again the French were able to win back almost all of the ground they had lost, and are now once more on the southern outskirts of the village of Cumières. On the east side of the Meuse the Germans have made further gains in the Caillette Wood, have occupied a considerable portion of the French trenches between Douaumont and the Vaux Pond, and have obtained a footing in the village of Damloup.

Fighting in the Verdun Region

During the week the Austrians advanced a short distance into Italy. Between the Adige River and the Arsa Valley the Italians are holding their own at Coni Zugna, and they are still securely in possession of Monte Pasubio. Elsewhere, however, the Austrians have had success. Although southeast of Monte Pasubio they failed in their attempt to storm Monte Forni Alti, they have obtained a footing at Fufine and Posina, on the south bank of the Posina; they have also advanced from Bettale and taken Monte Priafora, and are attacking Monte Spin and Sant' Ubaldo. East of Arsiero moved down the Astico and took Monte Borco and Monte Panoccio. In the Asiago region, the Austrians following the Val d'Assa drove the Italians out of Roana and Canove. North of Asiago they occupied Punta Gorda, the Ingrotto Heights and Gallio. The Italians evacuated Asiago and withdrew to the hills, lying to the east of the city, where they are now hard pressed. Further north the Austrians captured Monte Baldo and Monte Flara. Below and south of Monte Cencio, they have taken the town of Cesuna. All the fighting is now taking place well within the Italian territory with the exception of that which is in progress east of Monte Pasubio.

Austrian Success in the Trentino

In the late afternoon of May 31, the British and German fleets engaged in battle off the coast of Jutland between Horn's Reef and the entrance to the Skager Rack. The fighting, which had two distinct phases, lasted about twelve hours, and although the Germans withdrew and left the British on the scene, the advantage was decidedly on the side of the Germans. Official reports do not give the number or the nature of the units that made up the respective fleets; but unofficial information, furnished by the captains of Danish and Norwegian steamships who sighted the fleets as they hurried to the scene of conflict, would indicate that about forty German ships, and in the end, even a greater number of British ships were engaged. Submarines and Zeppelins took part in the battle.

A Big Sea-Fight

At the present writing Germany has published no complete official description of the details of the battle; but according to the report of the British Admiralty a British fleet, made up of battle cruisers, cruisers, and light cruisers, supported by four fast battleships, sighted a portion of the German fleet, endeavored to cut it off from Denmark, and found that it had engaged a force superior in both numbers and armament. Vice-Admiral Beatty, who was in command, sent a call for assistance. Subsequently both the British and German fleets were reinforced by battleships, the Germans arriving first. In the end, however, the balance of strength was on the side of the British, and the Germans withdrew to their base. It was in the first phase of the battle that the British sustained most of their losses.

The British Admiralty admits the destruction of three battle cruisers, three armored cruisers and eight destroyers; the German Admiralty states that the Germans lost two battleships, one third-class cruiser and several torpedo-boats. Both sides state that other ships are missing. On the other hand the British Admiralty asserts that "there is the strongest ground for supposing" that the Germans lost two battleships, two dreadnoughts, besides three light cruisers, and other ships, a total of eighteen, as against an English loss of fourteen. The Germans deny this and insist their losses are three big ships and several torpedo boats. The German Admiralty states that a British superdreadnought, a small cruiser, and a number of torpedo-boat destroyers were sunk. London explicitly denies that any British battleships or light cruisers were lost. According to the London official estimates more than 5,000 British seamen and officers were lost, and about 2,300 Germans. Germany has not yet declared her losses in men.

Austria-Hungary.—Dreadful reports from the Russian prison camps moved the Austro-Hungarian authorities several months ago to request the United States Government to make investigations into the conditions of Austrians and Hungarians detained in these camps. According to report No. 5,897 of the American Embassy at Petrograd, quoted by the correspondent of the Associated Press, 17,000 Austro-Hungarian prisoners of war, out of about 80,000 confined in the camp at Orenburg, Eastern Russia, have been brought to death by poor sanitation, bad food, lack of clothing and exposure to the cold. It is believed that so far more than thirty per cent of all the Austro-Hungarian prisoners have succumbed, most of them dying from camp or filth diseases, principally typhus. The camp at Orenburg consists of forty-five barns, where even wood was denied the prisoners in winter time, though abundance of it is to be had in that district, nor as a rule was any medical assistance granted them. Attached to the report is a statement of the American investigator that the Russian authorities had prevented him from visiting other points after he had been at Orenburg. This corresponds with the Berlin report of inhuman cruelties, starvation, beatings and whippings inflicted upon prisoners, which was recently forwarded to the Prisoners of War Relief Committee at New York. The Austrian Government had hitherto feared to make known the condition of the unfortunate prisoners because of the consternation it would create at home. It hopes that the United States will take the initiative in making representation to the Russian authorities in regard to this matter. In startling contrast to these reports is the petition of 50,000 Russian prisoners in Austria-Hungary who have asked permission to remain and become citizens at the close of the war. The Government has not yet returned an answer, though it is inclined to receive the petition favorably. The applicants are mainly men who are at present engaged on the various farms and are well pleased with their positions.

Russian Barbarities

France.—M. Combes, the ardent persecutor, who turned thousands of unfortunate Sisters out of France to live or die as they might, has just distinguished himself by writing this most peculiar note in answer to a communication sent him by Sister Julie Bizard, the heroine of Gerbeviller:

Combes and a Sister

VENERATED SISTER JULIE:

I feel that I should be wanting in the most elementary duty of good manners did I not thank you for your post-card and send one in return. It may be that in doing so I shall expose you to the blame of some extravagant persons who will not forgive you for having opened relations with one who is considered as the worst of sectarians. You may console yourself for this by remembering that this sectarian was simply a freethinker who respected sincere beliefs in a spirit of help for the liberty of the individual. In any case this sectarian was happy to meet amid the ruins of Gerbeviller a religious who distinguished herself by her courage and her patriotic abnegation, and to clasp her hand with the utmost cordiality.

From this it appears that Combes has the usual Freethinker's ideas about liberty,—freedom for himself, persecution for all who dare differ from him.

France is still alarmed over its low birthrate. With a view to bettering the deplorable conditions now existing, a Bill has been introduced into the Chamber of Deputies providing for a "Nativity Prize." For the first and second child every mother is to receive 500 francs each, for the third 1,000 francs, for the fourth 2,000 francs and for every other child 1,000 francs. A father who can present at the Town Hall four children, "the youngest of whom is fifteen years of age and for whose maintenance he has provided since their birth will receive a prize of 2,000 francs." Rome considers this very animalesque: it is, and foolish besides, if for no other reason because francs can never take the place of God.

A Nativity Prize

Germany.—Uppermost in the public mind is the recent achievement of the German fleet. Berlin was decked with flags as the news spread through the city and the greatest enthusiasm was aroused. The members of the Reichstag arose when the announcement was made at its sessions by President Kaempf, telling of the "first meeting between our naval forces and the pick of the English fleet." He was wildly cheered during the course of his speech, in which he said:

German Navy Honored

Our young navy gained a great and splendid success. Several of our fine ships have been lost and many brave sailors have perished, but the enemy losses are several times greater than ours. Above all the battle proved that our fleet is able to face the superior British force and gain a victory, for which we salute and thank our navy.

The Imperial Chancellor, in a telegram sent by him to the Commander of the High Seas Fleet, speaks of the pride and enthusiasm prevailing throughout Germany "that the fleet has at last had an opportunity of showing a superior enemy, who considered himself invincible, what Germany's sea-power is and what it can accomplish." The commander, Vice-Admiral Scheer, modestly responded that he hoped the navy would be able "to contribute in part to Germany's value in the world." Vice-Admiral Scheer was appointed in February as successor to Admiral von Pohl. He was for a long period Director of the General Marine Department of the Admiralty and acted as chief of the marine staff for the High Seas Fleet and commander of a battleship squadron. He is looked upon as one of the ablest tacticians in the German navy.

Great Britain.—During the week, the Premier and the Under-Secretary of War, Mr. Tennant, vigorously replied to Colonel Churchill's strictures on the mismanagement of the Army Corps, but not, it would seem, to the complete satisfaction of the former First Lord of the Admiralty. Mr. Tennant denied that over two hundred thousand men were withdrawn from the ranks to serve as private servants to officers. These men, although not actually in the trenches, were, he stated, required to "take their place in the firing line"; they were employed in the highly important work of moving up the supplies. Referring to the announcement made in the King's message, that more than five million soldiers had been raised voluntarily, Colonel Churchill said that after a careful examination, he had come to the conclusion that about one million, seven hundred thousand of this number could not be accounted for. Moreover, many of the men now in France were but poorly equipped, and in consequence were holding a smaller number of opposing troops than the resources of the nation would justify. "Broadly speaking," said Colonel Churchill, "half the strength of the British army is at home." In reply, Mr. Tennant said that if large forces of men were being kept at home, this was for the purpose of training them; while the Premier gave a new turn to the debate by hinting at the possibility of invasion. He did not think this at all probable; nevertheless, he added:

Colonel Churchill's Criticisms

It is a risk that cannot be left out of account. We must always effectively provide against it, and must be guided by the opinion of those who can fitly decide what number of men are absolutely necessary to render the country secure against invasion.

In conclusion, the Premier stated that the Government was consulting with the military authorities to ascertain the possibility of utilizing at once a larger proportion of the enlisted men for active service.

Ireland.—The Irish Weekly Independent informs us that a long statement dealing with the recent uprising was adopted at a meeting of the Irish Party, and a resolution passed, on the lines of Mr. Redmond's plea in the House of Commons, asking for clemency. The members of the party referred to the bitterness caused, among a large section of the Irish people who had no sympathy with the Sinn Feiners, by the executions then taking place, and asked that these should be stopped, and that martial law should be immediately withdrawn. Among other things the statement said:

Statement by the Irish Party

Blood has been shed freely. It is true that Ireland has been bitterly provoked by the growth of a similar revolutionary and illegal movement in another portion of Ireland backed by an army in revolt. A grave responsibility for these events in Dublin rests on the leaders of that movement. Ireland has been shocked and horrified by the series of military executions by military tribunals in Dublin. These things have been done in the face of the incessant and vehement protests of the Irish leaders and these protests will be pressed continually and strongly until the unchecked control of the military authorities in Ireland is abolished.

The statement then makes an appeal to the Irish people to draw the conclusions which the events force upon them, and says that either Ireland is to be given over to unsuccessful revolution and anarchy, or the constitutional movement is to have the full support of the people and go on until it has completed its work. It refers to Isaac Butt's policy after the revolutionary movement of the sixties, and to Parnell's renewal of Butt's plan. The party claims that the constitutional movement won everything the program of Butt, Parnell and the Irish organizations demanded, and then refers to the securing of "the greatest and largest measure of Irish self-government" won by the Irish Party. "If then," says the statement:

the constitutional movement has triumphantly vindicated itself; if, on the other hand, a revolutionary movement has shown itself to be at once futile and disastrous; have we not a right to ask the people of Ireland to stand by the constitutional movement and to uphold it till its entire mission is accomplished? Have we not a right to call upon men in all stations of life in Ireland who have the duty and the power to guide the decisions of the people, to make a strong and united appeal to the people to choose the wise and to oppose the insane course of Irish policy?

The Party then makes this final appeal. The country stands face to face with the alternative of futile revolution and anarchy or of the maintenance of the constitutional movement by the full and vigorous support of the Irish people. Each Irish Nationalist has to put before himself these alternatives. We have no doubt what the choice of the Irish people will be. But it is on that answer that the constitutional movement and our future conduct must depend. If the people do not want the constitutional movement, they do not want us. Without their active support we should be engaged in an impossible task. With their support we can complete the fabric of Irish reform and Irish liberty which we have been building up for the last half-century; we shall realize all the reforms and all the hopes we and our predecessors in the constitutional movement have held out to them; we shall lead the Irish people into the Parliament House for which they have been praying and working for more than a century.

Just what answer the Irish people will return to this appeal remains to be seen.

Mexico.—On May 31, Eliseo Arredondo, Mexican Ambassador-designate, acting in the name of Carranza, delivered a long and harsh note to our State Department.

Carranza's Note

The communication which was signed by Aguilar, Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, was dated May 22, and contained thirty-four paragraphs, in all about 5,000 words. The note charged the President of the United States with bad faith and demanded the immediate withdrawal of all American troops from Mexican soil or, in lieu of this, requested a satisfactory explanation of the reason why the troops were kept in Mexico "idle and inactive." Apparently the note is to the liking of the bandits; the Governors of the Mexican States telegraphed congratulations to the First Chief, as did many of his generals. Meantime, Mexican troops continue to arrive in Chihuahua. An official report places the number already there at 20,000, an unofficial report puts the number at 50,000. Zapata has become extremely active in the south; his revolution, aided probably by Diaz, is causing concern and, if it continues to gain strength, Obregon will be obliged to send forces from Chihuahua to check its progress, thus lightening the tension in the northern States.

Carranza's latest communication has called forth many letters. Of these the most comprehensive and interesting is the following, written by a man who has lived thirty years in Mexico and has seen every phase of the great revolution now raging there:

An Estimate of Carranza

The note of Carranza to the United States Government prompts me to address this letter to AMERICA. I have seen the Mexican revolution and the workings of the so-called Carranza Government from the beginning; for that reason the Mexican communication makes me smile. The "First Chief" represents nobody, not even the bandits who follow his banner, and certainly he does not govern the Mexican people. He has established no vestige of orderly rule; he has violated every item of the Constitution which he is pretending to defend; he is kept on hooks by the other factions in Mexico and has no rest. The non-combatants, who are the overwhelming majority of the people, are not governed by him; they are ill-treated and wronged by all the bandits, as the latter go about like ravenous wolves. The Carranza faction is probably more numerous at present than any other faction, but that is due to the fact that its leader has robbed more successfully than others. To call his rule a de facto government is to put a premium on robbery. Villa, the bandit of yesterday, became a Napoleon; another robber has become a de facto president, but neither of them has established nor can establish a government. Their talk of elections is a farce, and without elections there can be no constitutional rule.

Carranza is an arch-bandit; his robberies are beyond belief, and though he has kept the lion's share of the loot for himself, yet the booty has been great enough to enable him to keep his hungry wolves by his side, though they continually threaten to devour him, if their passions are not satisfied. Carranza's complete sacking of Mexico City and its suburbs is unparalleled in history. Obregon found only the remains of an orgy when he came to pillage. Carranza's acts were particularly audacious because just before entering the capital he signed a treaty to respect the lives and property of the inhabitants. Then he and his generals proceeded to take possession of the great families' residences in the town, over 180 of them, whilst the subordinate officers occupied hundreds of less pretentious houses. That was bad enough, but the worst was to come, and this has never been adequately described by the American press. The robbers deliberately packed up and shipped to their homes, to the United States, to Cuba, even further, all the riches these houses contained. Furniture, pictures, art collections, libraries, all were stolen. The First Chief set a good example; he stole the magnificent library of Pimentel and sent it to Saltillo. This act of banditry must have been known in Washington. An American confidential agent was in Mexico at the time and had personal knowledge of the theft. Another great library met a similar fate, and for three or four days no vehicles were seen on the streets near the railway stations, except vans and trucks loaded with stolen furniture. Under the pretext of removing the capital to Vera Cruz, the government buildings were also stripped of all they contained. Carts stood before the public buildings and were loaded with office furniture of all kinds.

The robbers had an uncontrollable desire to ride in motor cars, and few were the cars that they did not take from their owners. Then, dressed in their American uniforms, they rode furiously through the city, accompanied by their women. Moreover, nearly all the fine horses were stolen. Some people hid their blooded animals in the inner rooms of their houses. The winner of the "Centenary Derby" was hoisted to the roof of a house by his owners. Not even the cab horses escaped, and it was an exciting spectacle to see the "soldiers" trying to lasso the horses as their drivers drove them madly toward the stables to save them. Nothing escaped Carranza's attention; cattle were stolen; cereals were shipped out of the country when famine was at hand, etc. Do not think that the looting has stopped; it has merely taken a different form. Property is now confiscated and blackmail is common. It pays to be a bandit, in Mexico at least.

Carranza may well ignore these truths, as long as he is safe in the keeping of the United States.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Charities Investigation: A Dominican Convent

ON May 31, 1916, I inspected the Asylum of the Sisters of St. Dominic at Blauvelt, New York. I left the institution, I confess, with a certain amount of suspicion. Over night suspicion developed into certainty. High noon of June 1 found me waiting in Weehawken for a West Shore train, and by half-past one I was in the presence of the Superior, Mother Marcella, and of the local Prioress, Mother Dominic. I put my suspicion into words. "Is this story founded on fact?" I asked. And the two ladies, who on the preceding day had seemed so frank and open, were visibly embarrassed.

"We shouldn't like anything of that kind to get into print," said Mother Marcella. "We felt we were obliged to do it," added the Prioress, "but why bring it up again?"

"That is hardly the issue," I insisted. "Is the story true?"

"Yes," answered Mother Marcella. "Yes," said the Prioress. And here is the story in all its blackness.

More than a quarter of a century ago, an epidemic broke out in a Home conducted by these Sisters. True to tradition, the religious devoted themselves to their suffering charges. The little ones whom Christ loved were in danger. In nursing them, five Sisters lost their sight, some temporarily, as Mother Dominic; others permanently. That these little waifs might live, four Sisters laid down their lives. "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friend." I can find no fit words of comment. None, I think, are needed.

After this narration, redolent of the heroism and sanctity which still pervade the Convent, it is not easy to turn to the refutation of the miserable charges made against these Sisters, and given currency by thoughtless or malicious head-liners. But the unpleasant task is necessary. On June 26, 1914, the Convent was inspected by Deputy Commissioner Doherty, Dr. Reeder, Dr. Bernstein, Miss Robins, Miss McCann and Miss Schmidt. The property of the Convent, they report, "is situated in a delightfully healthful section of Rockland County, and consists of 200 acres of land, a considerable portion of which is utilized to considerable advantage. For the most part, the buildings are so located as to admit of every facility for proper lighting and ventilation" (Doherty Report, p. 1). Moreover, "the Sisters in charge of this institution evidence every desire to cooperate with the Department of Public Charities in establishing suitable standards for the care and training of the dependent child committed to private institutions" (Doherty Report, General Summary), and the Prioress, Mother Dominic, "is a woman of considerable culture and executive ability" (p. 7). It can hardly be assumed that either the climate of Rockland County, the devotion of the Sisters, or the culture of the Prioress, suffered any notable deterioration after the publication of this Report; nevertheless, a "reinspection" was ordered in 1915, and was made on December 21 by that eminent "expert," Mr. Abraham Oseroff. Even this gentleman was forced to the grudging acknowledgment that "the spirit and the vision which determine the policies of the Asylum of the Sisters of St. Dominic, are good," and further, that "in a general way, this institution is doing work of a high grade" (Oseroff Report, p. 7). From these two documents, however, the Doherty and the Oseroff Reports, most of the accusations against the Convent were drawn. Some afforded excellent matter for mendacious headlines; others occasioned a flood of crocodile tears, during the hearings of the Strong Commission. But when confronted by the necessity of submitting a brief, bound more or less by the ordinary rules of evidence, Mr. William H. Hotchkiss, counsel for Mr. Kingsbury, allowed his hot eloquence to lapse into a mumble, and chose to urge seven charges against the Convent.

(1) "Another—the Asylum of the Sisters of St. Dominic—had an old carpenter shop converted into a hospital" (Brief, p. 35). Where Mr. Hotchkiss got this grotesque idea, is beyond conjecture. Neither in the Doherty nor in the Oseroff Report, is there any trace of it, and the Sisters, unacquainted with the Hotchkiss Brief, never heard of the charge until I told them of it on June 1, on which occasion it was denied emphatically by the Superioress, and by the Prioress who has been connected with the institution for more than a quarter of a century. I saw the hospital in question, and if it was ever a carpenter shop, I bow in lowly reverence before the consummate genius of the transforming architect.

(2) "The inspectors comment on such facts as: That poisonous drugs were found in unlocked closets or in bottles on tables within reach of children—for instance in institutions V, VII, and VIII" (Brief, p. 35). "V" refers to St. Dominic's Convent. The Oseroff Report, the most recent, states that the medicine and drug-closets "were found locked and well arranged" (p. 12), but as this did not suit Mr. Hotchkiss' rhetoric, he harks back to the Doherty Report of June 26, 1914, in which this criticism was first made (Doherty Report, p. 21). The truth is this. Under oath, Mother Dominic testified (Testimony pp. 3750-3751) "that these closets were kept locked, but that on the day of inspection, when the inspectors arrived, she ordered that all the closets be unlocked in order to expedite the work of inspection" (Bowers Brief, Schedule C, p. 102). True, there was a bottle of bichloride solution, not, however, on a table; but, as the Prioress deposed on oath, on a shelf, well out of the reach of children. Moreover, it was not kept there customarily, and as a matter of fact, was in charge of a Sister who was about to use it for disinfecting purposes (Testimony, pp. 3751-3752).

These accusations must be dismissed, but not without comment. I doubt if anyone, Mr. Hotchkiss included, ever seriously intended to prove them. But an "impression" had to be created, and impressions are wiped out only as by a miracle. What was that impression? You read it in the headlines, found it insinuated by lying journalists and pamphleteers: that these white-robed, white-souled Sisters of St. Dominic, these refined and gentle ladies whose lives are an unbroken round of toil and prayer, are in reality, devils of cruelty, who habitually house sick little children, types of utter misery in its most touching and appealing form, in an old carpenter shop, leaving within reach of their tiny hands, bottles and open cases of poison! Save in the pages of a press mad with anti-Catholic hatred, never did New York read a fouler or more malicious falsehood.

(3) "In some institutions, V (St. Dominic's,) . . . as well as in some others, the beds were either found dirty or the bed linen soiled, sometimes torn" (Brief, p. 37). This assertion rests on the unsupported testimony of Mr. Abraham Oseroff, and even he did not refer it to the entire institution, as Mr. Hotchkiss does, but to two out of sixteen dormitories (Oseröff Report, pp. 3-4). Nor, save as to St. Dominic's Cottage in which the "head cases" are isolated, does he say that it represents the general condition of the dormitories criticised. He inspected the beds of 637 children (Report, p. 9). He asserts that "the beds" in St. Dominic's Cottage were "dirty," that "in the second-floor dormitory of St. Dominic's Cottage, the bed linen in a number of cases was filthy," that "in the second-floor dormitory of St. Thomas Cottage, the beds and springs were very dusty, and some of the bed linen not clean" (Report pp. 3-4, 16). By one brief accusation, however, "in some institutions, e. g., St. Dominic's, the beds were found dirty," etc., Mr. Hotchkiss jumps from the particular to the universal, and writes as if all the children at St. Dominic's habitually slept in filth and rags.

Here again, where is the truth? It can be found, first, in the Doherty Report, made, evidently, before the need of "proof" became acute. "All the dormitories were found clean and well kept" (p. 41), and so I found them on May 31, 1916. But what of their condition on December 21, 1915, when subjected to the microscopic eye of Mr. Oseroff? They were clean then too. Under oath, the Prioress affirms that "the beds were not dirty . . . that clean linen is supplied throughout the institution every week, and emphatically denied that any of the bed linen was filthy as stated in the Report" (Testimony, p. 3787). There can be no choice between the unsupported assertions of a fault-finding "expert" and the statements, made under oath, of a Dominican Prioress.

(4) "In one—the Asylum of the Sisters of St. Dominic at Blauvelt—the doctor admitted that he served" about 1,600 persons in two institutions, and "besides that, was attending physician in an Old Folks' Home, did active work in connection with a hospital, and had a large country practice" (Brief, p. 41). This is dreadful; yet even the dullest can see that neither 1,600 inmates nor 16,000,000, will ever work a physician overtime, if they do not require his services. This simple truth finally permeated the skull of Mr. Hotchkiss, for after a sneer at Dr. Leitner as a "superman," he adds: "In justification, the doctor at the first institution (Blauvelt) testified (under oath, be it remembered) that there had been very little illness among the inmates served by him" (Brief, p. 41). On the day of the Doherty inspection, out of a population of 770, but seven were in the infirmary (Doherty Report, p. 20, p. 23); and of 9,004 children on the institution register, there have been but 34 deaths, 13 of which occurred in one year as a result of measles.

Other accusations in connection with this and charges 1 and 2, were made during the hearings to create the impression that these Sisters shockingly neglect the health of their little charges. Founded on ignorance or malice, they are amply refuted by the sworn testimony of Dr. Leitner (Testimony, p. 3802) and are not even referred to in the Hotchkiss brief. Transferred to the headlines, they had served their slanderous purpose; but no decent man could seriously urge them.

(5) "In Institution V (Blauvelt) there were but 200 books for the use of nearly 800 children" (Brief, p. 51). At the time of Mr. Oseroff's "reinspection," the Institution counted about 650 children (Estimate from the Oseroff Report, p. 9), and Mr. Hotchkiss' "nearly eight hundred" therefore shrinks to this number. Of these 650, something like 275 cannot read; this ability is not expected in babies from two to five years of age. Mr. Hotchkiss' "nearly eight hundred" must therefore suffer a further reduction to "about 375." But what of the number of books? Mother Dominic deposed on oath (Testimony, p. 3771) that "there was a good library of standard works; that there are in use books from the traveling library from which they receive from 100 to 150 books at a time; that the institution has about 200 books for the girls alone exclusive of the traveling library." Reduced, then, to its proper terms, Mr. Hotchkiss' statement amounts to this: "At Blauvelt there are probably one thousand books for about 375 children." Trifling perhaps; but in the hands of Mr. Hotchkiss and the headliners, an excellent means of scoring a point against the benighted Catholic institutions.

(6) "There is no provision whatever for high school classes" (Brief, p. 50). This statement is absolutely untrue. The Doherty Report on which it is founded, says (p. 48) that "no provision of any kind has as yet been made for some of the children." An excellent example of Hotchkiss accuracy. Furthermore, only about ten per cent of the children are of high-school age, and this number is reduced by the fact that some of the children are retarded, a charge urged beyond due limits by Dr. Reeder (Doherty Report, pp. 50-51) and Mr. Hotchkiss. Dr. Reeder, however, does not lay the blame on the teaching; he admits that "there are a number of pleasing features in connection with the school work," and "in general a fair degree of success." (Idem.) But it is distinctly unfair to compare these children with children whose antecedents and environments have been wholly normal. As Sister Cornelia explained (Testimony, p. 3815), some of these children are foreigners, and others are from careless or illiterate homes. The wonder is not that retardation is found but that so little of it really exists. Sister Cornelia testified that the school had from twelve to fourteen Regent graduates every year, and that, when discharged, the children could continue in the same grade in outside schools (Testimony p. 3815). There is, then, no reason to believe that these devoted and capable Sisters will fail to organize high-school training for all when necessary or even useful, or that its absence under present circumstances may rightfully be turned to their discredit.

(7) The last charge made by Mr. Hotchkiss is tremendous, but it is an "inference" and a very base one at that, rather than a straightforward accusation. "As to the Sister who kept the dental records at the Asylum of the Sisters of St. Dominic. There was a sharp controversy as to whether she had or had not kept the records up to date" (Brief, p. 69). Mr. Hotchkiss admits (Brief p. 71) "The matter was, as the Commissioner remarked, a small one," and in a sense, it was. No one questioned that the children received proper dental care; but an attempt was made to show that the records had been falsified by the Sisters. Mr. Hotchkiss finally "infers" that they were (Brief, p. 72). They were not, and the Prioress swears that they were not. This evidence, however, is not necessary. Considering the value of a Hotchkiss "proof," it is respectfully submitted that a Hotchkiss "inference" is not worth the paper it is written on.

Had I told you at the outset of the twenty blue ribbons for sewing, won at the County Fair by the little girls, and of the many social and religious activities of the school, my picture would not be the inadequate sketch that it is. But I thought it better, as a matter of record, to review the only charges which on sober thought, and on some thought not quite so sober, Mr. Hotchkiss could urge against the institution. Some day I hope to write of the beautiful spirit of devotion which hallows this house of love, of the happiness which I saw written in the faces of the children, of the gentle dignity of those ladies, their protectors, who wear so worthily the spotless habit of the great St. Dominic. As I left the Convent, the music of child-laughter came on the evening breeze across the lawns. Some of the Novices and Sisters were playing with the children in the garden. It was a scene worthy the brush of their own Fra Angelico.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

Little Things and Health

THE United States Public Health Service, the Bureau of the National Government which has charge of the enforcement of sanitary regulations so as to prevent epidemic disease, has recently been insisting on the importance of preventing the multiplication of flies, mosquitoes and certain other insects at this season of the year. A number of our State boards of health have also emphasized the necessity for precautions at this time and have dwelt on the fact that a little prevention now is worth much more than a great deal of effort expended later on in the summer. At the present time very few insects are to be seen, these, however, are the potential progenitors of the swarms that will prove not only annoying, but even dangerous later in the summer. It would be comparatively easy to limit their breeding at the present time, if definite organized efforts were made; while later on the most that can be hoped for is the palliation of a nuisance which has come about as a consequence of neglecting to prevent the insects' reproduction during the spring.

A few years since it was generally considered that at most flies and mosquitoes were a harmless nuisance. Now we know that, excepting contaminated food and drink, they are probably our most dangerous propagators of disease. Flies are particularly hurtful to children and to those suffering from wounds, but undoubtedly they are the carriers of a good many of the lighter infections from which even robust adults suffer during the summer. As has been well said, if the fly could only be taught good manners it would not be so harmful. Unfortunately, however, it has been impossible, thus far at least, to have the flies wipe their feet before they make their way into dwellings. When the dining-rooms have been darkened and the food removed and there is no longer any company for her, Madam Fly, as might be expected perhaps from her sex, makes her way into the highways and byways seeking society and a morsel of food wherever she can obtain it. Uncovered garbage cans, the open mouths of sewers, heaps of refuse of various kinds, midden piles, organic rubbish of all sorts: all these are her favorite stopping-places. The fly disports herself there until toward evening she is pretty well tired and ready to find her way into the house again.

The smell of cooking food seems to be the dinner bell for her and she makes her way to the nearest house. Having walked over all sorts of filthy material during her afternoon rounds, she now proceeds to occupy herself with the food materials at hand. Lumps of sugar offer her an opportunity for mountain climbing and whatever dirt has been accumulated on her feet is gradually deposited on the loaves. She is apt to promenade on the bread, however, and she seems to like to skate on the butter. Whether she has heard that a bath in milk is good for beauty or not remains an unsolved question, but she will often be found immersed in the milk. Unfortunately these organic substances, especially if they are fluid, furnish excellent culture material for any bacteria that she may have brought back on her feet, and, in the course of a comparatively short time, bacteria multiply rapidly enough to make the consumption of such material somewhat dangerous. Probably some of the sweet preserves act as the same sort of culture medium as milk; hence the ease with which they spoil in the summer-time and the frequency with which they become sources of various infections of the digestive tract, more or less serious according to circumstances.

Babies are particular favorites of the fly, and as babies' hands and mouths and cheeks are usually sticky the insect finds on the child a particularly good hunting-ground. No wonder then that very young children often suffer from digestive disturbances even though all their food may have been thoroughly sterilized or obtained from the maternal fount whence no bacterial infections flow.

These are the dangers from the fly, and the curious thing is that spiders which represented one provision of nature for keeping down the numbers of the fly have become a source of serious suspicion and even of fear and hatred, though the spider, in our climate at least, has never proved dangerous to man unless it had previously been feeding on contaminated flies. We used to pity the poor innocent fly when it was seized and devoured by the awful ogre, the spider, and now we know that the fly deserved no pity, while the spider merits encouragement in its work and not condemnation.

But the fly is not our only insect enemy. For the mosquito is a vehicle, probably the only vehicle, for the transmission of these most serious diseases, yellow fever and malaria. It is very probable that no case of either disease has ever occurred without a mosquito as the intermediary. As flies breed in garbage and other waste material, so the mosquito breeds in stagnant water. In both cases man by his carelessness helps these pests into existence. Not infrequently the question is asked, why Providence allows such diseases and such pests, but a little inquiry usually shows that danger to man from these low forms of life is due to man's negligence, not to God's direct design.

In a recent bulletin of the United States Public Health Service, attention is called to certain beetles which serve to reduce materially the number of mosquitoes. The whirligig beetles Dineutes consume the larvæ of anopheles mosquitoes in large numbers. The anopheles mosquito is the special carrier of malaria. One distinguished entomologist, quoted by the "Public Health Reports," says that "no anopheles larvæ have a chance in any bit of water inhabited by these whirligig beetles. Their surface-feeding habit and their tendency to get near the edges of ponds and slow-flowing streams make them especially dangerous to anopheles which fail absolutely to maintain themselves within range of these beetles." Government investigation has shown that the beetles are only successful when conditions are reasonably favorable. The whirligig beetles are rather familiar to most people of observant habits, for they are the small dark oval flattened beetles which float lightly on the surface of woodland pools and sluggish streams, "usually congregated in considerable numbers either resting quietly or performing graceful complex curves around each other, at times darting around and around and yet seemingly never colliding."

Over and over again in the study of insects and their relation to disease, it has been found that an overwhelming outbreak of sickness is usually due to some disturbance of the natural relations of insects to each other. For instance it has been found that certain scaly diseases of the fruit trees can be best overcome by the deliberate introduction of an insect from one of the Eastern countries which, in the particular home of this scaly disease, keeps it under control. When the scale was introduced into this country, however, that particular insect not being here to prevent its growth, it ran wild with serious results to the trees.

In a word, disease has proved to be largely a matter of extremely little things, and prevention a matter of what may appear almost meticulous precautions. Some of the great epidemics of the world have not been due, as was so often thought, to a great cataclysm in the heavens, disorder in the stars or the planets, nor to rotation of the earth in its course through a particularly noxious space, but to minute insects here with us, whose influence was scarcely even suspected. The age-long tradition of the "night air" being bad for human beings has proved to be utterly false in the original meaning of the expression, in spite of a certain element of truth that is in it. As a great sanitarian once said, the only pure air is the night air and as far as possible every person should breathe pure air. The only noxious creature in night air is the mosquito, who knows enough not to go wandering about during the heat of the day when the sun might injure her, but who takes her flights by preference in the evening. The only foundation for the term malaria, as it were bad-airia, is that the mosquito travels in the night air, and that is bad for men.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Preparedness and the Scriptures

THE pacifist claims that "preparedness" is contrary to the teaching of Holy Scripture, and cites Our Lord's saying: "You have heard it said an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But I say to you not to resist evil, but if one strike thee on thy right cheek turn to him also the other" (Matt. v: 38 and Luke vi: 29). Again, "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you and pray for them who persecute and calumniate you" (Matt. v: 44). The passage from St. Matthew continues as follows: "For if you love them that love you, what reward shall you have? Do not even the publicans do this?" And again, "Be you therefore perfect as your Heavenly Father is perfect (Matt. v: 46; 48).

It will be observed that what is enjoined is love of our fellow-men, even though they be our enemies, and bearing injuries with patience and tolerance, and this is undoubtedly the fundamental law of the Gospel. Our Lord cites the criminal code of Moses as set forth in Exodus, Leviticus and Deuteronomy, which provided for the punishment by the State of individuals: the punishment being the infliction of the same injury upon the aggressor as he inflicted upon his victim.

The reference is made by way of antithesis and the whole phrase in its setting bears witness that the antithesis was used not so much to impose a reversal of the old law of the State as to emphasize the contrast between the old underlying idea of revenge and the new conception of love for one's neighbor. Indeed if the mere surface intent as indicated by the words alone were to rule in the interpretation, then might it also rule in the other precepts to be found in the same chapter such as, "If thy right eye scandalize thee pluck it out and cast it from thee," and, "If thy right hand scandalize thee cut it off and cast it from thee." These words, therefore, simply convey a counsel of perfection: without its observance according to the spirit there can be no thought of reward, and its ultimate aim is "to be perfect as your Heavenly Father is perfect."

And Our Lord's own example refutes the idea that we should always and in all cases "turn the other cheek." His neighbors at Nazareth on one occasion thrust Him out of the city and brought Him to the brow of the hill that they might cast Him down headlong, but He passing through the midst of them went His way (Luke iv: 30). What does this mean but that He resisted them? Whether by natural or supernatural means does not alter the question. Again when the servant of the High Priest said to Him at His trial, "Answerest thou the High Priest so?" and struck Him a blow, He did not turn the other cheek, but remonstrated with him at the injustice of the act. "If I have spoken evil give testimony of the evil, but if well why strikest thou me?" According to a literal interpretation of the precept, St. Paul must indeed have offended grievously when the High Priest Ananias caused them that stood by to strike the Apostle in the mouth (Acts, xxiii), for instead of offering his cheek he retorted, "God shall strike thee, thou whited wall"!

But it is said Our Lord discountenanced the use of force, and "preparedness" is a reliance upon force. Considered apart from any special circumstances I find no authority in Our Lord's teaching for so bald a proposition. We know for a fact that He used force in driving the money-changers from the Temple (John ii: 15). We know also that though the centurion expressly avowed his profession, he was not only not rebuked because of it, but he was accorded a great miracle on account of his faith. We know also that Our Lord publicly recognized the State and the duty the citizen owed to it, when He sanctioned rendering to Cæsar what belonged to him, even though the State of that day maintained its power among the nations by military rule. And He even cited the use of force by way of illustration (Luke xi: 21, 22; Matt. xii: 29; Mark iii: 27) to exemplify His teaching especially with regard to preparedness.

In all this there is nothing that opposes the love of one's neighbor. The father chastises the child because he loves it. The State bears no enmity to the citizen in protecting itself against his infringement of the law; neither need it bear enmity against a foreign aggressor. The State springs from the natural order. It is organized society and must have the power of self-preservation. It exercises this power as regards its internal order through the police, and as regards its external relations through its army and navy. In both cases the only ultimate remedy is force, and it would be folly in either case for the State to wait until its peace is threatened before taking steps to preserve it. All men are not disposed to justice. Passion, greed and other evil instincts are to be reckoned with in nations as well as in individuals. Patience and toleration are enjoined upon the nation as well as upon the individual, but Our Lord never taught that organized society should voluntarily yield to the rule of evil. Therefore while His words above quoted are to be taken by both State and individual as embodying the fundamental principle of human conduct, and followed by both even to the extent of self-repression as occasion may offer and circumstances permit, they are not to be interpreted as incompatible with the social order; and so long as a nation acts within the sphere of justice and upon the principle of self-preservation, as I read the Scripture, it is not only permissible but actually imperative under the Christian Dispensation for it to adopt such measures as may be reasonably deemed effective to that end.

J. PERCY KEATING.

Fordham University's Diamond Jubilee

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago, a Catholic, whose name is a synonym for sane but fearless militancy, carried out a long-cherished scheme. He was the Coadjutor-Bishop of New York, although even at that date he was marked as its future Archbishop. Already he was planning to enter the lists against the Public School Society, a private organization which, to the marked detriment of Catholic interests, was controlling the elementary education of the city; but the time had not yet come to measure his strength with theirs, although a few years later he did do so with the result that the present modus vivendi was established, not indeed to the complete satisfaction of the Church but at least on a basis that ensures gratifying freedom in both management and curriculum. That the fervor and intensity of Catholicism in the diocese would be in direct proportion to the care expended on the early religious formation of its children, John Hughes realized to the full; but in the year 1841 there was a more fundamental necessity, paradoxical as it may seem, engrossing his attention.

Hardly had he been consecrated before he came to the conclusion that if Catholics were to take their share in the civic and moral life of the community over whose spiritual destinies he had been given some control, if they were to be reckoned with in the administration of government and were to be listened to in the direction of municipal affairs, they must be afforded easy means of obtaining a thorough training in literature, art, science and philosophy, so that they might make themselves the equals, intellectually, of their fellow-citizens. The Catholics under his jurisdiction were not enjoying the affluence nor exercising the influence to which they had not only the right but the duty to aspire. Had it been mere college training that was required to remedy conditions, he need not have troubled himself, for Columbia had an efficient staff of professors and was within easy access of the more populous part of the diocese. What the diocese needed was not so much educated Catholics, as representative Catholics, men, that is, who would be Catholics in very truth, constant in the pursuit of Christian ideals and competent to give a reason for the faith that was in them. For the formation of Catholics of this type, a college was required that should impart solid learning, giving before all else an adequate course in true philosophy and sound apologetics, while instinct and permeated with the subtle atmosphere of a lively faith.

There was no such institution in his diocese, and so the courageous and undaunted John Hughes set himself with characteristic thoroughness to found one. In view of the meager resources at his disposal it was a daring thing to do, but the Bishop was not a man to be frightened by difficulties. He first took care to find a suitable site, and this he secured in the fairest portion of the beautiful manor that is quaintly described in the Westchester records as "upon the main continent situate, lying and being to the Eastward of Harlem River, near unto ye passage commonly called Spiting Devil, upon which ye New Dorp or Village is erected, known by the name of Fordham." The property, then as for many years later, bore the name of Rose Hill, a name not so familiar to later generations but endeared by fond memories to older students. It was here that Bishop Hughes gave hostages to fortune when, three-quarters of a century ago, he threw open the doors of St. John's on the feast and under the patronage of St. John the Baptist.

Six years passed. And then a group of friends and well-wishers journeyed by rough and crooked ways far beyond the outskirts of old Manhattan to be present at the graduation exercises. It was the second occasion of the kind, and not the first, as the Herald erroneously stated the following day, but it was more important than the first on account of the publicity that attended the pledge given to the country by the vice-president of the college in the name of the diocese and the faculty. Three young men received the diploma of bachelor of arts. In the course of the presentation speech, Father John Larkin, S.J., spoke as follows:

> Gentlemen: Let me impress upon your minds that by asking for and receiving the academic honors you enter into a solemn and public engagement to show yourselves worthy of the distinction which is conferred on you. This distinction is conferred upon you, not in our name, but in the name and by the authority of the Republic, and to the Republic both we and you are responsible. If the Republic invests us with a discretionary power to decorate with these distinctions those whom we judge worthy, it expects, and it has a right to expect, that they should show themselves on all occasions, in word and in deed, friends of law and order, defenders of truth and justice, supporters of sound morality.

Why Father Larkin invoked the authority of the Republic is not quite clear, for he certainly knew that it was the State and not the Federal Government that had passed, on April 10, 1846, the Act of Incorporation, by which St. John's College was given a legal status, the rank of university and the power to confer degrees in theology, law, medicine and arts. Perhaps the reason was that in those days citizenship in the Union was the absorbing privilege, for State rights had not yet become clamorous for recognition. More probably, however, the vice-president was so keenly alive to the glorious memories that clung to the spot where he spoke, that for the moment the lesser loyalty was obscured by the greater. For Fordham, then as now, was holy ground, redolent of deeds of heroism wrought in the days when patriots were founding the Republic. What is now the college property was not only familiar to General Washington and his staff, but according to cherished and credible tradition, one of the college buildings, still standing in 1847, had served as the headquarters of the great Commander-in-Chief in the anxious days that followed the landing of the British at Throgg's Neck in the autumn of 1776.

This much, however, is certain: the words spoken by the vice-president in the name of the faculty, at the second graduation, voiced not only the ideals of the Jesuits, but the aspirations of its founder as well; for one of the first things that the Fathers of the Society of Jesus had done, when in response to the invitation of Bishop Hughes they had come from St. Mary's, Kentucky, to assume charge of the studies, was to issue a prospectus, in which it was declared that the college "shall be conducted on the same principles as heretofore"; and about the founder's devotion to the Flag there can be no doubt, as even the Government at Washington thought the prelate's advice worth having in matters of State and asked him to undertake diplomatic missions.

So to train its students that they would become "friends of law and order, defenders of truth and justice, supporters of sound morality," such was the pledge given by Fordham University in the days when it was known as St. John's. It has kept its pledge for three-quarters of a century. It has not changed since 1841 except with the change that comes with years. Its elms are taller and more venerable, the sweep of old Rose Hill has been softened by the winds of many winters, its buildings have multiplied, some of its historic relics have yielded to the ravages of time and some of its wide acres have been turned into a public park; brilliant gowns of doctors in law and medicine and literature give color to faculty gatherings that once were somber with Black Robes alone; from the most insignificant of Catholic universities it has grown into the largest, with one possible exception, in the entire English-speaking world. In all these things Fordham glories, but its greatest source of satisfaction is this, that throughout these many years it has been faithful to ideals.

It has steadily refused to become commercialized, it has not yielded to the recurrent novelties that have wrecked so much of our higher education, it has held out against insistent pressure to abandon time-honored standards, it still reserves its distinctions for those of whom it has well-grounded assurance that they will "show themselves on all occasions, in word and in deed, friends of law and order, defenders of truth and justice, supporters of sound morality."

From the days of its first faculty, five of whom subsequently became bishops, and of these five two became archbishops, down to the present day, Fordham has kept its ideals clear and its traditions undimmed; and throughout this long lapse of time, it has asked no other privilege but to wear out, for God and country, the lives of its teachers, and then to let them rest, unknown and forgotten, in the little college graveyard. Nor has it looked to any other recompense beyond the growing list of the generals, statesmen, jurists, physicians, scientists, educators, clergymen, financiers, businessmen, journalists and other representatives in both private and public walks of life, who under St. John's fostering care learned to be sober and pure, strong and gentle, honorable, honest and unfaltering in fidelity to the trusts given them by God and man.

Fordham has gone far towards paying the debt it owes to the country, and especially to the metropolis; for many parts of our land are better for the presence of Fordham men, but none more strikingly than New York itself, where its graduates have consistently thrown their influence on the side of right and order and have served in the highest offices within the gift of city, State and Church. The first Cardinal of New York and of the United States was a Fordham man, not indeed a student but its first president. This is a source of pride that is eminently just; but Fordham has a still greater reason for pride. The present Cardinal of the same metropolitan see, his Eminence, John Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, is also a Fordham man, the most illustrious of her living sons, and the most distinguished of all her sons, whether living or dead.

Fordham's jubilee will mean much to all her children, but we fancy that it will have its keenest interest for this venerable prelate. No one, it is safe to say, has so many ties with the college as he has. His life and hers began almost together, for he too is completing his seventy-fifth year; few if any have associations with her that antedate his; no one has been entrusted with so long-standing, so uninterrupted and so varied a supervision over her welfare as he. In all her history no one's interests have been more intimately associated with hers than his. Others, teachers, presidents, prelates have come and gone, but he and she, the Cardinal and the college, have worked side by side almost since their days began, always intent on the same purpose, always striving for the same end. He has graced more of her festivals than has any other living man; joys and sorrows have been common to both; his aspirations have been hers, her hopes have been his. They have grown gray in the service of the Lord, the years of their lives have run along, literally, together. It is well, therefore, that Cardinal Farley should preside in his seventy-fifth year at Fordham's Diamond Jubilee, that his high estate, silver hairs and scarlet cap should be the crown of the garnered glories of her seventy-five honorable years. Who is so fit to congratulate her for the three-quarters of a century of labor that is behind her, and to wish her God-speed for the centuries of service, let us hope, that are yet to come? J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

Catholic Landmarks of Cincinnati

AMONG American cities rich in Catholic interest Cincinnati is noteworthy. While not among its first settlers, Catholics early began to drift in, and when, in 1814, the Rev. Edward Fenwick, who, in 1806, had founded a convent of his Dominican Order in St. Rose, Kentucky, and who had extended his missionary work into Ohio, passed through the settlement on his way to Somerset, he found a congregation of about seven families awaiting him. Far removed from church and priest, it was the custom of these Irish pioneers to meet regularly in the home of one Michael Scott for devotions; and in his house, which stood in Walnut Street, below Fourth Street, the first Mass in Cincinnati was celebrated. About four years later Bishop Flaget visited Cincinnati, then a part of his Diocese of Bardstown, which embraced five States and two immense Territories, and advised them to build a church, promising to send them a priest.

The first settlers of Cincinnati were chiefly Presbyterians, and their hatred of the Church stamped their conduct in the framing of an ordinance, which forbade the building of a Catholic place of worship within the confines of the town; hence, when the Right Rev. Edward Fenwick, O.P., came, in 1822, to take possession of the newly erected See of Cincinnati, he found his cathedral church outside of his episcopal city. It stood in a territory known, and significantly, as the North Liberties. This first cathedral in Ohio and the second in the West was built of logs, which had been cut on the farm of William Reilly, at Alexandria, Kentucky. Adjoining the church, the little band of Catholic pioneers laid out their first God's Acre.

When, years afterward, this site passed into the hands of the Franciscan Fathers, with reverent care they gathered up the ashes of those pioneers of the Faith, and placed them in the vault under their church of St. Francis Assisi, whose twin towers rise above a populous district, almost entirely Catholic. A large, modern parochial school, the College of St. Francis Seraph, and many societies for the varied works of the parish, attest how well religion is fostered in the spot where, in poverty and persecution, it was planted almost a century ago. A short distance away are the large church, parish house and school of St. John, also in charge of the Franciscans; for the handful of seed has yielded a wonderful harvest.

On his return from Europe, in 1825, whither he had gone to beg for his poor diocese, the Bishop purchased a more convenient site at the corner of Seventh and Sycamore Streets, to which the log church was removed, on the repeal of the benighted ordinance. The growth of the congregation soon necessitated a new building, and the old church was converted in 1829 into a seminary. In 1831, the Athenæum, a college and preparatory school for boys, was built, both institutions being taught by the priests of the cathedral. The education of girls was first in charge of Poor Clares from Belgium, who opened a school in 1826. While the venture was successful, seventy pupils being enrolled the first year, the Sisters did not remain in Cincinnati. In 1829 a little band of Sisters of Charity, from Emmitsburg, Maryland, entered the diocese, and opened an orphan asylum and free school.

When Bishop Purcell, who succeeded to the see on the death, from cholera, of Bishop Fenwick in 1832, determined to build a new cathedral, the property was transferred, in 1840, to the Jesuits. Instead of the little cathedral, there now rises the splendid church of St. Francis Xavier, mother of many parishes; and from the Athenæum has grown St. Xavier College, crowned with three-quarters of a century of exalted work for Church and State. Its large parochial school offers free education to the children of the Greek, the Syrian, the Italian, as well as to the descendants of its Irish and German founders. A Home for Newsboys and Working Boys, founded by Miss Margaret McCabe, in conjunction with the late Rev. John Poland, S.J., is nearby; while in Broadway, is the Sacred Heart Home for Working Girls, also founded by Miss McCabe. A Day Nursery in Pioneer Street, the first for Catholics in the city, is conducted by members of the parish, extending the social work of the Fathers and the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

Belonging also to the parish is St. Thomas Church. Originally a Baptist church, almost the entire congregation went over when Alexander Campbell, with his new doctrine, appeared in Cincinnati; and it was in this church (1837) the famous debate between himself and Bishop Purcell took place, which resulted in detaching from Dr. Campbell many of his new converts. On the removal of the Campbellite congregation to Eighth and Walnut Streets, the property was leased, in 1853, by Archbishop Purcell, and was bought by the Jesuits some years later. Rome followed the Campbellites and their second home is now the Church of St. Louis, in the heart of the business district. There, during Lent and on every Friday of the year, noonday services are held, which attract large crowds.

Near St. Xavier Church, in Sixth Street, is a venerated building, the convent of the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur, who, in 1840, laid there the first American foundation of their Order. At Third and Lytle Streets, for the vicinity of the old cathedral is historic ground, is another birthplace of note. There stood the home of Mrs. Sarah Peters, who, on her conversion, devoted her life and her wealth to the works of the Church. One of her luminous acts was the introduction, in 1858, of the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, to whom she turned over her home, reserving only a few rooms for herself. The Sisters conduct the St. Mary Hospital, in Betts Street, and the Home for Incurables in Fairmount; while many other cities are blessed by their work among the sick poor. In Lock Street stands the old Good Samaritan Hospital. It was the gift of two non-Catholic gentlemen, Joseph Butler and Lewis Worthington, to Sister Anthony, who, through her deeds on the battlefields and in the hospitals during the War between the States, earned the title of the "Florence Nightingale of America." The Good Samaritan Hospital, now grown into a magnificent new building in Clifton, is one of her monuments in the diocese, into which she came among the first of Mother Seton's daughters.

Cincinnati's third and present cathedral at Eighth and Plum Streets, is an object of interest for all who love art, while from the historic and religious point of view it is equally appealing. It is of Grecian architecture, with a spire of 220 feet, springing from a colonnade of eighteen freestone columns, thirty-three feet in height and three and one-half feet in diameter. Its famous chime of bells and great clock were the gift of the Catholic philanthropist, Reuben Springer, who contributed largely toward the building of the cathedral. All the Catholic institutions of his time shared his benefactions, while his gifts to the city were many, among the latter being its Music Hall, one of the largest in the world. The genius of Hiram Powers adorns the cathedral, in a pair of adoring angels on the main altar; while its collection of paintings is renowned. Notable among these is a Murillo, representing the deliverance of St. Peter by an angel. It was one of the four masterpieces taken from Spain by the French during the Peninsular War, and was given to Bishop Fenwick by Cardinal Fesch.

The cathedral, begun in 1841 and consecrated in 1845, was one of the many great accomplishments of Archbishop Purcell. On Price Hill he built a diocesan seminary, St. Mary's of the West, (located, since 1904, at Cedar Point, Hamilton County) and drew to it men of learning and sanctity. With a few exceptions, all the Religious Orders that bless the diocese were introduced by him; churches and schools multiplied, and an ever-increasing Catholic population revered him as their spiritual father. Then came the great financial crash, and as with his Divine Master, the cup of sorrow was held to his lips. In the seclusion of the Ursuline Convent, in Brown County, he drained it to the dregs, dying there July 4, 1883. But under his successors, the late Archbishop Elder, and the Most Rev. Henry Moeller, now happily ruling, the old diocese rose out of disaster, and continues its mission, with renewed strength and greater prosperity.

Holy Trinity, Cincinnati's second church, was built in 1834, and is the mother of the German parishes of the city. It had for its first pastor the Rev. John Martin Henni, afterward first Archbishop of Milwaukee. It was also the first church to maintain a parochial school. The church and school were burned in 1852. At the dedication of the new church, January 1, 1854, Mass was sung by Archbishop Bedini, Papal Nuncio to Brazil, who, though the guest of Archbishop Purcell, had been attacked a week before by a Know-Nothing mob. Bent on destroying the cathedral rectory and murdering the distinguished prelate, they were halted by the swift action of Catholics and other citizens and prevented from committing the crime. The present pastor of Old Trinity is the Right Rev. Mgr. Windthorst, nephew of Ludwig Windthorst, the great German leader. Another historic church is St. Patrick's, Third and Mill Streets, built in 1850, and which numbered among its pastors, the future Archbishop Wood of Philadelphia, Bishops Gilmour of Cleveland and Quinlan of Mobile.

In West Fourth Street stands the former home of the Sisters of Mercy, who entered Cincinnati in 1858. In the War between the States, these Sisters acted as nurses, and turned their convent into a hospital, while it became a relief station during the Spanish-American War. In it, too, the Sisters nursed the cholera patients, when plague devastated the city. It is now the temporary home for the Catholic Mission for the Deaf, while the conventual Church of the Atonement is used by the Syrian congregation.

Toward the east, on Cincinnati's most famous hilltop, stand the Immaculata and Holy Cross churches. This height, known as Mount Adams, is reached from Third Street by two long flights of steps, up which thousands of the devout make a pilgrimage on Good Friday to the Church of the Immaculata. Formerly on Mount Adams stood the Cincinnati Observatory. When its cornerstone was laid, in 1843, the principal address was delivered by ex-President John Quincy Adams, who, as reported, congratulated the city that upon that lofty height had been set the beacon of true science, which should never be obscured by the dark shadow of superstition, symbolized by the Popish cross. Archbishop Purcell, hearing the vain boast and knowing science is never so true as when in the company of religion, determined the two should occupy the hill together. Directly across from the Observatory he built a church, which he dedicated to the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, and to the charge of which he called the Passionist Fathers. In the course of time the Observatory was removed to Mount Lookout, and the building was purchased by the Passionists and converted into a monastery. Beside it they built a little frame church, monastery and church bearing the name of Holy Cross. Years ago the old Observatory and little chapel gave place to a new monastery and church; and when day breaks over the city its first rays illumine the two cross-crowned steeples of Mount Adams, and at night the electric light of the Immaculata tells of the Faith that fails not.

ANNA C. MINOGUE.

COMMUNICATIONS

Expediency or Principle

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I trust that Mr. P. Scanlan of Brooklyn, N. Y., will experience no feelings of keen disappointment at not finding in subsequent issues of your paper, replies to the closing question of his very interesting letter, which appeared in the issue of May 27. It seems to me, from careful observation, that far too few of your readers take enough lively interest in the many important questions which are placed before them by your contributors, to trouble themselves with either reply or comment. It is a pity that this is so, because this apparent apathy is responsible for the loss of immeasurable good which might be effected. I think that Mr. Scanlan must have had a similar thought in mind when he wrote his letter, because he mentions an indifference which he calls criminal. This is a severe indictment, but doubtless your correspondent is an observer of events, and in addition is absolutely unselfish, and devoid of self-seeking. He must be, and for this reason, he has a claim on the admiration and affection of all red-blooded men. The closing paragraph of Mr. Scanlan's letter is very pertinent. It merited careful reading. To live, to fight, and if need be, to die for principle is a doctrine essentially Catholic, too often forgotten, but as eternal as truth itself. Men dominated by such principles, are always lovers of good, and despisers of evil, irrespective of the personality and the position of those who perpetrate the evil.

The happy illustration in the illuminating paragraph to which I have referred, suggests a thought which is worthy of our consideration. It is this. If that Catholic sense, to which Mr. Scanlan referred, and if that fighting spirit whose need he pointed out, ever become popular among Catholics, will the possession of them operate to eradicate absolutely the too fond practice of substituting expediency for principle? If they do, then assuredly we cannot hope too fondly for the advent of the day, wherein the needed change will take place. We need, not so much a "Catholic sense" that will be sensitive to insult, as an unwavering adherence to the Catholic doctrine, that in the conflict between expediency and principle, principle must always take precedence. How different seems the practice from the theory; how pressing the necessity of making the needed reformation, how urgent the invitation and the call of the hour, to quit playing politics, and to get down to a sober sense of our true responsibility, both as regards the defense of our rights and the advancement of our interests along the lines of constructive work. I respectfully congratulate Mr. Scanlan on his letter, and I trust that a reading of it has produced results that later on may find expression in your columns.

Dorchester, Mass. JAMES D. RUSSELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a very timely communication to AMERICA, P. Scanlan emphasizes the necessity of concerted efforts on the part of Catholics to defend the Church against the attacks of her enemies. Far-seeing men and women have long felt the need of such efforts. In the opinion of the writer a Catholic press bureau, with branches in all our cities and towns, is really indispensable as long as we have not our own Catholic daily papers. One of the principal objects of this press bureau would be the writing of reasonable letters of protest to the papers that attack the Church or Catholic institutions, and the providing of our own people with an abundance of cheap but first-class literature on Christian apologetics and Catholic social reform. But what we Catholics in the United States are chiefly in need of is an organization, not on paper only, of all our Catholic men and women, a vigorous nation-wide organization for defensive and constructive purposes. It is to be hoped that the Catholic Convention, which is to take place in New York from August 20 to August 24, will inaugurate a new era of Catholic activities, and prove a first step toward carrying out the injunctions of the Holy See with regard to Catholic organization and social work.

New York. FRANCIS M. SCHIRP.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was intensely interested by the letter of P. Scanlan in your issue of May 27, headed "A Legion of Defense." That communication rings true. It hits the thinking men of our Faith, who whilst taking pride in asserting our numerical strength, are indifferent to the slander, ridicule and abuse to which we are continually subjected. I agree with him that "we must grasp this serpent of bigotry, grapple with it, strangle it." The writer, in viewing the problem from a businessman's standpoint, believes the first requisite is to provide ways and means in the shape of money that "A Legion of Defense" may be formed with ample working capital to handle the problem in all its ramifications, and they are many.

I believe, without going into details as to what form the organization should take as to directorships, executive committees, etc., that there should be in this country 10,000 men who feel like the writer and would contribute $100.00 each, making a total of $1,000,000, to be invested, as it can be invested, to bring in annually an income of $50,000. This sum could then be utilized for the purposes of "A Legion of Defense." The writer would gladly contribute $100.00 to such an organization. It should not be difficult to raise that sum if a proper presentation and appeal were made to the men of our Faith in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, New Orleans, San Francisco, etc. I should like to see something practical shape itself out of Mr. Scanlan's letter.

Philadelphia. J. P. REILLY.

A School for Social Workers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The president of one of our Catholic Women's Leagues has called my attention to the article on "The Training of Social Workers," that appeared in AMERICA for April 22. In the course of his article Mr. Somerville refers to courses of instruction for the Catholic social worker, but fails to include in his list the American Academy of Christian Democracy, which was opened in September, 1915, by Rev. Peter E. Dietz, Secretary of the Socal Service Commission of the Catholic Federation. The Academy, situated at Hot Springs, in the mountains of North Carolina, was founded to train Catholic women for scientific social service. As Mr. Somerville points out, there is much in the "new science and practice of philanthropy that Catholics cannot accept," and there are many young Catholic workers who are not aware of the character of the latest propaganda of so-called philanthropists. To meet this situation the courses of the new Academy include the study of social science on the principles laid down by Pope Leo in his Encyclical on the "Condition of the Working Classes," also a practical study of charities and social service.

Mr. Somerville asks, "Should not social work be regarded as a special vocation, needing a special test and training, something corresponding to a novitiate?" To aid in developing just such a realization of the serious import of social work, a site for the Academy has been selected that is removed from the distractions of the large cities. Community life, daily Communion, and opportunity for concentration of thought facilitate the attainment of firmness of purpose and strengthen religious motives. It is unfortunate that Mr. Somerville did not know of the Academy.

Hot Springs, N. C. MARGARET TUCKER.

Dr. Badé's Book

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of AMERICA for May 20, Father O'Neill took exception to a statement I had made in regard to Dr. Badé's "The Old Testament in the Light of Today"; and wrote that the book "has not been introduced as a text-book into the University of California." In your issue of May 27, I made reply that my statement had been based on the authority of the publishers' book-notice, sent to reviewers. Meanwhile I requested the publishers to let me know what professor of the University of California made use of the book in his class-work. The subjoined reply is of interest in the cause of truth, and as a caution:

May 22, 1916

REVEREND WALTER DRUM, S.J.,
WOODSTOCK COLLEGE,
WOODSTOCK, MARYLAND.

REVEREND DEAR SIR:

We have your letter of May 17th inquiring in regard to the use of Badé's "Old Testament in the Light of Today" at the University of California. Professor Gayley of the University of California is using this book in connection with his course in Old Testament. If you will refer to the issue of the Pacific published January 26, 1916, you will find an extended notice of the use of Dr. Badé's book in Professor Gayley's course, and a number of comments in regard to the book.

Yours very truly,
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN COMPANY.

Catholic parents have little regard for the faith of their children, if they fail in salutary fear of Professor Gayley and such men as use Dr. Badé's writings.

Woodstock, Md. WALTER DRUM, S.J.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Mr. Carranza

OUR friend, Mr. Carranza, has just read the United States a plain lesson which includes a half-threat to spank Uncle Sam unless he meets Mexican demands forthwith. The situation is interesting. By the beneficent, uplifting power of our country an ingenious liar surrounded by a group of bandits who live by outlawry of the most primitive kind was seated in the shaky saddle of power. And every time the official donkey became naughty and sent its heels on high, the soothing hand of Uncle Sam stroked the beast gently and saved the rider from a fall. Meanwhile the rider's friends ravaged the country; up and down the fair land they went, blaspheming God, outraging women, looting and closing churches, plying the trade, in other words, of demons. And when Mexico became too small for their choice occupations they, or somebody very much like them in thought and act, slipped into the United States and murdered inoffensive Americans. Uncle Sam stroked his beard once, twice, but not thrice. He sent his army across the border to punish the murderers whom Carranza would not or could not restrain.

The man on the donkey saw his chance; his beast was getting blind and weak; despite foreign help it would fall in a heap soon, and the "First Chief" would go down with it to ignominy. Mr. Carranza must have a new prop; a home-made prop this time; a note to the United States would fetch it. So the note has come, impudent, but clever, every paragraph of it. Mexico is on the offensive, the United States is on the defensive. There's the whole result of nearly four years of parley: Mexico submerged in barbarism, a note from a group of bandits that puts this great country in the position of defending itself before men who blaspheme God, outrage girls, murder women, loot homes and churches, drive the flower of their land into exile, and hold the American people up to scorn.

An Era of Strikes and Lockouts

WHILE Europe is in the grip of a world-war, America is passing through a series of internal conflicts unusual in their number and magnitude. Over a thousand strikes and lockouts occurred throughout the United States during the past six months. It would be impossible to assign a common economic reason for all of them. Most of the 268 labor disturbances which marked the month of April alone, involving cessation of work on the part of 300,000 men, are ascribed by the Department of Labor to the shortage of workers and the enormous demands to fill war orders. This would imply that labor had seized the favorable opportunity to set its own terms. In cases where great fortunes are accumulated in war profits it could readily be foreseen that the laborers would insist upon a share in the spoils. The wages thus paid have reacted upon other industries that could ill afford to offer the same high salaries to their men. Yet this can be given as a partial explanation only, though the largest number of strikes has actually occurred in the metal trades, which were most directly influenced by war orders.

In connection with the lockout and strike of the 60,000 garment workers in New York City, a signed statement was issued by twenty-four Columbia University professors who had studied the question from the standpoint of economics and political science. "Our conclusion, after careful consideration," they said, "is that the Manufacturers' Protective Association broke its two-year agreement, which still had more than a year to run, without other justification than the fear that the agreement might thereafter be broken by the union, at a time less favorable to the manufacturers' interests." While this opinion has favored the garment workers, the manufacturers have been called upon by the press to offer evidence that they are in the right.

But the papers evince a strong opposition to another class of workers. For some time past the trainmen's demand for still higher wages, with the alternative of a country-wide strike if their demand is refused, has been pending. Their rate of pay is said to have increased relatively faster than that of the other railroad workers, who receive far lower wages, while the burden of the increase in salaries will probably have to be borne in great part by the public. The carriers' demand for arbitration has hitherto not been favorably received by the men. The latest strike of vast proportions is that of the 10,000 longshoremen of every American port of the Pacific, affecting practically all the shipping.

It is evident therefore that as these strikes are carried on in many fields of industry, their causes are various. There is a lack of confidence on both sides, often well founded; and a desire for the greatest possible gains, not seldom irrespective of the common good. Each for himself and the devil take the hindmost is the natural maxim of classes as of individuals when religion has been banished or is practically ignored. It would be unjust, however, to launch indiscriminate accusations against either employers or laborers, for much that is good and excellent can be found on both sides; but where religion fails to be the dominating principle, whether in commerce or in industry or in private life, the inexorable law will assuredly make itself felt, that it is an evil and a bitter thing for men to have left the Lord their God.

The Turk and the Armenian

TARLAAT BEY is the Turkish Minister of the Interior and consequently he is in the way of being a diplomat. This may account for his recent statement that the Armenian outrages are under investigation with a view to the punishment of those who committed the awful atrocities. But where the need of a long and laborious search into the causes of the crimes that have been committed against the poor unfortunate Christians who are obliged to carry the Turkish yoke? Nothing can justify the savagery of which the Armenians have been victims. They were traitors? The Turks have been slow to make known their treason. The Ottoman at first boasted that the subject tribe had been dealt such a blow that its talk of autonomy would not be heard for another half-century, then, when the civilized world cried out against his blood-lust, he denied that cruelty had been exercised, denied that horrors had been perpetrated, but now, at this late day, the crimes, out of which forsooth Armenian sympathizers are making political capital, are under investigation! The Armenians were guilty of treason? The children, too, the poor little babies who were slain in their mother's arms? The Armenians were guilty of treason? The young girls also, who were carried into captivity to meet a fate worse then death? The Armenians were guilty of treason? The whole tribe in the Asiatic provinces, old men, old women, little boys and girls who were driven like beasts into the mountains and deserts, there to perish?

Granted that treasonable acts had been done. In God's name, can that be offered in explanation, much less in justification, of actions from which even beasts refrain? The reason for the atrocities against the Armenians is that the Turk is as ever, just a Turk. But the blood of his 500,000 victims is calling to God for justice.

The Light Eater's Self-Righteousness

"HE that eateth not, let him not judge him that eateth," was St. Paul's excellent advice to those Christians of Rome who had scruples about partaking of meat that had been offered to idols. The Apostle's counsel is timely still. For we always have with us "weak" Christians who "eat herbs," very ostentatiously and then yield to the temptation of self-righteousness. Just because they are content to breakfast, for instance, on a little fruit and a light cereal must they harbor feelings of disdain for their more earthy fellow-pilgrims who prefer coffee and chops? Always to fare sparingly and still to keep humble is by no means easy. The man who does not at all relish divers viands of which his frailer neighbors are fond is prone to leave the table with a proud look and to despise in his heart those who seem to need more nourishment than he. To be winning and attractive the virtue of abstemiousness must be accompanied by true humility and a sweet temper. Spare fast, the Puritan poet assures us, "oft with gods doth diet," but those celestial banquets should not be allowed to impair one's domestic amiability.

"Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale?" is the question that lovers of good cheer have time out of mind put to the abstemious, for the latter apparently are always assumed to be self-righteous and censorious. But that should not be. Better is it indeed to feast with humility than to fast with pride. If tarrying a little longer at the breakfast-table will help some toilers to bring a more cheerful morning face to the tasks of the day, let not their weakness be regarded with scornful pride by those happy mortals who can smile easily even before breakfast. But these latter will always be few, so pitifully frail is our nature. Because they are rare they should be humble, and try to avoid despising those who cannot smile till breakfast is over.

The Burned Flag

THIRTY or forty years ago a gross insult to our Flag would have been met by a protest from citizens of every class and creed; today the Flag is burned in public, and men smile indulgently over the folly of the person guilty of the deed. This may be very forbearing, but it has a sinister aspect. For after all the standard of a nation symbolizes both the ideals of that nation and the authority on which the safety of the commonwealth rests. Hence it comes to pass that to flout the Flag is both to scorn lofty ideals and to deny the authority which makes those ideals possible. This is particularly dangerous; in fact it is an act of anarchy, all the more sad and malicious when done in the name of universal brotherhood. For such a brotherhood comes not through wanton lawlessness, but by submission to law, whether that law be natural or positive. Brotherhood is the union of many men in common aims and aspirations; it bespeaks submission of part to the whole, coordination of effort with effort, corporate action for a common end; life in other words inspired by the ideals for which the Flag stands and regulated by the authority which it represents. But nothing of all this is symbolized by burning the national Standard. On the contrary, disintegration, destruction, the very antithesis of brotherhood, are brought about. A tiny mound of ashes is left to warn citizens that as their Flag so too their nation can be destroyed by the principles that led to the incineration of the "Star-Spangled Banner" at a service held in the "Church of the Social Revolution," in New York City, on June 1, 1916.

Apologetics in Fiction Form

CRITICISM of Paul Bourget's recent novel, "Le Sens de la Mort," has gone somewhat awry in this country. The translator is not responsible for this, because his work is excellent, having caught the spirit and flavor of the original, without falling into the pitfall of stilted and foreign style that is the constant danger of all versions, especially of the highly individual and idiomatic work of perhaps the foremost living novelist. The change of title, which in some ways is felicitous, is perhaps partly to blame, for "The Night Cometh" obscures the grim issue raised by the "The Meaning of Death." But the real reason for the failure to grasp the significance of the thesis that M. Bourget set himself to develop soon after the war broke out, is a lack of familiarity with his method and his purpose. Readers of such studies of modern French problems, as "Le Divorce" and "L'Étape," know well that it is the practice of this keen observer and psychologist to take up in his novels one or another of the popular intellectual idols of his countrymen, give it an idealistically perfect setting, work out its inevitable consequences, and without a suspicion of preaching show by the evidence of facts, that it makes inevitably for ultimate unhappiness, and as a consequence is not only misleading but false.

M. Bourget has applied this method to the materialistic tenets that at present are in high favor in France. He paints a very paragon of the modern worshiper of science and scoffer at religion, endows him with wealth, position, success, mental power, force of character, domestic felicity, everything in fact that his heart could desire. But at the same time he makes him bitterly resentful of religious influences and sarcastically intolerant of the time-worn postulates of God and Divine Providence. Modern objections to everything that the surgeon's knife cannot lay bare lose nothing in their phrasing as they fall from his lips. The sufferings of Europe brought about by the carnage of battle emphasizes the assumed rectitude of his position. And then in the end his theories dismally collapse and drive him to a black and hopeless loneliness that fails to stand the test of physical pain and has its logical sequence in the futility of cowardly suicide. In contrast to this brilliant and richly endowed materialist, M. Bourget sets another character, inferior in every way, but possessed of the vivid faith that is still characteristic of the real Frenchman. In a few rapid words, that have the ring of actuality and truth, he shows how religious convictions give to a simple soldier the strength of sublime heroism, raise him to a plane of surprising altruism and resignation, soften the torture of physical anguish, and surround the consummation of his sacrifice of life for his country with a glow of heroism and happiness that make the scoffer's views and conduct of life seem not only a slander on the aspirations of mankind but also an obvious perversion of human destiny. The narrator of the story, himself an atheist, confesses himself troubled by the contrast but is not altogether convinced. The critics have identified his attitude with that of the author, but this is a mistake that would be possible only with those who are quite ignorant of M. Bourget's personal convictions and his method of writing.

The cultured, scoffing and "successful" materialist is by no means confined to France. Since the war began his voice has been heard often in our own country. He will not listen to a sermon or read a lecture, but his convictions can sometimes be shaken by the perusal of such a finely conceived and adroitly insinuated apologetic as M. Bourget has given us in "Le Sens de la Mort." Catholics would do well to leave such excellent books in the way of their unbelieving friends.

LITERATURE

The Irish Insurrectionary Poets

THE three poets who were foremost to sign and foremost to take arms to assert Ireland's Declaration of Independence had each a vision of nationality that could not be expressed in a proclamation, no matter how nobly that proclamation might be worded. With Padraic Pearse that vision was the revival of a chivalry in Ireland, the renaissance of the heroic age of Celtic history when, as he wrote, the greatest honor was for the hero who had the most child-like heart, for the king who had the largest pity, for the poet who visioned the truest image of beauty. All his plays and stories were about children and about saints. He was, perhaps, the one layman in West Europe who could have written with perfect simplicity and reverence a Passion Play. Not only did he write one, but with the help of his pupils and the staffs of his two schools, St. Enda's and St. Ita's, he had it produced at the Abbey Theater during Easter, five years ago.

He was grave, and if it were not for his kindliness and his humor Padraic Pearse would have appeared as a somber young man. His head was always slightly bent as though in deep but never anxious reflection. His ideas were so composed that when he addressed you in conversation parts of what he said might go into essays or lectures. He talked programs. But nothing in his speech was dry or pedantic, so much enthusiasm, grave enthusiasm indeed, was in all he said. He never spoke unkindly nor even slightingly of any person. Neither did his brother, the even gentler William Pearse who was shot with him. He was first of all a Christian man. Although he was a fervent Catholic, and although Gaelic was the culture he always looked to, his father was an Englishman who had been a Protestant.

Eight years ago he decided to retire from the editorship of the Gaelic League weekly An Cleideamh Soluis and put into practice his ideas of an Irish national education. He took a big dwelling-house in a suburb of Dublin, Cullenswood House, Rathmines, where the historian Lecky once lived, and opened there a secondary school for boys, Sgoil Fanna or St. Enda's. The school was to be bi-lingual: that is to say, it was to give instruction through Irish as well as through English. The whole atmosphere of the school was to be Gaelic. On its formal side St. Enda's was to give intermediate education and prepare students for entrance into the universities. Two years later he turned Cullenswood House into a girls' school Sgoil Idé or St. Ita's, and brought St. Enda's into the country, into a big eighteenth-century mansion with extensive grounds known as The Hermitage, Rathfarnham.

After he took up teaching he connected all his literary efforts with the schools. One year he produced an heroic pageant "Cuchullain" and another year a little religious play "Iosagan" (Jesukin). In 1911 his Passion Play was produced. A year later he published his single book of verse "Suantraidhe agus Goltraidhe" (Sleep Songs and Sorrow Songs) written in the language of the West Connacht parish where he often lived. He had begun to put together in the pages of the Irish Review an anthology of poetry in the Irish language, making his own translations.

"I am ready. For years I have waited and prayed for this day. We have the most glorious opportunity that has ever presented itself of really asserting ourselves. Such an opportunity will never come again. Will we be freemen, or are we content to remain as slaves, and idly watch the final extermination of the Gael?" He wrote these words in an article published just before the insurrection. There spoke the one who would walk steadily toward martyrdom. Pearse was a man of supreme value to Ireland. But he was one who, when lives had to be ventured, would make the nearest approach to death. He was a mystic, and for him a cause would become a call. He would not spare himself and he would not spare those who went with him. He was in truth, the very type of the implacable idealist. Like the other two poets executed he has left a poem that might stand for his epitaph: "To Death" is its title and it has thus been translated by his friend Thomas MacDonagh:

I have not gathered gold;
The fame that I won perished;
In love I found but sorrow,
That withered my life.

Of wealth or of glory
I shall leave nothing behind me
(I think it, O God, enough!)
But my name in the heart of a child.

Thomas MacDonagh, perhaps, had not a single vision of the renascent Ireland. He had a vision of the maker of the renascent Irish state: the soldier-statesman who would be instructed by the philosophic poet. Those who saw him in his academic robe and noted his flow of speech and his tendency to abstractions might have carried away an image of one of those adventurous students who disputed endlessly in a medieval university. But MacDonagh was as far from being a pedant as was Pearse. He was a wonderfully good comrade, an eager friend, a happy-hearted companion. He had abundance of good spirits and a flow of wit and humor remarkable even in a Munster man. He had too an intimate knowledge of the humors of popular life in the country and the country town which he never put into his writing. He was born in Cloughjordan, a town in County Tipperary, where his father and mother were teachers in primary schools. He was trained by a Religious Order, and became a novice in his youth. He was a teacher in a college in Kilkenny and later in Fermoy, and it was while in the former place that he took up the study of Irish. Afterwards he went to the Arran Islands and to the Irish-speaking districts of Munster and made himself fluent in the language. In 1901 and 1902 he published two books of poems, "Through the Ivory Gate" and "April and May."

Just before Pearse opened his school MacDonagh came to Dublin to look round him. He had written a play, "When the Dawn is Come," and wanted to have it produced in the Abbey Theater, which was then under the brief direction of J. M. Synge. The scene is laid in a revolutionary Ireland of the future, and it is the tragedy of a leader whose master-idea baffled his followers. MacDonagh had joined the staff of St. Enda's when this play was produced. His great interest then was poetry. He knew poetry well in English, French, Latin and Irish and was drawn to the classical poets, to Catullus, Dante and Racine. After he came to Dublin the poetry he wrote was more personal, "Songs of Myself" and "Lyrical Poems" being the titles of his two subsequent volumes.

A poet, with a bent toward abstractions, a scholar with a leaning toward philology: these were the aspects Thomas MacDonagh showed when he expressed himself in letters. But what was fundamental in him rarely went into what he wrote. That fundamental thing was an eager search for something that would have his whole devotion. His dream was always of action, of a man dominating a crowd for a great end. The historical figures that appealed straight to him were the Gracchi and the Irish military leader of the seventeenth century, Owen Roe O'Neill. In the lives of these three there was the drama that appealed to him: the thoughtful man become a revolutionist. Many things Thomas MacDonagh said and wrote were extraordinarily prophetic of his own end. Such a prophecy, for example, is in "Wishes for My Son:"

God to you may give the sight
And the clear undoubting strength
Wars to knit for single right,
Freedom's war to knit at length,
And to win, through wrath and strife
To the sequel of my life.

Joseph Plunkett had a vision of an Ireland filled with the martyr's defiance and the martyr's devotion. He has recorded that vision in "Our Heritage," which I consider the finest poem of Irish national defiance:

This heritage to the race of Kings:
Their children and their children's seed
Have wrought their prophecies indeed
Of terrible and splendid things.

The hands that fought, the hearts that broke
In old immortal tragedies,
These have not failed beneath the skies,
Their children's heads refuse the yoke.

And still their hands shall guard the sod
That holds their fathers' funeral urn.
Still shall their hearts volcanic burn
With anger of the Sons of God.

No alien sword shall earn as wage
The entail of their blood and tears,
No shameful price for peaceful years
Shall ever part this heritage.

The family of Joseph Mary Plunkett had a proud memory, the memory of martyrdom, for the last priest martyred in England, the Venerable Oliver Plunkett was of their blood. Joseph Plunkett was a mystic, but a militant mystic. The title he chose for his book of poems was "The Circle and the Sword" and the eternal circle and the destroying sword were the symbols he always had in his mind. The strongest of the new Irish patriotic poems, and the ones charged with the greatest intensity of Irish Catholic faith were written by this young man.

PADRAIC COLUM.

REVIEWS

The Irish Orators: a History of the Irish Fight for Freedom. By CLAUDE C. BOWERS. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

Mr. Bower may not be of Celtic ancestry, but in this volume he has described with enthusiasm the long contest for Irish liberty. The events of each phase in the struggle are grouped about a figure whose personality dominates the scene. Thus the Volunteer movement is the setting for the chapter on Henry Flood, then follows a description of Grattan's famous campaign, his temporary success and ultimate failure. The pages about Grattan and those dealing with O'Connell and Parnell are the best in the volume, and good extracts from the orators' speeches add interest to the narrative. The author seems to hold with Carlyle that "The history of the world is the history of the great men who lived in it," so Ireland's orators are linked with the history of Irish oppression. That perhaps explains why Burke and Sheridan find no place in this volume. The youthful earnestness of Emmet and Meagher inspires the author with great enthusiasm, and an account of the progress of the Home Rule movement since Parnell's time brings this attractive book to a conclusion. J. F. M.

Travels in the American Colonies. Edited under the Patronage of the Colonial Dames of America, by NEWTON D. MERENESS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $3.00.

Some of these "Journals" as they are called, will be of great interest to students of history; others are of no importance, and one of them at least is suspicious; D'Artaquiette's or D'Artaquette's account of his journey up the Mississippi is interesting from the fact that he had been sent out as a commissioner some years before to report on Bienville's administration at Mobile. That was in 1710, whereas the "Journal" now published is dated 1722. He is not the D'Artaquette who was burned at the stake with the Jesuit Father Senat on the Tombigbee River in 1736. Probably he was the father of the hero. His journey led him up the Mississippi and he jots down scrupulously the events of each day, nearly always beginning with "after Holy Mass by the Jesuit Father Boulanger." Unfortunately there is no Jesuit "Father Boulanger," either on the official list which we have before us, or in any of the seventy-three volumes of Thwaites "Relations." Oglethorpe's attack on St. Augustine makes good reading. So also the very extended journey of Lord Adam Gordon, in 1764, through the West Indies and the American Colonies. Among other bits of information readers will find that he "visited the Indian Mission of St. Regis where a Jesuit and one French family resided with the natives." But Shea tells us (Colonial Times, p. 618) that the Mission was destroyed by fire before the surrender of Quebec, that is, some years prior to the noble Lord's arrival. It is noteworthy that the founder and last Superior of the Mission was the Jesuit Father Mark Anthony Gordon, probably a relative of his Lordship.

Dr. Berkenhout, who had been sent out to the Colonies in 1778 for secret service, tells us that he was arrested in Philadelphia and locked up. He "traveled from Trenton with three rebel officers who were Irishmen: Quin, King and Power," and he asserts that "the rebel army consists chiefly of Irish transports, and of Officers from that country." This will not be welcome news to the Colonial Dames of America, nor will they preserve their equanimity when he describes the members of the Continental Congress as "unpolished, illiterate, poor and of no character." The "Journal of Antoine Bonnefoy," with all respect to the distinguished editor, ought to be called the "Journal of Antoine Mauvaisefoi." It is suspiciously like some of the "Relations" in the Margry Collection, and has all the appearance of having been manufactured in France and palmed off as genuine, as was done with the stories purporting to be from La Salle, Tonti, Joutel and others. This one centers around an alleged German-French Jesuit, named Pribert or Pierre Albert, who was sent out "to alienate the Cherokees from the English," and incidentally to establish a great Socialist colony, "an unbridled community," says the editor in his preface, where sex-promiscuity would be the attractive feature.

Now there is no Pribert or Pierre Albert on any Jesuit list of missionaries or emissaries in America; and no Jesuit anywhere or at any time who can be conceived as connected with any such abominable scheme. Moreover, this Bonnefoy, we are told, on the heading of the "Journal," was the "engagé of the Sieur Chauvin dit Joyeuse," and to him is attributed the authorship of this amazing story. Every one knows that an engagé means an ignorant, uneducated backwoodsman hired as a trapper, a fighter or a canoeman. Evidently for such an individual, an elaborate literary work like the "Journal" in question would be beyond his reach. On the other hand, as he was an engagé of the Sieur Chauvin dit Joyeuse, some one may have done it for fun. Chauvin is the old French name for Calvin, and Joyeuse means a merry-making woman. The combination of the masculine and the feminine in the title of the Sieur is at least a little odd. T. J. C.

Because I Am a German. By HERMAN FERNAU. $1.00; The First Seven Divisions. By CAPTAIN ERNEST HAMILTON. $1.50; Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper. By CHRISTIAN MALLET. $1.00; German Atrocities: an Official Investigation. By J. H. MORGAN, M.A. $1.00. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

They Shall Not Pass. By FRANK H. SIMONDS. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.00.

This is a batch of pro-Ally war-books. The first is largely an analysis and defense of "J'Accuse," an anonymous volume that has been widely discussed. The latter part of Mr. Fernau's volume, however, is a plea for universal democracy. He well says that "In the twentieth century there ought no longer, under any circumstances, to be two morals—one for the people at large, and the other for the State and its princes"; he vehemently protests against a few individuals being allowed to plunge the world into war; and he maintains that, "The 'dignity' of Austria, the 'prestige' of Germany, the 'honor' of France, the 'world-power' of England, and other such costly and quite vague and intangible notions, may be worth a great deal, a very great deal, but they are not worth the peace and tranquillity of Europe." The author drags in that stale and silly comparison of "the Prussian system" with "Vaticanism."

Captain Hamilton undertakes to describe in detail the military operations of England's regular army during the first three months of the war, from Mons to Ypres. In that time the men who originally formed "The First Seven Divisions" practically disappeared and have been replaced by Kitchener's recruits. Military students will doubtless find the book of more interest than will the general reader, for there is little variety in the narrative. Four good maps are inserted. Christian Mallet's book is an interesting account of the experiences of a French dragoon in the European war, from the time of mobilization to the attack on Loos. In graphic yet simple style the author, with the aid of his diary, which he seems to have kept assiduously, tells the story of the struggle as he and his comrades saw it. They constituted a kind of flying column of cavalry. Often out of touch with headquarters, they went hither and thither, not knowing at times how the tide of battle was running, but always doing their share for the honor of France.

With the leave of President Poincaré, Mr. Frank H. Simonds, whose earlier books on the war are so readable, entered the seething crater of Verdun and then sent home to the New York Tribune vivid pictures of what he saw, and these papers have now been gathered into a little volume. General Pétain and the "new Frenchman" are strikingly described, and the reader is disabused of any false notions he may have about the nature and appearance of Verdun, for it is neither a "fortress" nor a "gateway" now, but a French salient of which the possession is of moral rather than military importance. The author compares Verdun with Gettysburg, but somewhat prematurely, it would seem, for the battle of Verdun is raging still. W. D.

The Life of Père Joyard. By ANDRÉ DURAND, S.J. Translated by a Sister of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary. With a Preface by CARDINAL DE CABRIÈRES (Bishop of Montpellier). Foreword to the English Edition by SYDNEY SMITH, S.J. London: Burns & Oates, Limited. 7s. 6d.

Père Henri Joyard, S.J., was a well-known French missioner who died at Canterbury, England, after nearly forty years of activity as a laborer in God's vineyard. From one end of France to the other, from Belgium to the Alps and the Pyrenees he gave innumerable sermons, missions and retreats and ministered to the spiritual needs of all classes of people. This biography, which is written quite in the modern manner by an admiring fellow-Jesuit, has been well translated, and will give the reader a good idea of the work the Society has been doing in France during the last thirty years or more. Particularly interesting are the chapters describing Père Joyard's early years. There are good sketches of his father who was a captain of artillery, and of his pious mother who died when Henri was thirteen, leaving his youth "without sunshine." Like a very human boy, however, he neglected his studies, threatened with vengeance an offensively exemplary cousin who had a "Jesuitical look" about him, and he just escaped being expelled from the school he attended. But Henri took his B.A. with honor, and in 1852, when seventeen, astonished everybody by entering the novitiate at Avignon.

The average Jesuit's period of studies offers a biographer little material and young Joyard's years of formation were no exception to the rule. Ordained in 1867, and making his third probation at Tronchiennes, Belgium, while the Franco-Prussian war was going on, he went the following year to Lyons, where he began his life-work as a preacher and director. It was to the Association of Christian Mothers that many of his best discourses were delivered, and the author gives a good summary of the preacher's success in that field. In 1888 Père Joyard was made the head of a community of young Fathers, who received from him a two years' training in sacred oratory. A large portion of the volume is filled with extracts from the sermons, letters and "light-books" of Père Joyard which will give readers a good idea of his method of preaching and directing. The subject of this biography was superior of the residence at Grenoble in 1880 when the Government broke into the house and dispersed the community, and some twenty years later, when a still fiercer persecution began, he went into exile with his fellow-Jesuits, celebrated his golden jubilee in 1902 and died two years later in osculo Domini. W. D.

Shakespearean Studies. By Members of the Department of English and Comparative Literature in Columbia University. Edited by BRANDER MATTHEWS and ASHLEY HORACE THORNDIKE. New York: Columbia University Press. $2.25.

The papers in this volume were prepared, says the prefatory note, by the Professors of the Department of English and Comparative Literature in Columbia University, as the contribution of this institution to the tercentenary of Shakespeare's death. The scholarly writers have made no effort to conform their essays to a general plan or to harmonize conflicting opinions. The papers cover a wide field and bring the reader into some untrodden bypaths of Shakespearean research. Brander Matthews writes of "Shakespearean Stage Traditions," Thomas Baker studies "Shakespeare in the Schools," a review of "American Editors of Shakespeare" is given by Harrison Ross Steeves, while the "Reality and Inconsistency in Shakespeare's Characters," is fully exposed by Ernest Hunter Wright. Individual characters of the great dramatist are analyzed in the "Romeo and Juliet" of John Erskine, in the "Parolles" of George Philip Krapp, and in "The Character of Henry V. as Prince and King," by John William Cunliffe. These papers and the others contained in the volume present novel viewpoints, are very interesting and marked by thorough research, clearness of exposition and style. The history of American Shakespearean scholarship, as Harrison Ross Steeves says, interests Americans for other than merely patriotic reasons. "It is a valuable record of the growth of our literary needs and critical views, and an index of the development of scholarly purpose generally."

Every reader of Shakespeare has been puzzled at the inconsistencies and contradictions met with in certain characters of the immortal plays. One classical instance is to be found in the character of Hamlet. So far scholars and critics have found no satisfactory "formula" for him. Ernest Hunter Wright aptly says in his fine paper, "Reality and Inconsistency in Shakespeare's Characters," that we are still, after three centuries, with no sure key to the character of the princely Dane. And yet: "We are not the poorer for it. Hamlet is just as real to us and just as fascinating, as if we had found a perfect formula for him; perhaps more so." The volume would have gained in completeness if an essay or two had been added on those vital and essential qualities of Shakespeare's genius and art which have made him of all poets, ancient or modern, the keenest and almost infallible interpreter of human nature and of the countless moods and passions that sway the hearts of men. J. C. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The latest book in Madame Forbes's "Standard-bearers of the Faith" series, the previous numbers of which have been favorably noted in AMERICA, is "The Life of St. Paul" (Herder, $0.30). Following the Acts and the Epistles, the author writes a vivid and dramatic narrative of the great Apostle's career from the time he held the garments of those who stoned St. Stephen until the day of his martyrdom in Rome. These little lives deserve a wide circulation.—"Memoirs of Sister Mary of Mercy of Kéruel, Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd, 1880-1910. Taken from the French Life. Published at Angers, 1913. By M. A. M." (Herder, $1.10), is the complete title of an edifying biography. Juliette Kéruel did not live very long after she had taken the vows of a Shepherdess, but like St. Stanislaus improved her time so well that she died with her hands full of good works.

The boomerang that has recently hit the investigators of New York's State Board of Charities makes seasonable the eulogy of the late Thomas M. Mulry which is printed in the Catholic Mind for June 8. Father Francis J. Lamb tells how eager that lamented Vincentian was to promote every cause inspired by true charity for the poor and helpless. As the pagan sociologists of our day refuse to recognize the value of the Church's Sacraments as safeguards of chastity, Father Blakely's paper on "The Way of the Good Shepherd" is full of light both for these earthy-minded "uplifters" and for those unfortunate Catholics who are infected with their heresy. "Twentieth-Century 'Science,'" the last paper in the number, is Father Richard H. Tierney's refutation of the theories about the "missing link," that radical evolutionists are now expounding to "the man in the street."

"Jaunty in Charge" (Dutton, $1.35), the latest novel of Mrs. George Wemyss, whose name, as all AMERICA's readers are, of course, aware, rhymes with Reims, is a delightful story. Jaunty was a butler, yet not exactly a butler either, to whom "She" when dying had entrusted, he thought, the bringing up of her two little girls. That would have proved too formidable an undertaking even for Jaunty, but happily the entire village of Panslea came to his help. When Sally was eight she used to pray: "O God, make bad people good and good people nice"; a petition that for simplicity and comprehensiveness could hardly be excelled. But when she reached eighteen she prayed: "O God, give me romance, and don't let me marry the curate with ebony hair-brushes and without opposition." That prayer was granted. Pamela, Sally's elder sister who is described as "a delicious thing to live with—it's soft music all the time," had her romance, too. The conversations are so witty and clever that they couldn't possibly take place except in books, and the noble character of Jaunty is finely drawn.

In his contribution to a recent symposium the editor of the Atlantic Monthly remarked that he habitually thinks of those who write for his magazine "as representing the guests at a dinner party. . . . I do not care to ask anybody whose words do not seem to me worth listening to or whose manners are out of place in company." That ought to be a good rule for an editor. But is it not sometimes honored in the breach by Mr. Ellery Sedgwick himself? For instance, some of the guests who sat at the Atlantic's June feast must have felt like rising hastily and excusing themselves when Bouck White and Ellen Key were ushered in. The author of the first article in the current Atlantic also displays manners "that are out of place in good company." An unblushing plagiarist, as the editor confesses with tears, has likewise found a place at the Atlantic's board. He was discovered too late to put out.

"The Conquest" (Lippincott, $1.25) achieved by the "hero" of Sidney L. Nyburg's recent novel was not an act of self-conquest; for he proves an unfaithful husband and the author seems to find nothing reprehensible in that. It is the story of a selfish lawyer's career.——"Chapel" (Doran, $1.35), by Miles Lewis, tells how wealth, influence and social prominence were won by a Welsh family. The portraits of Josiah Chapel and his son "Griff" are well painted, but the story is spun out too long.———Grace Livingston Hill Lutz's "The Finding of Jasper Holt" (Lippincott, $1.25) unquestionably has a woman for its author. It would have made a better short-story.——In "The Dark Forest" (Doran, $1.35), Hugh Walpole undertakes to interpret for his countrymen the soul of Russia. The chief characters belong to a Russian field-hospital to which two Englishmen are attached. As a war-story writer Mr. Walpole is hardly at his best.——"The Round-About" (Doran, $1.25), by J. E. Buckrose, is a rather prosaic story of middle-class life in an English village during the past generation.

James Willard Schultz, the author of "Blackfeet Tales of Glacier National Park" (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.00) married an Indian maiden, lived for years the Indian's life, and on a recent visit to the scenes of former adventures jotted down the tales the Red Men told him. "The Woman Who Earned a Man's Name" and "The Story of the First Horse" are especially worthy of mention, and photographs of striking beauty increase the book's attractiveness. The author pays Father De Smet a gracious tribute, but volunteers the information that "To me, all religions are nothing more than the codified superstitions of the ages."——Marius Lyle's novel, "Unhappy in Thy Daring," (Putnam, $1.35) describes through 501 pages the dull married life of a horse-loving Irish woman and ends with a sordid seduction.—— If the reader is ready to strain the probabilities considerably he will enjoy "Come Out of the Kitchen," (Century, $1.25) Alice Duer Miller's cleverly-written story of a Southern beauty who acts as cook for the young bachelor who had unwittingly rented her house.

The theme, the meter and the word-painting combine to give a distinctive beauty to "The Garden Child," a poem which recently appeared in the Outlook:

Once in my childhood I knew a small garden
Shut in by gray pickets and crowded with grass;
Old flowers grew in it, clove pinks and white lilies,
And moss roses choked up the path with their mass.

It lay all alone in a curve of a river
Where little gray boats floated by on the tide;
No dwelling was near it, no pathway led to it,
And the harsh river grasses crept up on each side.

Speedwell and lavender, small brown chrysanthemums,
Mixed in great tangles where myrtle ran wild,
And sweetly mysterious, safe though unguarded,
Lay hid in a corner the grave of a child.

Often I wondered if that child had played there,
Played there as I, twining wreaths for my hair;
When the pickets were white and the flowers were tended,
And no little grave hid its mystery there.

Who were the people who once had lived near there,
Making the wilderness bloom like a rose;
Who left like a dream, leaving nothing behind them,
But the grave of a child in a small garden close?

Inquiries regarding the identity of Aline Kilmer, the author of the poem, elicited from Mr. Joyce Kilmer the information that "after a prolonged and difficult investigation" he discovered that the lady is: "the granddaughter of a Catholic; the mother of four Catholics; a convert to the Church; and the wife of a humble Papistical poet."

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
Poems of War and Peace. By Robert Underwood Johnson. $1.00.

The Boston Music Company, Boston:
The Musical Education of the Child, Some Thoughts and Suggestions for Teachers, Parents and Schools. By Stewart MacPherson.

The Devin-Adair Co., New York:
Yonder? By Rev. T. Gavan Duffy, P.F.M. $1.25.

Dodd, Mead & Company, New York:
New Wars for Old. By John Haynes Holmes. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Elements of Style: an Introduction to Literary Criticism. By David Watson Rannie, M.A.; The Way of All Flesh. By Samuel Butler. With an Introduction by William Lyon Phelps. $1.50.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
The Daughter of the Storage. By William Dean Howells. $1.35; The Border Legion. By Zane Grey. Illustrated by Lillian E. Wilhelm. $1.35.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
St. Catherine of Siena, Her Life and Times. By C. M. Antony. $1.80; The Life of Saint Paul. By F. A. Forbes. $0.30; A Conference to Religious Engaged in Caring for the Sick. By Rev. Ferreol Girardey, C.SS.R. $0.05; The Memory of Our Dead. By Herbert Thurston, S.J. $0.80; Memoirs of Sister Mary of Mercy Kéruel, Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd. By M. A. M. $1.10; Meagher of the Sword. Edited by Arthur Griffith. With a Preface, Appendices, Index and Illustrations. $1.10; A Good Third. By Rev. T. A. Fitzgerald, O.F.M. $1.10.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Dante. By Jefferson Butler Fletcher, A.M. $0.50; Poland. By W. Alison Phillips, M.A. $0.50; Bergson and Religion. By Lucius Hopkins Miller. $1.50; Alcohol and Society. By John Koren. $1.25.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Nationality in Modern History. By J. Holland Rose. $1.25; What Is Coming? A European Forecast. By H. G. Wells. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Night Cometh. By Paul Bourget. Translated from the French by G. Frederic Lees. $1.35.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
With Americans of Past and Present Days. By J. J. Jusserand. $1.50.

EDUCATION

A Thought for Our Times

ONE of the many little ironies of our bustling modern life is that few of us are alert enough to live it. Our activity along industrial and intellectual lines has two very peculiar and contrary effects. On the one hand, it demands high moral alertness, if we wish to lead upright lives. On the other, it tends to deaden our moral perceptiveness and to make us irresponsible. Thus, for example, when the young business man enters his office in the morning, he knows that in the swirl of the day's activity, issues will not always be clear, that good and evil will not be in sharp contrast. If he is "to keep the commandments," he will need a large available stock of moral efficiency; for his very preoccupation with his affairs will tend to make him let moral considerations slip. He will have no time to consider each case elaborately; he will not experience swift retribution each time he surrenders a principle, and, if conscience does assert itself, modern life will supply an abundance of "shock-absorbers" and palliatives in the shape of distorted moral principles and soothing material comforts. So in time he can become a hardened offender without experiencing much discomfort in the process.

MEETING THE DIFFICULTY

The young business man is not unique in experiencing this sort of thing. The same, in different forms and measures, occurs to doctor, lawyer, and laborer, to stenographer, to trained nurse, to everybody that faces the conditions of modern life. It is not precisely that they disrespect God or defy Him or resist Him; rather, they fail to consider Him at all. When confronted with an impulse to dishonesty or an impulse to generosity, they will be likely to act in either case with reference only to some vague concept of duty which will mean nothing more than "saving appearances." Thus it is that all sorts of improprieties are thoughtlessly followed, dishonest habits thoughtlessly acquired, calls to a higher life thoughtlessly dismissed, and lives thoughtlessly ruined. Thus, too, it is that the strenuous modern life inhibits the very moral alertness that it claims to exact.

How are we to meet the difficulty? We are told that we must learn to know our temptations; that we have absolute commandments and moral precepts in plenty to help us. But we may reply that our greatest difficulty lies precisely in applying moral precepts to that confused welter of problems which confronts us day by day. We need some method of working our moral precepts into our lives. We need some principle so strong and so deeply ingrained that it will enable the will to act promptly and uncompromisingly on every occasion.

THE SENSE OF RESPONSIBILITY

Such a principle, it seems to me, is to be found in what we may call a deep abiding sense of responsibility. Responsibility is indeed a heavy word, and responsibility must seem a heavy armor, too cumbersome by far for youthful David. A writer, popular just now, says of duty, "I don't think children should know the meaning of the word. . . . They ought to do everything from love." Here danger lies. Certainly, love is the first and greatest commandment, and children, as everyone else, ought to do everything from love. But love, as distinct from duty, often proves delusive and ineffectual. There are times when love of right is feeble and vague. It hardly seems like love at all. If by "love" we understand love divorced from the idea of duty, then a sharp temptation will inevitably conquer many of us. Few, it must be feared, have vision clear enough and quick enough to discern, in times of stress, the only object really worthy of love. When the forbidden fruit is delectable, that is to say, when we are really tempted, we need some peremptory "must." We must act from a sense of duty. But duty too, if looked upon as a grim, fateful necessity, will soon lose its efficacy. Duty and love must be united; our motive must be "duty loved of love." This is why I think responsibility expresses well the peculiar motive power we need today.

LOVE AND DUTY

A sense of responsibility, as I conceive it here, is simply a sense of duty towards one we love. In return for all God's gifts, and chiefly for Himself, we love Him. This in itself begets a sense of duty. Yet our duty is absolute. It does not lapse, when we choose to cease loving God. We are essentially His creatures; we must serve whether we will or no. It is wise and necessary to recognize both elements of this sense of responsibility; for, though love is more perfect and beautiful, duty is often more practical, and in certain moments of weakness, only the sharp goad of duty will save us from betraying our love.

If this principle is to be as promptly available as our modern bustle demands, its application must be a second nature, a "secondary automatic," as the psychologists say. We must apply it spontaneously, instinctively. We must be "subconscious" of it always. When occasion demands, it must come to our rescue without thought. Of course it is never too late to begin acquiring this source of motive power, but if it is to become in the fullest sense an element of our natural character, it must be taught throughout childhood, so that when childhood is past the young man and woman shall have learned to teach themselves its higher applications. It must be taught part by part as the child's intelligence allows. It must be applied day by day to the problems of the young life; it must be expanded as the youthful mind expands; and when the youthful will rebels the "active sanction" must be called in. In its failure to invoke this sanction the weakness of much modern education is found. Moreover when the child is old enough to understand he should be shown that his responsibility is not an artificial appurtenance, or a temporary burden, but a permanent and natural element of life, as natural to the moral life as the glow of health is to the physical.

THE SCHOOL OF THE HOME

To train children in this principle is the duty and privilege primarily of the mother, in the school of the home. Through that wondrously sweet and direct intimacy that exists between her and her child, an intimacy that seems to transcend psychological analysis, she can work it into the very fabric of his life. Training him to be morally alert, to be upright under God's surveillance, to be on his honor with regard to God, she is putting into his life a power which, while simple enough for the needs of ordinary Christian goodness, can be developed to meet the demands of the highest asceticism. And thus she is giving him a force universally available against temptation. It is a motive, too, which seems to me particularly suited to our times, for it adapts itself to our love of liberty without emancipating us from God. It softens the austere stimulus of duty by its appeal to love, and quickens the flagging ardor of love with the peremptory spur of duty. It is consistent with that largeness of view to which our increasing knowledge may entitle us, and with the humility that our essential creaturehood demands.

FRANCIS J. YEALY, S.J.

ECONOMICS

What Is Economic Socialism?

THERE is perhaps more need than ever to ask the question at the head of this article. An impression prevails that Socialism is something entirely vague and indefinable. We notice that hardly two authorities on this subject fully agree on their definition. At the same time the statement is often repeated, as it was made years ago by Berger before the United States Congress, that there is "only one kind of Socialists." How then can we arrive at the truth?

To formulate a correct definition of Socialism we must begin by stripping it of all that does not distinctively belong to it. The demands for fair wages, for reasonable hours and conditions of work, for the abolition of oppressive child and woman labor, for civic regeneration and the countless measures that may be conducive to it, are not in any sense Socialism, though found inserted in Socialist programs. They are, on the contrary, the first postulates of Christian Democracy, based upon the teachings of the Catholic Church. The ideal state of society to which they would lead has been realized in the past, and can be realized again in the future, only where her teachings are most perfectly obeyed.

The fact that Socialism has taken up these reforms, destroying their possibilities for the common good by its spirit of class-hatred, its tactics of gross exaggeration and its unprincipled appeals to the passions of men, cannot make them socialistic. They are, and will always remain, eminently Catholic. For proof of this statement we need only refer to the Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII "On the Conditions of the Working Classes."

DEFINING SOCIALISM

Striking out from the definition of Socialism these and similar items which the Church advocated long before Socialism put them into its program, and which today become the property of any social or political party which may wish to assume them, we find that there is but one plank essential to Socialism on its economic side. It is a compulsory socialization of the means of production and distribution, such as implies the working-class control of government. Omit all else and you still have economic Socialism. Omit this, and you can at the most have a class-conscious, radical program, but not Socialism.

It must be borne in mind, however, that we are speaking of Socialism on its economic side only. Considered as a popular movement and as a philosophy or humanitarian religion, there are still other earmarks by which it can be discerned, and which make it still more impossible of acceptance.

The Appeal to Reason quotes with satisfaction the following definition taken from the "Century Dictionary":

> Socialism is any theory or system of social organization which would abolish entirely, or in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it cooperative action; would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor and would make land and capital, as the instruments and means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community.

The first half of this definition is not distinctive of Socialism. Cooperative action in itself is not Socialism; it was practised in the Catholic Church centuries before Socialism came into existence. Similarly "the more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor" is the great aim of Christian Democracy as taught by Pope Leo XIII and insisted upon at all times within the Church. Only the very last words of this lengthy definition have any distinctive bearing upon Socialism; these describe it as a system which would "make land and capital, as the means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community." Even here, however, the idea of a compulsion that may be exercised according to the will of the majority must be added, to distinguish Socialism from other forms of voluntary moderate communism or cooperation like that proposed by Bishop Ketteler. The latter has been wrongly spoken of as Socialism because of this vagueness of thought and expression.

BLATCHFORD'S DEFINITION

The following detailed definition is given by the Socialist Robert Blatchford in his "Britain for the British":

> The root idea of Socialism means two things: (1) That the land and all the machines, tools, and buildings used in making needful things, together with all the canals, rivers, roads, railways, ships, and trains used in moving and sharing needful things, and all the shops, markets, scales, weights and money used in selling or dividing needful things, shall be the property of the whole people; (2) That the land, tools, machines, trains, rivers, shops, scales, money and all other things belonging to the people shall be worked, managed, divided and used by the whole people in such a way as the greater number of the whole people shall deem best.

How all these means of production and distribution, land and capital, are to come into the power of the Socialist State or Cooperative Commonwealth, whether by confiscation or other methods, is a point on which Socialists differ, though the right of confiscation is affirmed by their leaders. Competition of Socialist cooperative industries with capitalistically managed shops is often suggested, but can hardly be taken seriously. The principle generally accepted is that the people will themselves decide how to obtain control of land and capital, once they have come into power; and that, whatever their decision may be, it will be morally correct, for the majority can dispose as it pleases of all productive property now in the hands of capitalists.

SOCIALISM AND MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP

Socialization or common ownership of the means of production and distribution must moreover be carefully distinguished from municipal or government ownership. The latter is vested in the city or State, while the former is vested in the people. Municipal or government ownership, even though greatly developed, can at no point become Socialism. Only when the ownership itself passes from the city or government to the people can there be question of Socialism. A regrettable confusion exists here in the minds of the public and is constantly intensified by the loose or ignorant statements found in the public press.

THE CHANGEABLE PLANK

There is only one point of agreement therefore among Socialists in the economic field, only one plank in their social program: the socialization of the means of production and distribution. Yet even here the most extreme divergencies exist as to the greater or more restricted application of this socialization of land and capital. It is therefore a changeable plank which can be made to suit any emergency. Thus when there is question of winning over the small farmer it can be shortened at pleasure to allay all his natural fears. Politicians will not hesitate to hold out to him the hope that under Socialism he can still continue to cultivate his few acres as before. Even in such a diluted Socialism the farmer will not remain absolute owner of his land, since it will belong to the people and not to him any more than to his neighbor. The farmer would no longer be owner, but a public tenant, since land is in the strictest of all senses "productive property" and would belong to the whole people and be socially operated according to their good pleasure. Marvelous skill is shown by the political Socialist press in clouding over this plain fact.

THE EXTENT OF SOCIALIZATION

The consistent Socialist, who accepts his plank in its full significance, will listen to no such half measures as are introduced to win the good will of the small owners, from the farmer to the small shopkeeper. He will insist upon the absolute socialization of all the means of production and distribution, excepting such only as are limited to strictly private or family uses. The cleverness displayed in evading this issue is evident in the usual definitions that approach most closely to accuracy. Thus John M. Work defines Socialism as: "The collective ownership and control of those industries which are now used by the capitalists for the purpose of getting for themselves most of the earnings of the working masses." The essential question of the public ownership of land, as the chief means of production, is not even mentioned. Roland Sawyer's definition is more comprehensive, but still leaves a wide margin for private interpretation in the word "Social." He describes Socialism as: "the collective ownership and democratic management of all property, properly social."

The extent of this socialization, at whose definition the political Socialist prudently balks, will in any event, according to Socialist theory, depend upon the desire of the victorious Socialist majority, whose will in this matter will be law. Neither the small farmer nor the small shopkeeper nor the laborer himself can be given the slightest assurance of what the wish of the majority may be in regard to the extent of this socialization or the methods of carrying it out once the Socialist victory has been achieved.

"ONLY ONE KIND OF SOCIALISTS"

Socialism, on its economic side, can therefore be reduced to a single plank. No matter how widely divergent and how bitterly antagonistic Socialistic factions may be, they can all agree upon this. It can be briefly described as the more or less universal and compulsory socialization of the means of production and distribution, thus leaving scope for wide diversities of opinion. This is the essence of Socialism in every land, when considered merely as an economic system or theory, apart from the methods by which it is to be carried into effect. In practice, however, Socialism must be taken in the concrete, as a popular movement, with all its aims and tactics, which in themselves may not be distinguished from other movements equally opposed to the Church and the teachings of Christianity.

"Christian Democracy," wrote Pope Pius X in his Encyclical on "Christian Social Action," which is authoritative on this question, "ought to be understood in the sense already determined by authority, which is far removed from that of 'Social Democracy,' and is based on the principle of the Catholic faith and morality, especially on that of never attacking in any way the inviolable rights of private property."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A question of special importance to Catholic social workers is to be considered at the National Conference of Catholic Charities which will meet at the Catholic University, Washington, September 17-20. The founding of a national Catholic charities monthly is to be proposed. This plan has already been favorably received at a former conference and will, therefore, in all probability, be endorsed at the coming meeting. The contemplated magazine is intended to supplant the St. Vincent de Paul Quarterly, and is to be placed under the editorial direction of Dr. John A. Ryan. The usual order of conferences will be followed. Committees on families, social and civic activities, sick and defectives, and on children have been appointed. Besides the sectional meetings general conferences of interest to all the visitors will be held. Great good has been accomplished by these biennial conventions in the past. New inspiration is given to the workers and clearer knowledge imparted. The reports of the conferences form a valuable Catholic social literature.

The sum of $75,000 has been appropriated by the United States for the erection of a monument in honor of Francis Scott Key, the author of "The Star-Spangled Banner." The site chosen for the memorial is Fort McHenry, Baltimore, where the poet received the inspiration for his song. The design, selected by competition, and meeting with the approval of the Secretary of War, represents "an heroic figure of a half-clad man, playing a primitive musical instrument, intended to symbolize primitive music." This description of the monument, given in the local press, suggests the pertinent question asked by the Rochester Post Express: "Why should a memorial to an American patriot symbolize primitive music? We have produced some superb patriotism but very little primitive music of any consequence." However artistic the design may be in its execution, it certainly lends confirmation to the unflattering judgment passed on our public sculptures by Henry James when he said that sculptors never seem to be so much at a loss for intelligent inspiration as when designing a memorial for some public structure in our country.

Letters endorsing the Irish Relief Fund Committee have been written by the three American Cardinals who have, moreover, consented to become its Honorary Presidents. The Archbishops of San Francisco, Milwaukee, Philadelphia and St. Louis are Honorary Vice-Presidents and Archbishop Walsh of Dublin will cooperate with it. The American Committee, whose headquarters are at 5 Beekman Street, New York City, will personally take the fund to Ireland and supervise its distribution. The statement of its National Secretary, Mr. John D. Moore, says:

> Letters received in New York during the past three days tell of deplorable conditions in the Irish capital, and in the counties. Owing to the continuance of martial law the docks are idle, mills are closed and business houses are shut down, throwing out of work hundreds of men who have no means of supplying the wants of their families. Other sufferers are among the relatives of those who have been arrested and taken to England to await trial, and still others are the relatives of the men who died fighting.

Saturday, June 10, has been designated as Irish Relief Day. Madison Square Garden, the largest meeting place in New York City, has been engaged for the evening of that day, and it is predicted that a gathering of the Irish people such as the world has never seen under one roof will meet there that night.

"The work of Very Rev. Pietro Bandini, Tontitown, offers not only an example of perfect social service, but a practical solution to some of America's momentous questions," says the Outlook. In 1898 this energetic priest settled with twenty-six poor families upon a carefully-selected tract of land in the Ozark Mountains. Each family paid by instalments for the acres purchased by it, and Father Bandini indorsed the notes. His leadership carried the colonists successfully through the adversities of the first year, and today Tontitown stands as "the most practical solution to the immigrant problem which has yet been offered." It solves the urgent food question by intensive cultivation of the soil; the industrial problem, by diverting the immigrants from our overcrowded industries to our vast farmlands; and the problem of supporting these immigrants themselves, by supplying them with a comfortable livelihood:

> With forty acres one can, with a large family, become a man of means; but forty acres, Father Bandini insists, is all that one man can cultivate. Yet he refers to intensive cultivation—one of the most valuable lessons the immigrant can teach Americans. Two or three crops are always grown in the same season on the same soil, which also nourishes an orchard or vineyard (or both), vegetables being planted between rows of trees and vines. Each product is then utilized to its maximum. With fruit evaporators, canneries, cider and vinegar mills, the apple crops here have averaged $6 a barrel against the 60 cents received by American farmers of the vicinity. Pulp last run through the mill is then used as fertilizer. Utilization, indeed!

Most important of all, Father Bandini has solved the problem of preserving and perfecting in the hearts of our Catholic immigrants the Faith which they have brought with them from across the seas, and has made of them worthy and useful citizens. He even found time personally to teach the children in the school which he founded. Catholic societies and Catholic leaders should profit by the lesson and everywhere stimulate similar enterprises. They can render no better service to the Church, to their country and to the immigrants themselves.

A class of 150 was graduated this year from the medical department of Loyola University, Chicago. It is the largest graduating class but one in the medical schools of that city and the fifth largest in the United States. The school, under the control of the Jesuit Fathers, utilizes eighteen hospitals and three dispensaries, representing an outlay of over $8,000,000 and an annual expenditure of at least $2,000,000. It is believed that every member of the exceptionally large graduating class will be offered the advantage of an internship, and future classes will be guaranteed a place for hospital work. A year of such experience under expert specialists is of the utmost importance for the young graduate, but few schools are in a position to guarantee him this advantage. The special reason for the existence of medical schools under Catholic supervision is thus explained in the present instance:

> The principal objects which the Jesuits have in view in conducting medical schools is to give the future physician a thorough scientific training and correct ethical doctrine. All classes before entering upon the study of medicine must spend one or two years at the university in physics, chemistry and biology. With these scientific studies there is given a course in ethics and logic, where all the important problems which the future doctor will meet are discussed. In the senior medical class these ethical problems are repeated in the light of the studies which the student has pursued during his four medical years. It will thus be seen that the student is well equipped in the ethics of his profession.

Every student is afforded the opportunity of consulting at any time with the Father in charge, whose entire energy is devoted to the service of the medical department.

One of the consoling signs of the age in which we live, says the Ave Maria, is the marked development of a spirit of reverence toward the Mother of God. Nothing can be more evident even to the casual observer than the change which has been manifested by Protestants in this regard. As a memorable instance the cry of indignation is recalled which arose from Protestant lips when a notorious actress was scandalously to personate, in a Parisian theater, the Immaculate Mother of God. The London Telegraph wrote at the time:

> One need not be a Roman Catholic to understand the objections to this proposition. The Virgin Mother lives tenderly in the memories of all men, as the purest type of a high ideal, and her crowning sorrow has been the world's greatest tragedy in the traditions of nearly 2,000 years. The most vigorous asserter of secularism and free thought must respect the feelings of the Christian world on a subject so tender and so sacred in its majestic outlines. She lives in legend, she looks down on us from the canvas of the masters, and the greatest poets have brought their homage to her feet. . . . Voltaire threw dirt at Joan of Arc, but in this insult to the Virgin there is something far more than defamation of a national heroine: it is an outrage of the feelings of one-third of the human race.

In the truth that Mary is the Mother of God is contained, as in its kernel, the truth of Christianity. This fact is rightly brought home to our Protestant friends by the Ave Maria. If the Virgin Mary were not the Mother of God, then Christ were not God, and all our hope of redemption through Him were vain as an empty dream. Our faith indeed were merest folly. There were no choice left us but that which existed before the coming of the Saviour; the sole choice between Judaism and paganism. Intelligent Protestants, who firmly acknowledge the Divinity of Christ, cannot fail to perceive the conclusiveness of this argument, nor can they fail to draw from it the further consequence, that since Mary is the Mother of God she must likewise be honored with a veneration worthy of that dignity. "Mariolatry," as applied to the Church's devotion to her, is a word which ignorance of Catholic doctrine or darkest bigotry invented. The Church sees in Mary only a creature whom the Almighty has deigned to crown with the most exalted dignity that He Himself could bestow upon a purely human being, and to whom therefore, He has likewise accorded the intercessory power that such a mother may well possess with her son, when the Son is God.

The interest which the Catholic Church has always taken in scientific investigation is again strikingly manifested in the vast astronomical work undertaken by the Vatican observatory. Describing the Vatican Catalogue of Fixed Stars the New York Staats-Zeitung says:

> Recently the second volume of the astrographical catalogue, which is being edited by the Vatican observatory, has been published. The work is intended to include the photographs of all the stars visible in the heavens. For several years nineteen astronomers have been at work at this catalogue, twelve in Europe, one in Africa, and three each in America and Australia. Every photographed star was measured at least twice in order to determine its exact position. The volume just published gives the position of 30,042 stars which, together with the stars depicted in the first volume, make a collection of 56,440 stars. When the work has been completed it is expected that the position of 30,000,000 stars will be fixed on the photographic plates. This second volume, which contains all the stars of a certain section greater than stars of the eleventh magnitude, is the work of the director and vice-director of the Vatican observatory, the secretary, Pio Emanuelli, the director of the Oxford observatory, Turner, and the head of the observatory at Teramo, Cerulli. At the same time as the catalogue, the photographic plates have been published. Each of these contains thousands of stars.

The director of the Vatican observatory, the Rev. John G. Hagen, S.J., was engaged in the United States as head of the Georgetown observatory from 1888 to 1906. In the latter year he was called to fill his present important position at the Vatican.

The University of California Press has published an interesting study on the "Diurnal Variations in Memory and Association." The subjects of the experiments were college students. The general conclusions point to an increase in efficiency during the early morning hours, culminating in a maximum in the late forenoon. A fall in efficiency follows the lunch hour with a subsequent rise continuing until the middle of the afternoon, or a little later, and a final drop in the late afternoon. Numerous variations naturally exist among the individuals. A significant fact noted by the observer is that the hours of greatest efficiency are those at which fatigue, it would seem, should be very great. The words of Thorndike are quoted in this connection: "The feelings of fatigue, from what we know of them, thus seem to be a very poor symptom of the loss of ability." The drop in efficiency following the midday meal seems to be the most universal phenomenon, which the old-schoolmen express in the saying: Plenus venter non studet libenter. Earlier investigations, however, showed that efficiency in functions of the so-called "motor type" was quite high soon after lunch. "Such school subjects as drawing, painting, modeling, writing, manual arts and the like might be profitably pursued during the early afternoon hours." It is the author's opinion that the decline in mental efficiency at this period is not so obviously due merely to the meal, but may be largely accounted for by the cessation from work, so that high efficiency can be attained again only by another process of "warming up." The hour of resuming classes in the afternoon must depend upon the convictions entertained in this regard.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 10 } JUNE 17, 1916 { $3.00 A YEAR
WHOLE No. 375 } { PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE

Home News: The Chicago Conventions—The War: Bulletin, June 6, p. m.-June 13, a. m. France: President and Cardinal—Germany: Peace or the Sword. Great Britain: Kitchener's Death. Ireland: Bowen-Colthurst. Mexico: A Rotting Nation 221-224

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Charities Investigation: A School for Drudges—The Popes and the Jews—XLVII-The Young Man and Mechanical Engineering—Monsters and the Middle Ages—Among the French Wounded Soldiers.....225-232

COMMUNICATIONS

Shaw Once More—The Story of a Neglected Grave—A Legion of Defense.....233

EDITORIALS

Far Beyond the Type—The New York Journal on Hell—Suicides and the Cult of Minerva—The Wonder Grows—Enter the "Spectric Poet"—The Eye of the Davises.....234-236

LITERATURE

XXVIII—Mother Juliana's "Sixteen Revelations."

REVIEWS: A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico—Dante—The Life of William McKinley—Summula Philosophiæ Scholasticæ—The Romance of the Commonplace—The Magic of Jewels and Charms.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Idyls and Sketches"—"Halt! Who's There?"—"The Lightning Conductor Discovers America"—"The Border Legion"—"Union Portraits"—A Most Remarkable Conversion—"We"—"Victory in Defeat"—"The Daughter of the Storage and Other Things in Prose and Verse"—An Unknown Master and Other Stories."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....236-240

EDUCATION

Cliff Haven.....241

SOCIOLOGY

The Test of Criminal Responsibility....241-243

NOTE AND COMMENT

Discriminating Against Catholic Schools—Retreats for Laymen and Women—Open Air Production of Verdi's "Requiem Mass"—The "Dull" Washington—Bigotry Overreaching Itself in Florida—Thomas M. Mulry on the Ozanam Association—Statistics of Protestant Missions in Latin America.....243-244

CHRONICLE

Home News.—On June 10, Charles E. Hughes of New York, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, was nominated for President on the third ballot, by the Republican National Convention, at Chicago. For Vice-President, the Convention nominated Charles W. Fairbanks of Indiana. Mr. Hughes' resignation from the Supreme Court was at once accepted by President Wilson. In assuming the leadership of the party, Mr. Hughes said that he had not desired the nomination, but that "in this critical period of our national history, I recognize that it is [the party's] right to summon and my paramount duty to respond."

The Chicago Conventions

The party platform adopted on June 9, opens with a condemnation of the President's foreign policy which "has destroyed our influence abroad and humiliated us in our own eyes." "A firm, consistent and courageous foreign policy" can alone preserve peace and assure our place among the nations. The Republican party advises "the pacific settlement of international disputes and the establishment of a world court for that purpose." On our policy in Mexico, the platform offers the following comment:

> We deeply sympathize with the 15,000,000 people of Mexico, who, for three years, have seen their country devastated, their homes destroyed, their fellow-citizens murdered, and their women outraged by armed bands of desperadoes led by self-seeking, conscienceless agitators, who, when temporarily successful in any locality, have neither sought nor been able to restore order or establish and maintain peace.
>
> We express our horror and indignation at the outrages which have been and are being perpetrated by these bandits upon American men and women, who were or are in Mexico by invitation of the laws and of the Government of that country, and whose rights to security of person and property are guaranteed by solemn treaty obligations. We denounce the indefensible methods of interference employed by this Administration in the internal affairs of Mexico, and refer with shame to its failure to discharge the duty of this country as next friend to Mexico, its duty to other Powers who have relied upon us as such friend, and its duty to our citizens in Mexico, in permitting the continuance of such conditions, first, by failure to act promptly, and firmly, and, secondly, by lending its influence to the continuation of such conditions through recognition of one of the factions responsible for these outrages.
>
> We pledge our aid in restoring order and maintaining peace in Mexico. We promise to our citizens on and near our border, and to those in Mexico, wherever they may be found, adequate and absolute protection in their lives, liberty, and property.

Mr. Hughes' strictures on our Mexican policy are even more severe. Seventeen other topics are embodied in the platform. The Monroe Doctrine is affirmed as "essential to the present and future peace and safety" of the country; closer relations with the countries of Latin America are favored, and the retention of the Republican "Philippine policy" is advocated. A treaty "with Russia, as with other countries, that will recognize the absolute right of expatriation" and prevent discrimination on political, racial or religious lines, is approved. A national defense, "not only adequate, but thorough and complete, ready for any emergency," is a necessity, and provision must be made for "ample reserves." The Underwood Tariff act is condemned as "a complete failure in every respect," and a protective tariff "reasonable in amount, but sufficient to protect American labor and American industries" yet prevent monopolies, is pledged. The Republican party, believing in due governmental regulation of commerce, accuses the Democrats of failing to distinguish between "prosecution" and "persecution" of delinquent corporations, and of seeking to "involve the Government in business which should be left within the sphere of private enterprise."

A merchant marine, maintained by private capital, but encouraged by the Government through "liberal compensation" in return "for services actually rendered" is recommended. The party pledges itself to a Federal child labor law; a workman's compensation law, and an accident compensation law for Government employees. The extension of the suffrage to women is favored, but the right of each State to settle the question for itself is affirmed. The other sections of the platform deal with rural credits, rural free delivery, transportation, the national budget, national conservation and civil service reform.

The proposed coalition of the Republican and Progressive forces, each in convention in Chicago at the same time, ended in failure, and on June 10, the Progressive party nominated Theodore Roosevelt for President, and John M. Parker of Louisiana for Vice-President. Pending the acceptability of Mr. Hughes' policies (June 13), Mr. Roosevelt has refused the nomination. "If Mr. Hughes' statements, when he makes them, shall satisfy the National Committee that it is for the interests of the country that he be elected, they can act accordingly and treat my refusal as definite." Otherwise, the Committee will confer with Mr. Roosevelt to "determine on whatever action we may severally deem appropriate to meet the needs of the country."

The War.—There has been a marked increase in the violence of the artillery duels along the entire Belgian front; and between the British and German forces severe artillery engagements, followed by infantry assaults have been frequent. The Germans have captured the first-line British trenches in the village of Hooge and the British have attacked the German positions southeast of Ypres, but without success. Between the Vimy Ridge and La Bassée Canal, and near the Hohenzollern redoubt, sapping operations have ended favorably for the British. In the Argonne district the French have gained some slight advantage at Haute Chevauchée.

Bulletin, June 6, p. m.-June 13, a. m.

In the Verdun region the fighting has resulted in further gains for the Germans. West of the Meuse, on both sides of Mort Homme Hill, west and southwest of Hill 304, and near Chattancourt, both sides have been on the offensive, but the situation remains unchanged. East of the Meuse, the Germans increased the number and violence of their attacks on the line that runs from Caillette Wood to Damloup, and at last, after seven days of furious efforts, not only isolated Fort Vaux but later succeeded in carrying it by storm. The slopes, west and south of the fort, are still in the hands of the French. The Germans are now concentrating their attack on the section of the line that extends between Douaumont and Thiaumont farm, and that between Fort Vaux and Damloup. Most of the latter place is now held by the Germans.

Since the capture of Monte Cengio, the Austrians have made further gains on the Asiago Highlands, have taken Monte Sisemol and Monte Castel Gomberto, and have forced the Italians to withdraw to new positions east of Asiago and east of the Campomulo Valley. In the Lagarina Valley, in the Monte Pasubio district, between the Posina and Astico Rivers, south and southwest of Arsiero, and at many points between Asiago and the Brenta Rivers there have been battles, but the Italians have been able to check the Austrian advance except in the Asiago region. In Grecian Macedonia the Bulgarians and the French have clashed at Mount Kopo, the Bulgarians being forced to retire.

Along the Dvina the Germans have bombarded the Russian positions in the lake district south of Dvinsk, and, according to Berlin, have taken the village of Kuwana. In Volhynia, Galicia and Bukowina the Russian offensive has gathered momentum, and is exerting pressure on the Austrians from the Pripet to Rumania. Only meager details of the movement are at hand, but from official reports it is clear that it extends over a front of at least 250 miles, has been generally successful and at one point has driven back the Austrians more than thirty miles. The Austrians have been obliged to retire to new positions on the Ikwa and the Styr, and to evacuate Dubno. The Russians have recaptured Lutsk. Further south they have reached and, in several places, crossed the Strypa, and have advanced to the outskirts of Czernowitz. Petrograd claims that already 114,000 prisoners have been taken.

In Armenia the Turks have been on the offensive at Baiburt but have been repulsed. They have, however, driven the Russian center further east, for the Russian force, which last week was reported twelve miles east of Mamachatun, is still retreating toward Erzerum. At Khanikin, in Persia, near the border of Mesopotamia, where the Russians and Turks have met, the fighting has resulted in a victory for the Turks who have driven back the Russians to Kasr-i-Shirin.

The German Admiralty has officially admitted the loss of the battle cruiser Lutzow and the cruiser Rostock, not during but after the battle off the coast of Jutland, while on the way to the harbor for repairs. "The total loss of the German high sea forces during the battle of May 31-June 1, and the following time are: one battle cruiser, one ship of the line of older construction, four small cruisers, and five torpedo boats." The statement denies that the battle was in any way a British victory, and declares that "the British main fleet was forced to turn round and it never again came within sight of our forces."

France.—Through the initiative of a committee of lawyers entitled to practise before the Paris Court of Appeals, a funeral service was held in the last days of May for the members of the Parisian Bar who were killed at the front. These number already 104. The service, owing to the peculiar circumstances under which it was held, has caused a national interest. Permission had been asked and obtained from the authorities to reopen for the occasion the shrine of La Sainte Chapelle, which for some time has been closed to public worship. This famous monument, the masterpiece of French Gothic architecture, is enclosed within the precincts of the Palais de Justice. The President of the Republic, M. Poincaré, himself a member of the Parisian Bar, accompanied by Madame Poincaré, and surrounded by the most eminent jurists of the capital, assisted at the ceremony. After the Mass, Cardinal Amette, Archbishop of Paris, addressed the President of the Republic, the President of the Paris Bar and the distinguished guests. He paid a simple but heartfelt tribute to the bravery and the generosity of their dead confrères. He officially thanked the public authorities for reopening for the occasion the beautiful shrine so dear to the memory of all Frenchmen. He emphasized for the hour of national distress which faced them the need of that "sacred union," which the President of the Republic had been the first to invoke. He reminded his hearers that their dead friends were praying for them and the country. Human means and human agencies, he said, had already done much for France in the great struggle now going on. He added:

President and Cardinal

But there is a force superior to all these human forces, and whose help is necessary to make them fully effective. It is the force and the power of Him who is the Supreme Master of all things, the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of individuals as of nations.

The Cardinal's address was listened to with profound attention and respect. One incident of the ceremony was especially noted. The Cardinal welcomed the President of the Republic at the portal of La Sainte Chapelle, and both cordially shook hands. La Croix warns its readers not to lay too much stress on this act of courtesy. It adds:

We hope that this meeting, following as it does the imposing manifestation of "sacred union" lately given at the funeral of Cardinal Sevin, may allow us to look forward to the day when, throughout the length and breadth of France, the civil powers will adopt towards the religious authorities that attitude which is absolutely necessary in a country where religious freedom is not an empty word.

This wish will find an echo in many hearts.

Germany.—Important utterances explaining Germany's attitude toward peace were made recently by the Imperial Chancellor in the Reichstag. "In the critical time of July, 1914," he said, "it was the duty of every responsible statesman before God, his country and his conscience, to leave nothing untried that could preserve peace with honor." The charges brought against him on this score he could confidently refer to a Higher Tribunal and "await God's judgment calmly." On December 6, 1915, he had spoken for the first time of Germany's readiness for peace, because he could do so then in entire confidence that her war situation would continue to improve. "Developments have confirmed this confidence. We have made progress on all fronts. We are stronger than before." Germany's peace offer nevertheless had evoked no response. The Allies were not willing to accept the only basis upon which peace negotiations could be conducted, namely, the real war situation as shown by the war map "This was rejected by the other side. They will not recognize the war map, as they hope to improve it in their own favor. But it has constantly changed in our favor." His remark that, since two peace suggestions have already met with no response by the Allies, it would be futile and harmful for Germany to make any further overtures, was received in the Reichstag with even greater acclaim than any of his previous utterances. Some statesmen in England, he thought, believed that Germany's offensive was near the breaking point. "These gentlemen are indulging in strange notions." Of the unity and determination of the German people there was no doubt. If their peace offers were scorned they would yield to no difficulties, fearing God alone:

Peace or the Sword

My belief in my people and my love for my people give me a conviction firm as a rock that we shall fight and conquer as we have fought and conquered hitherto. We fear neither death nor devil, not even the hunger devil which they wish to send into our country. The men who fight around Verdun, who fight under Hindenburg, our proud bluejackets who showed Albion that rats bite, are fashioned from a breed that knows how to bear privations also. These privations are here. I admit it calmly and openly, even to foreign countries, but we will bear them. In this great fight against hunger we will also make progress. The harvest will not be worse, but better, than in the previous hard year. This calculation of our enemies on our economic difficulties will prove deceptive.

He knew, he said, that the success of the young German navy did not mean that England was beaten. "But it is a token of our future wherein Germany will win, for herself and also for smaller peoples, full equality of right and lasting freedom of sea routes, now closed by England's sole domination."

Great Britain.—On June 5, Earl Kitchener, the British Secretary of War, and his staff were lost at sea, off the west coast of the Orkney Islands. The Secretary was on his way to Russia, to discuss important military and financial questions with the Emperor Nicholas. An hour after he had gone aboard the Hampshire, the ship was sunk, probably by a mine. The late Field-Marshal, the son of an English army officer, was born in County Kerry, Ireland, on June 24, 1850. At the age of thirteen, he was sent to school in Switzerland, and in 1868, entered the Military Academy at Woolwich. His first campaign was with the French army in the Franco-Prussian war; and during the next forty years, he saw active service in Egypt, South Africa and India. Many honors came to him. Horatio Herbert Kitchener, O.M., was first Earl Kitchener of Khartum and of Broome; Viscount of Khartum, of the Vaal and Aspall, Viscount Broome of Broome, Baron Denton of Denton, Knight of the Garter, Knight Grand Commander of the Indian Empire, of the Star of India, of the Bath, and of St. Michael and St. George; Knight of St. Patrick, Privy Councilor, Doctor of Laws of Oxford, and sometime Lord Rector of Edinburgh University. His most recent and perhaps his greatest work was to recruit and equip an army for service in the present war. Kitchener's most prominent characteristics were his silence, his unbreakable perseverance and his utter disregard for public opinion. "'E's no talker," said a cockney non-commissioned officer who had served under him for many years, "Not 'im. 'E's all steel and hice." His sudden death, although the manner of it befitted a man who for more than forty years had given his best to his country, has created a deep and sorrowful impression even among those who had bitterly criticised his methods with the army. "So ends, with distressing suddenness," writes the Mail, one of the leaders of the opposition, "a career of romantic distinction which had assumed extraordinary significance in the estimation of his countrymen." The Times, another hostile journal, comments:

Kitchener's Death

It was his doggedness in doing his work that won him the popular trust, because it was akin to the nation's own temperament. He had none of the gifts by which politicians win favor. He was no orator, he did not court the multitude, he had few friends. It was in strange loneliness that he trod the path of duty with stern and unwavering purpose.

Pending the appointment of Kitchener's successor, the business of the department is in the hands of the Premier. Sir William Robertson, Lloyd George, Lord Milner and Lord Derby have been suggested for the post.

Ireland.—On June 6, in Dublin, the prosecution began the presentation of its case at the court-martial of Captain Bowen-Colthurst, charged with shooting F. Sheehy Skeffington, editor of the Irish Citizen, Thomas Dickson and Frederick McIntyre, during the recent uprising.

Bowen-Colthurst

According to the statement of the prosecuting officer, Captain Bowen-Colthurst took the three men from the guard-room with the remark, "I am going to shoot them, as I think it the right thing to do." Informed by the orderly then on duty, the Adjutant-General sent a message to Captain Colthurst, but it is not known whether the message reached him. At all events, declared the prosecuting officer, Skeffington, Dickson and McIntyre were taken to the yard and shot by a firing-squad of seven men. Several officers testified that they had been on duty seventy-two hours at this time, and that Captain Colthurst showed signs of excitement and did not act in his usual manner. One officer said that after the shooting, he noticed a movement in Skeffington's body and told the Captain of it. At the command of the latter, another volley was fired into the body. Testimony was also adduced that the accused had told Major Roxburgh, then in command at the Portobello Barracks, that he had shot the men on his own responsibility, and that he would probably hang for it. General Bird, the chief witness for the defense, testified that Captain Bowen-Colthurst disobeyed orders during the Mons retreat and had been suspended. The Captain's company had been ordered to retire, but the Captain had ordered it forward. This, according to the witness, showed his incapacity. Medical testimony was then taken to indicate the unbalanced state of the officer's mind. The court-martial reconvened on June 10, and according to a Central News dispatch from Dublin, pronounced Captain Bowen-Colthurst guilty but insane at the time of the shooting. Owing to the circumstance of insanity, the guilty officer will probably be ordered "interned during the King's pleasure." The shooting of Skeffington aroused, as is well known, a storm of protest and indignation. Of Thomas Dickson not much as yet seems to be known. Of Frederick McIntyre, the Irish Weekly Independent has this to say: "During the last three years Mr. McIntyre, in his paper, opposed Larkinism and the 'Citizen Army,' and supported recruiting. If this man was shot a horrible blunder was committed."

Mexico.—Present conditions in this wretched country are aptly described in the following letter written by a Mexican who has seen every phase of the revolution which has been so sedulously fostered by the United States:

A Rotting Nation

There is a chance of getting a letter to you and I must not miss it, for the present news is important. Conditions are growing worse and worse every day. The Carranzistas are in a bad way. The Zapatistas have driven them from Morelos again and are attacking them on all sides, near Mexico City and in neighboring districts. The Felicistas are threatening Puebla, Orizaba and Vera Cruz. Besides, divisions among the Carranzistas are numerous and serious and bankruptcy is imminent. It is said here that the United States has lost patience and that intervention is near. There is great fear that the bandits will do something desperate before losing power. I know for certain that the Lodges sent out a document three days ago insisting that everything possible be done to bring about the ruin of religion, the clergy and churches in this city, as was done in Merida and in other places. In the meantime, starvation is staring us in the face. Milk has gone up to four pesos a liter and all other articles are high in proportion. The poor are suffering acutely. In God's name, why does your country treat us so? Does it mean to stand for pillage of the very worst kind? Murder is a trifling crime here. A dreadful story has just been brought to Mexico City from Cuantla, by a Carranzista officer. He bragged that the bandits hung the parish priest of Cuantla in the public square, after taking a ransom from him. This priest was one of my friends, a most excellent man, who used all his power to mitigate some of the horrors of the revolution. He had been the parish priest of Villa de Ayala, the birthplace of the stable-boy, Zapata, whom Americans appear to consider another George Washington. The priest knew the Zapatas well, and knew the genesis and nature of their revolution. I feel a pang at the thought of his horrid death, and I am hoping against hope that the story is not true, for Carranza and his tribe are congenital liars. In the meantime we are watching our beloved country fairly rotting away.

Thus Mexico is kept on the cross by a policy that is past understanding.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Charities Investigation: A School for Drudges

SCARLET and white and pink and blue, like a bevy of butterflies they danced and floated across Fifth Avenue, on their way to the Park. From the top of an Avenue bus I viewed them; and for the moment was tempted to throw off the burden of some thirty years, climb down, and join them. Pleasant indeed is it, of a rare day in June, to look at the pools and flowers of Central Park through the clear eyes of a child; pleasant always, to find in the clinging, trustful touch of a little hand, some memory, sweet yet poignant, of the days when love smoothed every path for our childish feet, when, innocent of the world, we saw in none an enemy, but in every one a friend. But time and tide wait for no man, and the stop-system of the Fifth Avenue buses is known only to the initiate. Thus were the butterflies saved the presence of a dragon, but as we passed the Cathedral I was still thinking of these children and of their school. For they came from St. Joseph's Home at Eighty-first Street and Madison Avenue; most of them were orphans, all of them dependents.

You who have done me the honor of following these papers on the maligned Catholic institutions of New York, will recall that, even as in the mind of Mr. Doherty and the head-liners, Mount Loretto is an Oliver Twist school and the Dominican Convent in the glorious Nyack hill country, a nest of poisoners, so St. Joseph's Home, in the heart of Manhattan, is a "School for Drudges." Yet, "I don't think these children look like little drudges," remarked a newspaper man to me, at my second visit on June 4. "I've been all over the house, too," he continued, "and I want to say that while I've got a nice little home myself, these children seem to have all that my children have, 'and then some.' As for that playground that Doherty called a 'barren court,' why, just look at those trees, will you?" This sums up the case accurately. In this school the children are cared for, body and mind and soul, by intelligent and devoted religious women; their home is immaculately clean, the classrooms well equipped, their playgrounds and recreation facilities, within and without the house, ample. The impression, which must come home even to the casual visitor, that the children are in most excellent keeping, will be deepened if he will take the time to make a thorough examination of the institution.

The most serious accusation made against the Convent before the Strong Commission, is that the Sisters "force the children to do the drudgery of the house." Premising that the statement is an absolute falsehood, it may be interesting to trace its origin. In the report of an inspection made on September 23, 1914, by Deputy Commissioner Doherty, Dr. Bernstein, Dr. Reeder, Miss Robins, Miss McCann and Miss Schmidt, the following statements are found (Pp. 39, 40, 47, 48):

> At the present time there are so employed [in institution industries] eighteen girls of fourteen and fifteen years of age whose only education consists of one hour's schooling in the evening, from 7:30 to 8:30 after a hard day's work. In many of these cases, the daily program commences as early as 6 o'clock in the morning. . . . It is very strongly urged on the Sisters of Mercy that they immediately abolish the deplorable practice of exacting cheap labor from a group of defenseless girls from fourteen years of age and over, who are actually rendering from eight to nine hours' daily service.

On March 9, 1915, a reinspection was made by Mr. Doherty, Dr. Reeder, Dr. Bernstein, Dr. Stevens, Mr. Brooks, Miss Kennedy, and Miss Schmidt. The charge reappears in a modified form (Pp. 28-29):

> At the time of the reinvestigation, there were only six girls assigned to part-time educational classes. [Out of 396 children. Compare with the crowded part-time public schools of New York!] These girls receive two hours' scholastic instruction a day. . . . They are permitted to join cooking classes, also the dress-making classes. . . . The same six girls have been selected as members of the Dramatic Club. . . . The committee cannot help strongly urging the Institution of Mercy to abandon altogether the policy of using children over fourteen years of age for utilitarian purposes of the institution without giving them a quid pro quo.

Finally, we have the pathetic picture reproduced in the newspapers. The following is taken from the New York Herald of February 4, 1916:

> Mr. Doherty said that the main objection to the institution was the practice of making the girls do all the drudgery of the institution, some of them working eight and nine hours a day carrying wet clothes from the laundry and doing other hard work.

Apart from imagination, where is the truth? First of all, these girls, six out of 396, whose only schooling, we are asked to believe, consisted of an hour's instruction after a day of drudgery, had, with a few exceptions hereafter to be noted, complied with the law requiring a school record for working papers. So much for the first statement. But what of the exceptions? Mr. Dooley has wisely said that any father can send his son to college, but that not even President Eliot can make him think. This was precisely the case with these exceptions. They were children of a mentality which does not readily engage itself with books. So Mother Genevieve described them under oath (Testimony p. 3661), and Sister Mary Chrysostom, the school principal, deposed (Testimony, p. 3741) that, in her opinion, "this [i. e., a certain amount of light domestic work] was the best thing for the children to do." Furthermore, not a single child is applied to this work against her will; Sister Chrysostom testified under oath (Testimony, p. 3741), that "the children had begged her to be allowed to do it." Is there here the slightest trace of anything like "cheap labor exacted from defenseless girls?" The intelligent devotion of Mother Genevieve to her charges is patent; and as for Sister Chrysostom, who has been teaching for forty-one years, I do not hesitate to rank her opinion of what should be done with backward girls, immeasurably above the opinion of the "expert" theorist, Dr. Reeder. It is educational heresy, I know, even to hint that some children are not made for books. But et ego in Arcadia; I have been a teacher myself, and I know that it is waste of time to try to polish brick. It can't be done. By the summary processes of compulsory education, many an excellent cook is spoiled to make a poor stenographer, and not a few lawyers now hungry, might have been contented tinsmiths, opulent on three meals a day, a little home in the suburbs, and a family cow, had they not been compelled to sip with reluctant youthful lip from the Pierian Spring. As I view the matter, the Sisters applied an admirable solution to a difficult problem; my only regret is, that a fault-finding inspectorship seems to have necessitated its partial abandonment.

To say, then, that these children are forced to do the "drudgery of the house," which in many "cases . . . commences as early as 6 o'clock in the morning," or that condemned to hard labor, they "are on active duty from eight to nine hours a day," is, to employ a restrained manner of speaking, injudicious. One of the older girls (compare Doherty's "in many cases") who helped to dress the children, began this deadening, soul-destroying work at six in the morning. Moreover, the work, as was deposed on oath (Testimony, p. 3668), was not drudgery. If it were, plainly the children would not have asked for it. The hours for work were well distributed throughout the day. They attained in some instances a maximum of six and one-half hours, never eight or nine hours. In the light of these facts, easily accessible to the investigators, the recommendation of the Doherty Report, advising these good Sisters to "abolish the deplorable practice of exacting cheap labor from a group of defenseless girls . . . who are actually rendering from eight to nine hours' daily service"; and the smug statement in the Reinspection Report (p. 29), that the Sisters had partly abolished a cruel practice of which they had never been guilty, can only be characterized as false, insolent and shameless.

In connection with the "cheap labor" question, the Doherty Report becomes lachrymose over "the regrettable lack of play-facilities for the children (p. 34). Of course the "experts" made no mention of Miss C. M. Conway, who for nearly five years has taught folk-dancing and games, including the usual setting-up exercises twice a day, and gymnastics in Mr. Doherty's "barren court" in fair weather. Perhaps this accusation is best met by a quotation from the New York Herald for February 4, 1916. I can vouch for its truth, save as to the size of the "park" which should be reduced by about one-half:

> I examined the outdoor playground which Mr. Doherty called "a barren court." It is a charming little city park, covering nearly a city block. Though it is paved with concrete, thus suggesting, perhaps, a court, it is shaded in summer time by a dozen or more fine old trees, under the boughs of which are numerous swings, recreation benches, tables, and such picnic paraphernalia as children delight in. Another count in Mr. Doherty's indictment was that "facilities for indoor play are lacking," and that the Home "was deficient in facilities for entertainment." There is a superb assembly hall, commodious and airy. At one end it has a little stage with scenery, curtain, wings and flies. . . . Most unusual of all in this place "devoid of all means of entertainment," I found a first-class motion-picture apparatus in a fireproof enclosure, and a good selection of films, some of them educational, but many others amusing rather than strictly instructive.

I may add that, on occasions, the older children are taken to lectures at the Museum of Natural History and elsewhere, and on visits to the neighboring Metropolitan Museum of Art; and that all have regular outings in the country, in the parks, and at the seaside. And may I whisper that at the recent Shakespearean revival, a party from St. Joseph's greatly enjoyed Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree's presentation of "The Merchant of Venice"?

I have said a word of the classrooms, and I may here remark that the quality of the teaching seems to me distinctly good. These helpless little drudges have a graded course in domestic science, conducted in a fully-equipped laboratory, and presided over by a capable young woman, Miss Elizabeth Green, who holds her certificate from New York University. I examined a number of laboratory books, taken up at random, and found them neatly, and, so far as I, not a cook, might judge, accurately kept. This course was opened in 1913. Every child beginning with 3B devotes at least two hours a week to sewing in a regular prescribed course. More fortunate than Dr. Bernstein who claims (Doherty Report, p. 39), that none of the "samples" indicated "workmanship of a high order," I saw some very beautiful specimens of the children's work. I do not know the basis of Dr. Bernstein's judgment, but Sister Mary Chrysostom testified (Testimony, p. 3732), that although more than a hundred specimens were exhibited in a large room, Dr. Bernstein never looked at them.

This lengthy insistence upon the obvious philosophy of Corin that the property of rain is to wet and fire to burn; that good pasture makes fat sheep, that a great cause of the night is lack of the sun; and that Catholic Sisters do not maltreat helpless little children, grows tedious. I omit, therefore, certain petty complaints touching the food which are refuted by the very documents on which Mr. Hotchkiss bases his criticism (Doherty Report, pp. 27-29; Reinspection Report, pp. 21-24), and pass on to the consideration of a serious matter affecting the relations of all our Catholic institutions for dependent or delinquent children, with the Department of Charities of the City of New York. So far as I know, this fundamental question has never been formally discussed. In the course of my investigations, suspicion has grown to subjective certainty that knowingly or otherwise, divers recommendations insisted upon in the Department's Reports, particularly by Dr. Bernstein, constitute a direct attack upon the very foundations of supernatural religion. These recommendations deal with the formation of certain clubs and societies.

Now, however far we may fall below the attainment of our ideals, Catholics know that the one supreme aim and end in life, is to save our immortal souls. That is why the Cross of Christ surmounts our churches in every land; why, in our poverty, we build schools in which Christ alone is King, hospitals where life's last bitter moments may be soothed by the Blood of Christ our Redeemer, orphanages and homes in which the pitiful, broken little flowers of our race, may once more bloom and blossom in the sunshine of the love of Jesus Christ. Christo Redemptori, "For Christ, our Saviour," is our inspiration, our ideal, our support. We do not reject natural aids to the attainment of life's truest purpose, but we do not substitute them for prayer and the Sacraments. These are first. Morning and night and throughout the day, in all Catholic institutions, the hands of our children are raised in prayer to God our Father; day after day, into thousands of innocent hearts, the Lord Christ comes, there to dwell by His Eucharistic presence; instructions are given daily on the precepts of the Gospel by men and women consecrated to God; and all this, that from the beginning of conscious life, these little ones may be imbued with the beautiful, all-sufficing lesson, that we must love God above all else, and for His sake, our neighbor as ourselves.

Yet what recognition is ever given this superb work by our charity "experts"? None; or the recognition of a sneer. "It is claimed that the chaplain is of considerable assistance . . . in the moral talks he gives the girls," writes the Jew, Dr. Bernstein, of St. Joseph's Home. "The children are not consulted on questions of morality in conference, or otherwise" (Inspection Report, p. 32). Appreciation of the moral value of prayer, catechism and the Sacraments, may not, perhaps, be reasonably looked for in Bernstein, or in Kingsbury. But what of the "devout Catholic" Doherty?

Thus discounting the special value of Catholic training, based on prayer and the Sacraments, another more vital and far-reaching agency of moral uplift is continually dinned into the ears of our religious. It is nothing less than the "Big Brothers" and the "Big Sisters"! They can "very well be used to develop a higher sense of morality among the children," writes Dr. Bernstein, in his Report on St. Joseph's Home (p. 45). Higher, mind you, than the present moral code, based on faith, perfected in the child by prayer and the Sacraments. In the Blauvelt Report this same gentleman, by an impudent assumption, strongly urges these clubs "for the purpose of raising the moral standards of the institution," and fatuously announces that "the moral and spiritual possibilities of such clubs are practically unlimited" (p. 43, p. 48). What is this, but the apotheosis of the secularizing spirit that finds its god in man and therefore "dissolveth Jesus"? Will this insidious attack upon the Faith of our children fail? The answer depends upon the practical devotion of every Catholic in New York to the Church and to her maligned institutions.

Long ago, secularism triumphantly thrust God out of the school. Its progress is now thrusting Him out of the home. At the opening of this twentieth century, it is proposed to invoke the authority of the State to thrust Him from the heart and life of the dependent child. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," pleads the Heart of Christ. That is the ultimate issue in this whole controversy. God grant that no lust for petty station or passing power may induce the Catholic citizens of this land to lend their aid to the further spread of the kingdom of darkness.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

The Popes and the Jews

AS Catholics have long been, on account of their religion, the victims of misrepresentation, slander and persecution, they should be the last to countenance by word or deed any such excesses against men of other creeds. While proclaiming the Divine commission of the Church to which they belong, fighting for her rights and striving by prayer and good example to bring others into her fold, they should never forget that one of the noblest virtues which their Faith enjoins, is love and charity to all men. Religious hatred and bigotry should be odious to them. Our fathers have passed through those scorching flames. We earnestly pray that others may never have to suffer the same bitter pangs. We sincerely and heartily condemn religious persecution in every shape and form.

Among the lessons which our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, has impressed upon a world dazed by almost unimaginable scenes of strife and bloodshed, we find this all-important precept. In his answer to the petition of the American Jewish Committee begging him to use his moral and religious influence in behalf of their suffering brethren in various belligerent lands, the Holy Father, through his Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, after stating that he was unable to express his opinion concerning the special facts mentioned in the memorial, said:

> . . . In principle, as the head of the Catholic Church, which considers all men as brethren and teaches them to love one another, he will not cease to inculcate the observance among individuals as among nations of the principles of natural right, and to reprove every violation of them. This right should be observed and respected in relation to the Children of Israel as it should be as to all men, for it would not conform to justice and to religion itself to derogate therefrom solely because of a difference of religious faith.
>
> Moreover, . . . the Supreme Pontiff feels in this moment more deeply than ever, the necessity that all men shall recollect that they are brothers and that their salvation lies in the return of the law of love, which is the law of the Gospels.

The answer is worthy of the traditions of the Papacy. The petitioners themselves recalled with gratitude, that in the past, several of the predecessors of his Holiness had extended their protection to those of the Jewish faith, in the interest of right and justice.

The history of the Papacy extends over well-nigh two thousand years, and during all that time the conduct of the Popes toward the Jews has been far more tolerant and humane than was that of contemporary rulers. In the Decretals (v, vi, 9) under the name of Clement III (1190), we find the famous Bull Sicut Judæis, which might be called the Jewish Bill of Rights. The Pope who first promulgated it, seems to have been Nicholas II (1061). The Bull was renewed by Calixtus II, Eugenius III, Alexander III, Clement III, Celestine III, Innocent III, Gregory IX, Innocent IV, Urban IV, Martin V, Eugenius IV, and several others. It is a fairly liberal document and protects the members of the outlawed race in essential human rights. Under pain of excommunication, it forbids baptizing them against their will, killing or wounding them, injuring their property, interfering with their religious ceremonies, etc. Should adult Jews be baptized against their will, their baptism is considered invalid, and children must not be baptized without the consent of their parents or guardians. Moreover, Jews were to be left in tranquil possession of their synagogues, though as a rule, not permitted to build new ones. But Alexander III allowed their houses of worship to be repaired. Paul IV, who dealt severely with the Jews, decreed that they could have but one synagogue in each city or locality where they dwelt. Many Popes, however, abrogated the more rigorous decrees. And the Protestant Basnage informs us that in his day (1653-1723), there were 9 synagogues in Rome, 19 in the Roman Campagna, 12 in the remainder of the Patrimony of St. Peter, besides 36 in the March of Ancona.

The Popes have ever condemned the persecution of the Jew. They have always proclaimed his right to life, property, freedom of conscience and worship. But the Church is the depository of the Faith, and the Popes are its guardians. They saw that at times Judaism was a real peril to the faith of Christians and they placed certain restrictions on the practice of the Jewish religion. Thus, for instance, the children of Israel were not allowed to make proselytes or to have Christian slaves. At times, they were forbidden to live in familiar intercourse with the Faithful, and Paul IV, while never infringing on their essential rights, confined then in Rome to one quarter of the city, the well-known Ghetto. The Papacy, according to Rodocanachi, in his book, "Le Saint-Siège et les Juifs," always endeavored to treat with justice and equity the Jews dwelling in the Eternal City, though it felt at the same time, a certain mistrust "of these suspicious guests." And in his "History of the Jews," Basnage tells us that the dealings of the Popes with them were milder than those of other sovereigns; that they favored the persecuted race, made some of its members their treasurers, gave them special privileges and left them liberty of conscience. And to their credit, the Jews in Rome, when under Arnold of Brescia, Crescenzio, Stephen Porcari and Cola di Rienzi, revolt seethed in the city, remained loyal subjects of the Holy See.

To use the words of Lord Rothschild in his letter to Cardinal Merry del Val, October 7, 1913, Jews thankfully remember "that a great number of Sovereign Pontiffs on a great many occasions extended their generous protection to their persecuted coreligionists." How different this opinion from that of the usually discriminating New York Sun which finds the present Pope's charity toward the Jew a marvelous reversal of the policies of his predecessors. The Sun has forgotten the liberal statesmen of the Vatican. Let us recall one or two. When the synagogues of Palermo had been damaged by the populace, Pope St. Gregory (590-604) held Bishop Victor responsible and forced him to make restitution; and when an over-zealous convert from Judaism had forcibly taken possession of a synagogue in Sardinia, the Pope ordered it to be at once restored to its rightful owners. The persecuted Jews of Spain found a friend in Alexander II, for writing to the Spanish Bishops, he says: "We have just heard with pleasure, that you have protected the Jews who dwell in your midst, preventing them from being killed by those who have entered Spain against the Saracens." About the middle of the fourteenth century, that mysterious pestilence, the Black Death, one of the most terrible scourges that ever devastated Europe, was gathering its frightful harvest. Popular superstition blindly and unreasonably looked upon the Jews as its authors. Where they were not killed and indiscriminately massacred, they were plundered and sent into exile. But as Froissart tells us, and his testimony is confirmed by contemporary documents, Clement VI made heroic efforts to save them, called them to Avignon, where the Popes then resided, and gave the wretched outcasts a shelter and a home. In Popes like Innocent VII, Martin V, Julius II, Leo X, Clement VII and Paul III, they found generous defenders. When in 1891, the Christian population of Corfu, owing to an accusation of "ritual murder" brought against the Jewish population, threatened it with all the violence of mob-law, Leo XIII exhorted the clergy to allay the fury. This accusation of ritual murder, the murder namely of a Christian, and preferably of a Christian child, as an official act prescribed out of hatred of Christianity by the Jewish Law, the Jewish liturgy or a Jewish sect, has ever been keenly resented by the whole nation. But even Popes who, like Paul IV, St. Pius V and Clement VIII, charged the Jews with usury, theft and magic, never accused them of this odious crime, while scholars like Thurston declare that Innocent IV, Gregory X, Martin V, Paul III, have entirely exonerated them from it.

Impartial history cannot so easily clear the Jews of other charges. But for their crimes, national and individual, they have cruelly suffered. It is time that the age-long persecution under which they have groaned, and which the Catholic Church and her Pontiffs ever tried to mitigate, should cease. The Jew may be grasping, selfish, cold-hearted and proud, but his sorrows and tragic woes, even when caused by his own fault, should stir a sympathetic chord in every heart. Christians and Catholics, to whom the names of the Prophets and Seers of Israel are household words, who adore as their God One who came in the veiled form and majesty of a Son of David, who revere a daughter of Judah as the Virgin Mother of the Saviour of the world, should deem it a crime and a sin, not to exercise toward the Jew Christian charity.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

XLVII—The Young Man and Mechanical Engineering

MECHANICAL engineering is that branch of the science and art of engineering which relates especially to machinery. It is closely allied to all other classes of engineering inasmuch as there is hardly an occupation or industry in which machines of some sort are not directly or indirectly concerned, and it is often for this reason difficult to draw the line clearly between one class and the other. In its strictest sense mechanical engineering relates simply to the design of machines. In its broad sense it covers not only their design, but all matters relating to their proper construction and operation. In its common application it has for its scope both the design and construction of machines required for performing certain desired operations, and in addition the design and operation of the complete industrial plant, of which the individual machines form a part, and the construction of the plant in such a manner as to secure the most successful accomplishment of the end for which the plant is built.

A large part of the mechanical engineering of the present day consists in the assembling of machinery to produce certain desired results, rather than in designing machinery itself. In many cases, the machinery has already been designed and constructed by engineers of the past and the perfected machine can be had by purchase in the market. This class of mechanical engineering covers a wide field. Its scope includes the engineering required in a large, modern hotel or office-building. The mechanical plant of such an establishment embraces a great variety of machinery, among the most important of which are the machines and appliances required for power, heating, ventilation, lighting, elevator service, distribution of hot and cold water, fire protection and, in the case of a hotel, cooking.

In the same class of mechanical engineering as that referred to above is that involved in the design and construction of industrial plants of various kinds, such as cotton or woolen-mills, bleacheries, paper-mills, rubber-mills, machinery and other manufactories. This branch of the profession is commonly known as industrial engineering. In all of these cases, the elementary parts consist of the power-plant, which is sometimes operated by steam, sometimes by water, and often by both; the machines in the mill or manufactories, and the pulleys, shafting, and belting required to transmit power from one place to another. The work of the mechanical engineer in these plants consists in properly assembling the various machines so as to perform their functions, the selection of an appropriate power-plant and the proper design and arrangement of the transmitting apparatus required for operating them.

The work of the mechanical engineer is also of paramount importance in the construction of steamships. Not only does the design of the boilers and engines on which the whole operation of the ship depends originate with him, but he is also concerned in the design, location and connection of the multitude of auxiliary steam appliances which abound throughout the vessel and which contribute so much to the comfort of the passengers. The modern steamship is required to contain all the appointments of a first-class hotel. By reason of the contracted space in which the machinery is necessarily placed, the services of a mechanical engineer are more imperative in a ship's design and construction than in a hotel's.

Having now given some explanation regarding the character of the profession of mechanical engineering, the question naturally arises as to the qualifications needed to make a success of such a profession. It is scarcely necessary to say that the one who adopts this profession should do so not merely as a means of livelihood, but because his tastes lie in the direction of mechanical pursuits, if, indeed he does not love the profession for its own sake. No one should enter the profession who is not fond of machinery, who is not a "born mechanic" as the expression is, or who is not deeply interested, to say the least, in every kind of machine. But apart from natural inclinations, there are qualifications that especially fit one for the work of a mechanical engineer. The aspirant to success should have a technical education, such as can be obtained in any of the recognized technical schools of the country, in order to be thoroughly grounded in the principles of mechanics. He should not only understand these principles but he should know them by heart. He may or he may not remember the formula derived from a principle, but the principle itself should always be at his command. He should be familiar with mathematics, geometry and trigonometry. He should know the strength of materials and be able to calculate the strains occurring in structures and in machines, both at rest and in motion, so that he may design them with the proper amount of strength, or, if already designed, so that he may be able to prove that they are of sufficient strength for any purpose for which he may desire to use them. He should know their behavior under varying conditions; he should be able to detect their points of weakness and know the best methods of strengthening them when they fail.

Moreover, he should be a draughtsman and an inventor.

He should know the processes involved in the work of the pattern-maker, founder, blacksmith and machinist. He should know how to erect machinery, and how to operate it after erection. He should know the practices of the trade, the various articles concerned in mechanical operations which can be bought in the market, and, in a general way, their cost. He should be familiar with the different kinds of boilers, engines, pumps, water-wheels, etc., in the market and their relative advantages, and not the least in importance he should be grounded in the principles of steam-engineering and in the laws which pertain to the generation and use of steam, not only for the operation of engines of various kinds but for the various kinds of steam-heating. He should be well versed in hydraulic, pneumatic and electrical machinery. He should know the construction and operation of the various machines of the plant he has assembled, that he may be able to judge of the correctness of their design and construction and whether they perform their functions in a proper manner, and according to the specified requirements. In a word, the mechanical engineer must be skilled by observation, by study and by experience in the science and art of his calling, a task requiring persistent effort.

What the future offers to a person choosing the profession of mechanical engineering largely depends, of course, on the ability of the man himself. The broad scope of the profession furnishes ample indication that there is a wide field of work for him. If the young engineer becomes connected with an industrial business of sufficient size and importance to warrant the steady employment of a mechanical engineer, and if he shows the necessary ability, there is opportunity for him to push forward to a position of responsibility which will command a good salary and satisfy any ordinary ambition. If his desire is to establish an engineering business of his own, he can make the emoluments greater than in a salaried position, provided he is able to secure the necessary clientage, and conduct the business skilfully. If this is his ambition the wisest course for him to pursue is to enter the office of a successful engineer, and spend a few years in learning the business. Then, if he has the acquaintance and aptitude necessary for attracting business to himself, he can set up his own establishment and by careful attention to the execution of his work strive for the success he seeks. In mechanical engineering, as in other professions, large emoluments await the men who rise to the top, for they are the engineers who are called upon by individuals and corporations for advice.

The profession of mechanical engineering offers as many attractions to those entering it as any other profession. In this, as in others, there is always room for those who excel, for no professional man meets with success unless his work commands it, and if his work commands it nothing will prevent him for attaining complete and lasting success.

EMILE G. PERROT.

Monsters and the Middle Ages

I DO not remember to have read anywhere an adequate and comprehensive account of the fabulous monsters so much written of in the Middle Ages. Such studies as I have seen suffered from the three or four strange and senseless blunders which throttle all our thought on such subjects.

The primary blunder, of course, is that comic one to which students like Mr. Frazer have lent, or rather pawned, their authority. I mean the absurd notion that in matters of the imagination men have any need to copy from each other. Poems and poetic tales tend to be a little alike, not because Hebrews were really Chaldeans, nor because Christians were really Pagans, but because men are really men. Because there is, in spite of all the trend of modern thought, such a thing as man and the brotherhood of men. Anyone who has really looked at the moon might have called the moon a virgin and a huntress without ever having heard of Diana. Anyone who had ever looked at the sun might call it the god of oracles and of healing without having heard of Apollo. A man in love, walking about in a garden, compares a woman to a flower, and not to an earwig; though an earwig also was made by God, and has many superiorities in point of education and travel. To hear some people talk, one would think that the love of flowers had been imposed by some long priestly tradition, and the love of earwigs forbidden by some fearful tribal taboo.

The second great blunder is to suppose that such fables, even when they really are borrowed from older sources, are used in an old, tired and customary spirit. When the soul really wakes it always deals directly with the nearest things. If, let us say, a man woke up in bed from a celestial dream which told him to go on painting till all was blue, he would begin by painting himself blue, then his bed blue, and so on. But he would be using all the machinery that came to hand; and that is exactly what always happens in real spiritual revolutions. They work by their environment even when they alter it.

Thus, when professors tell us that the Christians "borrowed" this or that fable or monster from the heathens, it is as if people said that a bricklayer had "borrowed" his bricks from clay, or a chemist had "borrowed" his explosives from chemicals; or that the Gothic builders of Lincoln or Beauvais had "borrowed" the pointed arch from the thin lattices of the Moors. Perhaps they did borrow it, but (by Heaven!) they paid it back.

Five or six other similar errors need not detain us now. For upon these two rests the essential error about, let us say, unicorns; which, after all, is our chief affair in life. The mystical monsters talked of in the Middle Ages had most of them, no doubt, a tradition older than Christianity. I do not admit this because many of the most eminent authorities would say so. As Swinburne said in his conversation with Persephone, "I have lived long enough to have known one thing"; that eminent men means successful men, and that successful men really hate Christianity. But it is evident from the general tradition of life and letters. I think that someone in the Old Testament says that the unicorn is a very difficult animal to catch; and certainly it has not been caught yet. If nobody has yet said that in this case "unicorn" must mean rhinoceros, somebody will soon, but it shall not be I. But though it is probably true that many of these medieval monsters were of pagan origin, this truth, which is always repeated, is far less startling than another truth that is always ignored.

The monster of the pagan fables was always, so far as I can see, an emblem of evil. That is to say, he was really a monster; he was abnormal; or as Kingsley put it in those fine and highly heathen hexameters:

Twi-formed, strange, without like, who obey not the golden-haired rulers,
Vainly rebelling, they rage till they die by the swords of the heroes.

Sometimes the monster, once killed, could be used to kill other monsters; as Perseus used the Gorgon to kill the dragons of the sea. But this is a mere accident of material. I can imagine, in the same way, that if I could put the head of a folk-lore professor on the end of a stick, in the French Revolutionary manner, it might serve very excellently as a heavy wooden club for beating in the heads of other and less hardened folk-lore professors. Or, again, the hydra, which grew two heads for everyone that was cut off, might have been praised as an emblem of branching evolution and the advantage of an increasing population. But, as a fact, the hydra was not praised. He was killed, amid general relief. The minotaur might have been admired by moderns as the meeting-place of men and animals; the chimera might have been admired by moderns as an instance of the principle that three heads are better than one. I say that the hydra and chimera might have been admired by moderns. But they were not admired by ancients. Among the pagans the grotesque, fabulous animal was thought of only as something you ought to kill. Sometimes it killed you, like the sphinx; but even when it had done that, you did not really love it.

Now the case of the reappearance of such unearthly animals after Europe became Christendom is the thing I have never seen properly described. In one of the oldest of the legends of St. George and the Dragon, St. George did not kill the Dragon, but led it captive and sprinkled it with holy water. Something of the same sort happened to that whole department of the human mind which creates violent and unnatural images. Take the griffin for example. In our time the griffin, like most other medieval symbols, has been made a mean and farcical thing for fancy dress balls: in twenty pictures from Punch, for instance, we can see the griffin and the turtle as supporters of the civic arms of London. For the modern "citizen" the arrangement is excellent; the griffin, which eats him, does not exist; the turtle, which he eats, does exist. But not only was the griffin not always trivial, but he was not always even bad. He was a mystical incorporation of two animals held wholly sacred: the lion of St. Mark, the lion of generosity, valor, victory; the eagle of St. John, the eagle of truth, of aspiration, of intellectual liberty. Thus the griffin was often used as the emblem of Christ; as combining the eagle and the lion in that mysterious and complete compound in which Christ combined the Divine and human. But even if you thought of the griffin as good, you were not less afraid of him. Perhaps more.

But the strongest case is that of the unicorn, which I intended to figure prominently in this article but which seems to have evaded my thought in a most miraculous manner, and which up to this time I seem to have practically omitted. He is a terrible creature, the unicorn; and though he seems to live rather vaguely in Africa, I could never be surprised if he came walking up one of the four white roads that lead to Beaconsfield; the monster whiter than the roads, and his horn higher than the church spire. For all these mystical animals were imagined as enormously big as well as incalculably fierce and free. The stamping of the awful unicorn would shake the endless deserts in which it dwelt; and the wings of the vast griffin went over one's head in heaven with the thunder of a thousand cherubim. And yet the fact remains that if you had asked a medieval man what the unicorn was supposed to mean, he would have replied "chastity."

When we have understood that fact we shall understand a great many other things, but above all the civilization out of which we come. Christianity did not conceive Christian virtues as tame, timid, and respectable things. It did conceive of these virtues as vast, defiant, and even destructive things, scorning the yoke of this world, dwelling in the desert, and seeking their meat from God. Till we have understood that no one will really understand even the "Lion and the Unicorn" over a pastry cook's shop. GILBERT K. CHESTERTON.

Among the French Wounded Soldiers

THE war, besides laying bare many other things, has revealed the soul of the French peasant and artisan; and France had much to learn about her children. Visits made to the humble cottages in time of sickness and occasional dealings with hired workmen were the only medium most people had in times of peace of getting acquainted with the peasant and laboring classes, and such meetings, seldom if ever, led to any knowledge of their inner selves. Few in fact cared to explore this unknown land. The stress of war has changed all this. It now appears that popular impressions as to the character of France's lower strata of society have been far from the truth. Evidence of this has come to light on the battlefield, in the deserted cities and especially in the hospitals; and this evidence on the whole has shown the French peasant and artisan at their best. It has been my privilege to have done humble though continuous service for the space of eighteen months in one of the hospitals for the wounded, and my observations have led to very gratifying conclusions.

The particular hospital where I have learned to know and appreciate the Frenchman of the people, is directed by Sisters, a fact which gives it a religious atmosphere. Associated with the Sisters, who are certificated Red Cross nurses as well as devoted servants of the poor, are a few laywomen, but it is the former who impress upon the place its peaceful spirit. A skilled surgeon, an excellent doctor, and all the modern inventions for allaying suffering and for ensuring the success of difficult operations, add an up-to-date element to the conventual régime. A garden, with large trees, is a source of endless pleasure to the broken fighting men, who for the most part are peasants and often fathers of families, gray-haired territoriaux. Our patients are gathered from all parts of France.

The first trait that I have noted after many months of almost daily dealings with the wounded soldiers is their passionate and all-absorbing love for their homes. Before the war, much was written about the general movement among the peasants away from the country toward Paris and other large cities. The evil did exist. In some villages, even in fertile Normandy, cottages have been deserted, left unoccupied, and are falling to pieces. The mountainous districts of Central France suffered largely, the peasants emigrating in large numbers, because they found it difficult to earn a sustenance. But, after due allowance has been made for the dangerous attraction which Paris has for the peasant mind, it remains true that in general, the deserters of the country are less numerous than its lovers and devotees.

Our hospital has been in operation for a year and a half, during which time a steady flow of wounded soldiers has passed through the wards. They hailed from Brittany, Artois, Provence, Languedoc, Lorraine, Gascony, and Normandy. Each province has its well-accentuated characteristics, and, more than once, we found ourselves remarking how much more rational was the old division of France into provinces, than its present meaningless division into départements. Our peasant-soldiers in their conversation are constantly, though unconsciously, emphasizing the fact that a province implies characteristic qualities and defects, a distinctive spirit and idiom, and peculiar traits of temperament, to say nothing of the wealth of traditions evoked by the mere name of certain parts of old France. The départements, it must be acknowledged, are necessary from a utilitarian point of view, but they embody none of the memories that are so firmly planted in the soil of the provinces.

Bretons, in particular, with their dreamy eyes, have a strongly marked individuality. Rough in manner, slow and reticent of speech, they are nevertheless grateful, docile and devout. They make excellent fighting men and, since August, 1914, their regiments have nobly paid their tribute to the defense of their country; but they love their homes with a passionate tenderness. A sure way of making their faces light up with pleasure, is to talk to them of the sea-girt coast, and the picturesque costumes and legends, and the national fêtes of their native soil.

To induce the peasant-soldier to talk of his petite patrie, wherever it may be located, is always a good beginning, but when he comes to speak to you of it spontaneously, you may be assured that you have at last won his confidence. I remember a soldier from Languedoc, whose home was in the country, near Narbonne. Silent and reserved as he was, it took me six months to put him at his ease. Then he described for me the village where his father, mother, wife, children, grandfather and sister were waiting for his return. He was not eloquent, nor even fluent, but, the awkward words, gravely and earnestly uttered, as if they touched on sacred subjects, created a very vivid picture. I seemed to see the broad plain with its winding silver stream, its vines, olives, apricot and plum trees; the cottages each with its own garden; the horizon bounded by hills where, in wild profusion, grow the aromatic plants that give the famous Narbonne honey its exquisite flavor; and in the midst, an olive grove, with the chapel Notre Dame de l'Olive. C'est magnifique, were the words that regularly wound up the soldier's description of his home. That scene, he told me, was once bathed in perpetual sunshine, but over it he now saw the shadow of the great war: all the able-bodied men absent, many of them killed, wounded or missing, while the old and feeble were grappling ineffectually with the work left undone.

The territoriaux, married men over forty, are unmilitary in appearance, but their uncomplaining courage and endurance are truly wonderful. Not once during eighteen months, have I heard a word of murmur, but always Il le faut bien, "It's all right." There are no high-flown demonstrations about these gray-haired fighting men, who are so terribly wanted at home, but a steady, quiet resignation that, under fire, assumes a higher aspect, and becomes real heroism. This is the universal testimony of their officers. "My men," writes a young captain, who commands a company of territoriaux from Bergerac, "make no show of enthusiasm when our trenches are attacked. I find them brave, absolutely firm and reliable. Never can our people at home be grateful enough to their obscure heroes."

Our men's love for their officers is another characteristic trait. "We were like brothers," said a workman from Lyons, who spent many months in our hospital. His words well expressed the cordial feeling that unites officers and men. "Our officer never sent us into danger without going himself," is another remark. "My lieutenant dressed my wound in the trench," said a third, whose life was saved by this timely assistance.

Our soldiers are easily pleased, touchingly grateful and, like docile children, they sing the cantiques and attend chapel. Nor do they do this to gain the nun's good graces. Before me, lies a heap of misspelt, awkwardly written letters. They come from the trenches or from other hospitals, and are spontaneous outpourings of men's feelings. The little chapel of the ambulance with its prudent and kindly chaplain is mentioned at every turn. When, day after day, for many months, we see men from every part of France, whose ages vary from twenty to forty-four years, show themselves so civil, gentle and grateful, so ready to obey and to pray, we wonder where are the revolutionary spirits that come to the surface at times and threaten the existence of more peaceable citizens; but the fact that these impressionable and receptive Latins are undoubtedly easy to influence, may account, up to a certain point, for many anomalies. Our wounded men, it must be remembered, are not selected carefully from crowds of broken soldiers; they are drafted at random to our hospital according to the good pleasure of the military surgeon who presides at the railway station where the Red Cross trains arrive from the front. This being the case, they may be justly considered typical of the French soldier in general; they are by no means, picked individuals, chosen to suit a conventual atmosphere. Some, when they arrive, are rough, silent, somewhat suspicious, even of their kindly surroundings, but their Latin receptivity comes into play, for they soon fall into the docile mood of their comrades, their rough speech is softened, their suspiciousness vanishes and, like the others, they let themselves enjoy this peaceful halt in their strenuous lives.

Before the war, the men, who in their present bruised and broken state are so interesting, would perhaps have seemed hopelessly commonplace or even vulgar. But tragic experiences have developed what is best in their character, and the sacrifice of self to a great duty has brought a touch of grandeur into very ordinary lives. There is a striking contrast between their lives twenty months ago and during the tragic ordeal that they have just gone through, but in this contrast lies, it may be, the promise of a new and better France.

B. DE COURSON.

COMMUNICATIONS

Shaw Once More

To the Editor of AMERICA:

This is not a brief for "Marie-Odile," though as Mr. Belasco produced the play we may be sure that the serge for the habits was of the right texture, the rosaries monastery-made, the furniture bought up from some disbanded cloître, so that these, the most important matters of a play to Mr. Belasco, were all quite irreproachably Catholic. But my dear Bernard Shaw! If "Fanny's First Play" shows anything at all it is the reality, the push there is in religion, in that phenomenon Thomas à Kempis discusses as conversion, when the dimly habitual becomes suddenly the most impelling thing in the world. I don't recall another drama that uses this fact for the basis of its action. Margaret Knox may not be lovable to the "sob-stuffers" but to any one, not gone over to a factitious and sentimental type of woman, her earnestness and honesty have a glowing appeal. And how about her devout mother? And Juggins?

In the over-obvious foolery of Androcles, there lurks a great deal of poignant truthfulness. The Christians' light-hearted, casual facing of their ordeal is so essentially Catholic that the wonder is where Mr. Shaw caught it; their little jokes and pleasantries ring true to anyone who has been privileged to live in a convent or has been associated with simply and ecstatically religious people. This should not be held up to scorn as unnatural levity in martyrs. Mr. Shaw is great enough to know that when one has something very terrible and very necessary to do he has no energy left to be solemn about it. The martyr goes to his death in his own character. So the remark of Androcles that he is sorry the poor lion is to have no better fare than his toughness and stringiness needn't shock; it might have been made by a Franciscan! I have a college woman to match Mr. Young's professor; she is a person of signal cultivation and thoughtfulness, and yet she said after the play, "When Androcles knelt in the arena, ridiculous little figure that he was, and put one arm over his face to pray and wait, an awed hush gripped the house, and it came to me with a thrill what a tremendous testimony martyrdom is." And by the way isn't all this indignation a little tardy? AMERICA is usually betimes.

Milwaukee. ANNA NEACY.

The Story of a Neglected Grave

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As I was wandering through Calvary Cemetery on Memorial Day, I stumbled on a plot that was the very picture of neglect, in one of the best sites of that silent city of a million Catholic dead. The grave is covered with a rank growth of weeds and grass; the fencing is thick with rust; the top of the once imposing shaft "erected to the memory of Patrick Sarsfield Casserly," is broken. Patrick Casserly came to New York from Ireland in 1824 and was one of our first Catholic classical schoolmasters. He was an editor of the Weekly Register, and a contributor to the Truth Teller, two of our earliest Catholic papers, and edited several Greek and Latin text-books held in high repute and used for a couple of generations in our schools. A curious advertisement in the Truth Teller of 1828 reads:

> Chrestomathic Institution or Seminary for General Education, No. 36 Cherry Street, a few doors from Franklin Square. P. S. Casserly, T.C.D., Principal.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> A select Female School has been established at Mr. C.'s residence, No. 6 Pell Street, next door to the Bowery, under the superintendence of experienced Ladies, one of whom will teach French and Music in a superior style. They will also have the assistance of the masters employed in the Institution.

Among his pupils was his son Eugene, later a Georgetown graduate, who was admitted to the Bar in 1844 and served as New York's Corporation Attorney, 1846-47. Like his father he was connected with early Catholic journalism as one of the first editors of the Freeman's Journal. In 1850 he went to San Francisco where he took rank at once as a leading Democrat and was elected to the United States Senate from California in 1869. He died June 14, 1883. Another son, Bernard, was for years a member of the State Commission of Immigration and a trustee of the Emigrant Savings Bank. The mother of these two was one of the teaching staff of the "Chrestomathic Institution" and a relative of Father Luke Berry, first pastor of St. Mary's Church, Grand Street. The national convention of the Catholic Press Association is soon to meet in this city. It might not be an inappropriate detail of its proceedings to try and collect the few pennies necessary to make presentable this neglected memorial to one of the pioneers of the local Catholic press.

Brooklyn. T. F. M.

A Legion of Defense

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your "Communications" of May 27, I read with interest: "A Legion of Defense," by P. Scanlan. I agree with him that we are going the way of France and Mexico. The same secret elements and their ill-guided cohorts that brought bloodshed, religious persecution and base tyranny to those countries are now quite numerous and active within our own borders. In their past attempts they found that opinion was not ripe for such cold injustice, hence their calumnious sheets, numbering between thirty and forty, have been quite busy of late trying to discredit what they wish to destroy. They have been quite faithful to the sort of advice given by the abominable Voltaire to his acolytes: "Heap on lies, heap on lies! Something of them always remains." The fact that our Government subsidizes them, at the expense of the people whom they are calumniating, increases their ability to create anarchy. This the Government does by granting them second-class mail privilege. It reminds the writer of Christ made to carry the Cross on which He was crucified. Of course, persecution is one of the things that makes Christ's Church like a city seated on a mountain that cannot be hid, but these attacks, inspired by Satan, give us a chance to show our Christianity and to spread the truth. We should remember: "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel!" "He that shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him the Son of man shall be ashamed, when he shall come in his majesty, and that of his Father, and of the holy angels." We have constitutional means for remedying all our wrongs but we do not use them, probably because most Catholics are ignorant of the work carried on against us. Let us wake up and support our Catholic press.

Oil Center, Cal. P. A. MCANDREW.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Regarding the complaint made by a correspondent, that too few of your readers share in the "open parliament" of the "Communications" page, no less a personage than Cardinal Newman found it difficult to excite and sustain interest in journalistic correspondence on questions affecting Catholic interests. If I am now moved to supply my share of reply and comment on the proposed "Legion of Defense" it can only be to express a troubled state of mind. There will be bigotry to the end of the world. If Catholics were more Catholic than they are now and so intensified bigotry rather than lessened it, why might not that be a healthful indication? If Catholics, to be on the side of the smart and intellectual, are so far playing into the hands of the enemy, helping to exploit evil literature and evil plays, why should not the first effort to recruit the "Legion of Defense" be to induce such Catholics to abandon their hurtful neutrality?

Brooklyn. B. M. C.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

STAURDAY, JUNE 17, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Far Beyond the Type

IN the Old Testament there are perhaps no types more striking and apposite than those which prefigure the Blessed Sacrament. What bears, in every detail, a closer resemblance to Holy Communion, for example, than the manna on which the Israelites miraculously fed in the desert, and how remarkably like the Eucharistic Tabernacle was the Ark of the Covenant? All that is said in Holy Writ about the Ark finds in the Real Presence not only a perfect parallel, but, as was to be expected of an antitype, the fulfilment far exceeds the figure in beauty, power and dignity, and possesses in its completeness all the excellence that the type symbolized.

For the Ark of the Covenant was the glory, the strength and the beauty of Israel; it was the oracle, guide, protector and comforter of the Chosen People; it was the center of their worship and the object of their devotion, an elaborate and detailed liturgy being drawn up by God Himself for the direction of the priests and levites; in the Ark were preserved the stones of the Commandments, the flowering rod of Aaron, and a measure of the wonderful manna; the Ark indeed became the throne of God's holiness and mercy, a symbol of the abiding peace He had made with His people, and the pledge of His fatherly Providence over them; by day a cloud and by night a fiery pillar stood above the Ark to guide or stay the progress of the pilgrim host. "They shall make me a sanctuary," was God's promise, "and I will dwell in the midst of them": in the Ark of the Covenant His words would seem to have found their perfect fulfilment.

But the coming feast of Corpus Christi is a new reminder that marvelous as was the Ark of the Covenant, beautiful and striking as was everything connected with its institution, maintenance and history, the Ark, after all, was only a figure of the Tabernacle. All that the Ark was to the Chosen People, that the Tabernacle is to Catholics, and a vast deal more besides. Every wonderful quality, every attractive characteristic of the Ark is first mystically realized and then surpassed in our Tabernacle. For Christ's abiding Presence in the Tabernacle is likewise the glory, strength and beauty of the Church, and the heart and center of her devotion. The Son of Mary has for all time become in the fullest and most intimate sense the support, defender and consoler of every Catholic, however poor and humble. From the Tabernacle also are taught not only the Commandments of the Old Law, but the new commandment of love; before the Tabernacle the power of an eternal priesthood, typified by Aaron's staff, is exercised, and in the Tabernacle are stored up for the daily spiritual sustenance of the Faithful inexhaustible quantities of Living Manna. Finally, whatever beauty and richness there were in the appurtenances of the Ark, whatever solemnity and splendor there were in the ancient Jewish liturgy, whatever sanctity and decorum there were in the priests and levites in whose keeping the Ark was placed, become weak and poor and imperfect when compared with the magnificence, devotion and holy enthusiasm with which Catholics the world over celebrate the feast of Corpus Christi.

The New York "Journal" on Hell

FOR some months an editorial-writer on the staff of the New York Journal has devoted himself feverishly to the elucidation of two propositions. He almost proves the first, which is that men and monkeys do not differ essentially. Man wears clothes, eschews the tree as a customary place of residence, uses a toothbrush in private instead of a toothpick in public, and occasionally writes smart editorials for the penny press. But apparently under proper conditions of environment and discipline any monkey can be trained to accomplish these feats. The case is therefore plain. Mr. Hearst's editorial-writer has demonstrated, propria persona, that between himself and the ape there is a difference not of kind, but merely of culture.

Having placed himself so definitely, our editorial-writer does not carry his second thesis to so happy a conclusion. He is exceedingly anxious to prove that hell does not exist. Needless to say, the writer nowhere defines what he means by hell. For this omission he may be excused. Definitions require close thinking, a process which may be made possible by another eon of evolution. Evidently, however, he believes that God creates a certain number of human beings for the sole purpose of gratifying "a cruelty more vile than that of the worst of murderers," by casting them into a place where "they are burned alive forever."

It is hardly necessary to say that hell, as the Journal conceives it, does not exist. Hell, as taught by Christ, however, does exist. The difference is obvious to all who in the language of the Journal "are capable of understanding anything of importance"; but no one will expect the writers on that paper to grasp the distinction. On its own reiterated assertion, man, the editorial staff of the Journal included, is but a cultured ape, accidentally and slightly removed from the simians in Central Park that chatter in wild excitement over an unexpected accession of perfectly good peanuts. How can such creatures grasp distinctions?

Suicides and the Cult of Minerva

AFTER persistently refusing to give credence to the frequently repeated statement that teachers are "extra-suicidal in their tendencies," the New England Journal of Education finds that of late the evidence has become too conclusive to be rejected. The suicide of a city school superintendent in Michigan and of a professor in Johns Hopkins University on almost the same day, together with other similar instances preceding and following these events, induced the educational journal to issue a formal warning under the startling headline: "Mania for Suicides among Teachers." That such a warning is thought necessary for the teachers of our non-Christian institutions is certainly lamentable; but the motive urged to prevent such deeds is, if possible, even more pitiful. It strikingly indicates how weak are the props of morality when religion is removed. "It is important," says the journal, "that teachers realize that the whole profession suffers when one of them goes wrong in life, or in going out of life." A slight deterrent indeed for the man who stands prepared to break into the sanctuary of life and wilfully to cast aside the canons which God has set against self-slaughter!

Side by side with this illustration which is only one sad evidence of what "intellectuality" accomplishes without God, may be placed an example of the deification of the pride of intellect which is common in our day. It is taken from an article in the Atlantic Monthly containing a frank plea for a rejuvenated paganism whose high priests are to be chosen from among our university professors. The Church of the Living God is disdained, and the devotees of the new cult are invited to stroll into the temple of Minerva, there to find peace for both "eye and mind." They are to keep alive the fire of intellectual light "by setting apart a priesthood, a body of intellectual men who shall worship the God of truth and Him alone. The professors at Harvard, Yale, and elsewhere constitute, or should constitute such a priesthood." The "truth" referred to here is the negation of Christianity and Revelation.

This is the cult of the pagan philosophers of our day who would erect over the ruins of the Christian temple the shrines of Venus and Minerva. It is the cult from which have arisen the disasters of our time, wars and suicides and the idolizing of the things of the flesh. The non-Christian university is a fit place wherein to set up this modern Baal.

The Wonder Grows

THE eye and ear of the country were on New York last week. Startling revelations were to be made and everybody was anxious either to read them or to hear them. Traitors were to be exposed; international plots were to be laid bare; "wire-tapping" and theft of private letters were to be justified. The country was expectant; the inquiry was on—it came to an end without the discovery of a vestige of treason or the trace of a plot. But a defiance was thrown down, that must be taken up. The broker accused of treason declared:

> The Mayor of this great city publicly proclaimed the firm of Seymour & Seymour throughout the world as traitors to our country. The Mayor and Corporation Counsel asserted that our wires had been tapped because they believed we were engaged in a conspiracy against the United States Government. That was an absolute lie and they knew it. Nothing has been brought out in this inquiry to justify their statements.—New York Evening World, June 9.

What man of honor would let that pass? And is this not worse?

> Mr. Seymour then asked the Court for permission to speak. When that was granted, he said that no evidence had been produced to show that the detective was trying to detect crime, or that any crime had been committed. The detective, he said, had been loud in declaring that papers had been stolen from the office of J. P. Morgan & Co., but had not proved it. After that had been exploded, they dragged in the National Government. No less a person than the Mayor of this city published us broadcast as traitors to our country. Senator Thompson told him that there was no international question involved, but the Mayor contended that there was and was backed by Corporation Counsel Hardy. Yet, they failed to show anything that would even lead a baby to believe it. They went into our office for no lawful purpose, but in an unlawful manner and on an unlawful errand, to get information for some person whose reason for wanting it has not been given.—New York Evening Journal, June 9.

Verily, the wonder grows. The air that was thick with intrigue and treason last week is now charged with mystery. Why were those wires tapped? To defend "the sacred altar of government"? Seymour is not a Papist. Why were those wires tapped? To reveal a plot? There was no plot. Why were those wires tapped? To uncover treason? There was no treason. But those were the reasons given. Precisely and therein lies the mystery. Why were those wires tapped? Can it be that the almost universal whisper that tickles the ear at every turn is true? Why were those wires tapped? Why? And again, why? The wonder grows. Does it?

Enter the "Spectric Poet"

THE vorticist school of poetry, we are credibly informed, came to an ignominious end, when the war broke out; the verses produced by the cubists are as unintelligible as their statues and paintings, and even the imagists, because they have been praised too much, are now declining in popular favor. So the stage is cleared for the entrance of that latest literary absurdity, the "spectric poet." Here is the explanation of the new theory:

> The subject of every spectric poem has the function of a prism, upon which falls the white light of universal and immeasurable possible experience; and this flood of colorless and infinite light, passing through the particular limitations of the concrete episode before us, is broken up, refracted and diffused into a variety of many-colored rays. Some one of these rays will impress the poet more than others; and he will necessarily color his whole poem with its hue. . . . The theme of a poem is to be regarded as a prism, upon which the colorless white light of experience falls and is broken up into glowing, beautiful and intelligible hues.

Now observe how a modest exponent of the "spectric school" applies this theory in the incomparable lines entitled, "Opus 181":

> Skeptical cat,
> Calm your eyes, and come to me.
> For long ago, in some palméd forest,
> I too felt claws crawling
> Within my fingers. . . .
> Moons wax and wane;
> My eyes, too, once narrowed and widened.
> Why do you shrink back?
> Come to me: let me pat you—
> Come, vast-eyed one . . .
> Or I will spring upon you
> And with steel-hook fingers
> Tear you limb from limb. . . .
> There were twins in my cradle. . . .

Could anything be more "glowing, beautiful and intelligible" than this? It is clear that each line of the little masterpiece subtly suggests the colors of the rainbow: red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet, all in their proper order, and the hues are repeated, no doubt, in the seven lines that conclude the "poem," though cynics may protest that indigo is the only color that is conspicuously present in "Opus 181."

But more interesting even than the spectral analysis of the foregoing chef-d'œuvre is the white light the author's lines throw on her own charming personality. How she exults in her primordial feline pedigree! How bloodthirsty she becomes as she goes on! In the last line how delicately she hints at her kinship with the amiable subject of this prismatic poem! Depressing as is the "spectric school of poetry" and its output, more saddening still is the fact that editors should in all seriousness publish such arrant nonsense as "Opus 181" and call it poetry. But saddest of all, just because the trash is in print, thousands of silly readers will think it poetry too.

The Eye of the Davises

ONCE upon a time, a rather ingenious expedient was in use in a certain family, to keep the children in good behavior. Next door to this family, dwelt in seclusion the Misses Davis, two ladies credited with having long since passed the years of discretion. Whenever the children misbehaved in any way, by maltreating the unoffending cat, or by reaching across the table for the jam, the warning cry would go up, "Be careful, child, the Davises are looking!" The mystic words inspired the younger children with awe; indeed the Davises were credited with powers of vision, at least preternatural. Later the boys learned to laugh at their childish fear of these innocent old ladies; but even now whenever one does anything out of the way, they call out laughingly, "Be careful, the Davises are looking!"

For the Catholic, the world is full of Davises and they are always looking. He is a marked man, and this is as it should be. The Catholic claims more for his Faith than any other man. The world looks on, to sneer if his deeds do not correspond to the Faith that is in him, to admire, silently perhaps, but none the less honestly, if his life is as lofty and as upright as the Faith that he professes. Especially is this true of the educated Catholic. From the moment the young man or woman leaves college, the world watches with curious eyes. "Here is one," say the world's followers, "a good enough man in many respects, but for all that, not good enough in certain important respects, that holds to a standard different from ours. Let us observe closely, and see whether he will live up to that standard, or adopt ours." The Davises watch that man as he enters on his chosen calling. Does the Catholic lawyer, doctor, merchant, palter with prinicple and play with fire? Are these people living up to the standards they profess, or are they plain every-day hypocrites? And the women in particular, how they watch a woman! Does she read the books, attend the plays, adopt in her daily life the practices that her Church condemns?

Some fall, and loud and long is the laughter of the scornful Davises. Yet some there are among the Davises who turn away sorrowfully; they had watched, yes, but they had hoped that these men and women might make the world better by living up to the standard set by the Church. Had they done so, the watchers might have followed their example. As it is, the fall of the Catholic adds to the growing ranks of scoffers and cynics.

The usual army of graduates leaves our Catholic colleges and universities this year. Beneath the sonorous Latin on their diplomas, they may well write in good old Anglo-Saxon, so that he who runs may read: "The Davises are Looking!"

LITERATURE

XXVIII—Mother Juliana's "Sixteen Revelations"

A STUDY of the "XVI Revelations of Divine Love Shewed to Mother Juliana of Norwich, 1373," will be productive both of pleasure and edification, for as Dom Cressy, O.S.B., writes, the student "being thus employed will be sensible of many beams of . . . lights, and much warmth of . . . charity." Love for the Sacred Heart will also be quickened, for it is clear from the following lines that Juliana practised that devotion:

> With . . . cheer our . . . Lord looked into his 'side and beheld with joy. . . . . And there he shewed a fair and delectable place, and large enough for all mankind that shall be saved, and rest in peace and love. . . . And with the sweet beholding he shewed his blessed heart cloven in two. And with this our good Lord said: "Loe, how I love thee." . . . . This shewed our good Lord to make us glad and merry.

In girlhood this fourteenth-century recluse, probably a Benedictine nun, begged for a share in Christ's sufferings, and in her thirtieth year the request was granted. During a seemingly mortal illness, as the Crucifix was held before her eyes, she passed into her Saviour's agony, and in "His Sixteen Shewings" penetrated the veil which shrouds the Divine pangs from ordinary eyes. Deep called unto deep; the depths of a saint's loving soul were outpoured, to mingle with the greater deep of Christ's broken Heart. Broadly speaking, Suffering Love is the theme of Dame Juliana's revelations, beneath which the Seven Words spoken from the Cross are glimpsed as a spiritual palimpsest. As to the interpretation: "Wit it well: Love was his meaning. Who shewed it thee? Love. Wherefore shewed it thee? For love." Thus Juliana explains the motif of the "Shewings."

Indeed it was love, both for her Lord and for her "even-Christians," which enabled this rare soul to free her mind from certain Calvinistic concepts prevalent in her epoch. Thus, whilst ever obedient to authority, she thawed with a warm-hearted love the icebergs which had drifted into thought-currents through which the bark of Peter was then steering its sure course into warmer waters.

To Juliana, God was ever "homely and courteous . . . I saw no wrath but on man's part, and that forgiveth He in us." No wrath is possible in love, and God is love. Moreover sin is shown to be negation, never affirmation. "I saw not sin, for I believe it had no manner of substance, nor no part of being, nor it might not be known but by the pain that is caused thereof."

All being is good, because it is of God; where no good is left, there is no being; good may be reduced by sin even to annihilation, and naught but pain remain. Sin is the failure upon man's part of love. Yet in the great crucible of the Passion it may be converted by God's loving alchemy into worship and great profit, until we perforce cry: "O felix culpa!" at such resultant bliss. Sinners are compassionated: in heaven "the tokens of sin are turned to worship"; on earth Christ immanent in each Christian causes him to compassionate his fellow-Christian. "Sin is the sharpest scourge that any chosen soul may be smitten with, which . . . purges him . . . till contrition taketh him by touching of the Holy Ghost and turneth the bitterness into hope of God's mercy. And then his wounds begin to heal, and the soul to quicken. The Holy Ghost leadeth him to confession . . . then undertakes he penance. This . . . meekness greatly pleaseth God." Thus love is the gist of Dame Juliana's healing, healthful message, for we are rooted in love in "God our Ground," to whom we are united, or "oned" in prayer.

As a Benedictine, Juliana is well versed in the science of "beseeching." Prayer is of God, His merciful gift, which our wills should offer Him again with interest. "It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven," rising from God, and falling back again to Him from our poor earthly, yet heaven-taught, heaven-bought lips. And "beseeching is a true and gracious lasting will of the soul, oned and fastened into the will of Our Lord, by the sweet working of the Holy Ghost," it is "a truly willing to be one with him with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our might . . . In each soul that shall be safe, is a godly will that never assented to sin, nor never shall . . . evermore continually it willeth good and worketh good." For to each soul God says: "I am the Ground of thy beseeching . . . out of whom . . . all come, in whom be all enclosed . . . into whom all wend." "The high goodness of the Trinity is Our Lord, and in Him we be enclosed and He in us. . . . The place that Jesus taketh in our soul he never shall remove it."

In the "Shewings" mankind is seen to be Christ's crown: a garland woven for His bitter Passion, "but also . . . His bliss . . . His meed . . . His worship." To this mystic, Jesus and Adam are "one man." Jesus is in all that may be safe, and all that may be saved is in Jesus. . . . "When Adam fell, God's Son fell for the right oneing which was made in heaven. God's Son might not be separate from Adam, for by Adam I understand all man; Adam fell from life to death into the slade of this wretched world, and after that into hell. God's Son fell with Adam into the slade of the Maiden's womb . . . and that was for to excuse Adam from blame in heaven and earth; and mightily he fetched him out of hell."

From this "Shewing" may we not conclude that the God-forsaking of mankind, concurrent with the Fall is mystically one with the dereliction and darkness upon the Cross? "Thus was I learned to choose Jesu for my heaven whom I saw only in pain at that time," writes Juliana, and did not Jesu choose mankind for His heaven, and finding "a full bliss" in suffering, cry "Father, forgive" the anguish man had caused Him?

"If thou art pleased, I am pleased," He said to Juliana. "It is a joy, a bliss, an endless satisfying to me that ever suffered I Passion for thee." And here, as we catch a glimpse of the second word: "Today thou, who didst desire to suffer with me, partaking in my pain, art most truly one with me in Paradise," the palimpsest beneath the Revelations grows ever clearer. "With . . . cheer of mirth and joy, our good Lord looked down . . . where our Lady stood in the time of His Passion, and said 'Wilt thou see her?'"

Space does not allow us to dwell upon the beautiful and touching description of the Maiden-Mother which here follows, nor upon the mystical charm of a later chapter in which Dame Juliana says: "Our Lady is our mother, in whom we be all beclosed, and of her born in Christ; for she that is the mother of our Saviour is mother of all that shall be saved in our Saviour. And our Saviour is our very mother." Reposing in that last thought, we may truly say with the devout Juliana: "All shall be well . . . all manner of thing shall be well. Deo gratias."

C. E. BISHOP.

REVIEWS

A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico. By MRS. NELSON O'SHAUGHNESSY. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.00.

This is a timely and excellent book that will delight every American who has any regard for decency and elementary justice. The volume is made up of letters written to her mother, without original thought of publication, by a keen, cultured woman who witnessed the most tragic part of Mexico's tragedy. The first letter is dated October 8, 1913, the last but one, May 3, 1914; the very last bears no date. The story told is sad beyond full description, the story of a nation disrupted and then slain by a stronger power. Huerta is the central figure of the drama, the villain; the heroes are Carranza, Villa, John Lind of Sweden and Minnesota, one William J. Bryan of Nebraska and others. The villain is a gentleman and a diplomat, but John Lind received a cultured lady in his shirt sleeves, and his diplomacy may be evaluated from the fact that his conduct in Mexico drew this judgment from a foreign minister accredited to that country: "Your Scandinavian friend is anti-Latin, anti-British and anti-Catholic." But these are side glances. The book confirms previous judgments and causes former suspicions to pass into judgments. At the very time that our Administration was protesting that Mexico must settle its own affairs, there was continual, offensive and effective interference therein, on our part. "Bullying, collusive and secret arrangements" with the bandits were ordinary occurrences. Lind favored them at every turn; he had the embargo on arms lifted in their favor, and such was the result that when he left for home, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy wrote:

> A hot indignation invades me as Mr. Lind drops out of the most disastrous chapter of Mexican history and returns to Minnesota. Upon his hands the blood of those killed with the weapons of the raising of the embargo—those weapons that, in some day and hour unknown to us, must inevitably be turned against their donors! It is all as certain as death.

Many men pass and repass in the pages of this volume. Carranza disloyal, greedy, stubborn; Villa, the beast; Bryan inviting Huerta to participate in the Hague Conference after our Government had absolutely refused to recognize him! Huerta, faithful and patient, "delightful in courtesy and tact," "flawless in his international attitude," always speaking of our President with the utmost respect as su Excelencia el Señor Presidente. To the last he maintained his chivalry, inviting American officials to his son's wedding, after the invasion of Vera Cruz putting a special car and a special guard at their disposal when they retired from the country and speaking these last words: "I hold no rancor toward the American people nor toward su Excellencia el Señor Presidente Wilson. He has not understood." Though observing due reticence the author is not afraid of the truth. She lays bare with a deft but delicate pen, awful atrocities. For instance, she relates the well-known incident of the 300 Morelos peasant women taken by force to an army camp, where the male beasts of the species, whom the United States supported, fought so desperately for their prey that the unfortunate women were hurried away and thrown friendless, penniless, foodless on the beach at Vera Cruz. Sentences like the following make the heart stop: "Everywhere brother is killing brother, and as for sisters they are often lassoed and captured as if they were stampeded cattle." Villa is shown an unspeakable brute, the special friend of Lind. The following letter is worth recording:

> April 9, Holy Thursday.
>
> The churches (Mexico City, with Huerta in power) are filled to overflowing, these holy days. Men, women, and children of all strata of society are faithful in the discharge of their duties. In this city of peace, how contrasting the tales of sacrilege in the rebel territory! Five priests were killed and three held for ransom in Tamaulipas last month; a convent was sacked and burned and the nuns were outraged. . . .

Of course "there is no official record" of this "on the files" of the State Department. And no record either of the fact that when a confidential agent of this Government heard of the murder of priests he exclaimed: "The more shot the better."

Thus these admirable letters run on page after page of engrossing interest. The book is worth reading; the author has done a good work for her country and for Mexico in laying bare the stupidity, duplicity and heartlessness that have characterized our dealings with Mexico, a land where a handful of barbarians, John Lind's protégés, maltreated a nation.

R. H. T.

Dante. By JEFFERSON BUTLER FLETCHER, A.M. Professor of Comparative Literature in Columbia University. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

Mr. Fletcher has written a book evidencing his wide reading in many languages and his thorough knowledge of the times and works of the great Florentine. If, as Charles Eliot Norton wrote, it is needful to know Dante as a man in order fully to appreciate him as a poet, it is equally necessary to understand his theology, his masters, and his models. The present volume, one of the "Home University Library" is an attempt to study Dante from his own writings. These are as intricate in detail and as difficult of interpretation as they are vast in their general design. He who runs may not read them aright for they have to be sifted and weighed like an article in that "Summa" of St. Thomas whose philosophy and wisdom the seer of the "Inferno" and the "Paradiso" reproduced in his mighty lines. Dante was not only a great poet, he was a great teacher. Centuries have sent their scholars to listen to his majestic voice. His teachings and precepts may not be understood unless the man, his politics, his theological system, and his esthetic ideals be fully grasped. Mr. Fletcher has made a serious attempt to do all this. Confining his studies to a specific view-point, he presents first of all Dante's personal confessions, then Dante's impersonal teaching, and finally Dante's literary art. Probably with a larger knowledge of the Catholic philosophy and theology of Dante our author would have given us a truer picture of the man. But such as the picture is, it reflects to no small degree the genuine greatness of the poet.

The stability of the faith and dogmas of the Catholic Church, however, does not come fully home to Mr. Fletcher. A better understanding of her immutable teachings and at the same time of their adaptability to modern problems of life would have given him a clearer insight into the poet's true greatness. But as a devout worshiper at the shrine of the renowned singer, Mr. Fletcher acknowledges the Florentine's wide and deep knowledge of men, his far-seeing and deep-sounding vision and vehemently opposes the opinion of those who maintain that Dante's voice is nothing more than a "boy-like treble of wonder and naïveté" and that he offers not wisdom but beauty only. That beauty and wisdom, be it noted, is but a dim reflex of the Catholic dogmas of which Dante, though a stern critic of Popes, churchmen and ecclesiastical policies which he disliked, was ever a devout and humble follower.

J. C. R.

The Life of William McKinley. By CHARLES S. OLCOTT. Two Vols. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $5.00.

Relying largely on material furnished him by Mr. George B. Cortelyou, President McKinley's private secretary, the author of this "official biography" has filled two volumes of 400 pages each with a eulogistic rather than a critical account of his subject's career. Mr. McKinley's gallant conduct during the Civil War, his domestic virtues and political integrity are deservedly praised, and a great deal of space is of course given to his famous tariff measures. But readers who expect to find in this work new light on the war that the United States waged with Spain and on our acquisition of the Philippines will be disappointed. That the Maine was really blown up by Spaniards, that the "yellow" press did not force the President to declare war; that every diplomatic means to avoid a conflict was employed, Mr. Olcott assumes to be indubitably true, and the unflattering portrait of the Philippine friar that had such a wide vogue twenty years ago is found in his pages. Perhaps an "official biography" has to be written after a rigidly prescribed form, its subject must have no weaknesses, and never, never make a mistake, but such a work will be of little value to the critical student of history. Mr. Olcott's book is well supplied with photographs.

W. D.

Summula Philosophiæ Scholasticæ, in Usum Adolescentium, a J. S. HICKEY, O.Cist. concinnata. Vol. III. Theodicæa. Ed. 3ª. S. Ludovici: Apud B. Herder. $1.00.

It is a pleasure to welcome the present revised and enlarged edition of Father Hickey's "Natural Theology," and to learn that the companion volumes have won similar success. The series, indeed, was bound to meet with a favorable reception at the hands of critics; and the uniformly high praise of the latter has been justified by that excellent test to which works of this kind can be submitted: an increasing demand for further editions. The author possesses the gifts that are essentially called for in one who would instruct others in the art of thinking aright; he sees clearly and writes clearly. He possesses too that additional gift which may perhaps be best described by the phrase, a sense of proportion. The larger questions of philosophy are treated with the fulness and thoroughness which their importance postulates; while other problems which, though undoubtedly important because of their intimate union with the former and close dependence upon them, are still of relatively less significance, are succinctly set forth in the familiar corollaries and scholia. Another feature that has contributed much toward the well-deserved popularity of the series is the wealth of citations from past and contemporary works and articles in English that deal professedly or otherwise with the leading points under discussion. The advantages of such references are evident; and not the least is this: they enable the student to translate into his own language the compact terms of scholasticism. Altogether, Father Hickey's works form the best text-books the reviewer has seen for those students who must confine their course in philosophy to a period of two years. J. A. C.

The Romance of the Commonplace. By GELETT BURGESS. Indianapolis The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.25.

Little papers these—"essays" is too gross a word—fifty-three of them, on what-not, in which the "tidings they bear are not so important as the telling of them" nor half so delightful. Gelett Burgess unconsciously reviews his own book in the "Game of Correspondence" when he writes: "This has a flavor that the salt of silence alone can bring out; a dash of interruption destroys its exquisite delicacy. . . . To your room with this and lock the door, or, at any rate, save it for an impregnable leisure. . . . It is minted thought, invested, put out at loan for a time, bringing back interest to stimulate new speculation. . . . It gilds homely little common things till they shine and twinkle with joy." Yet too many of these "common things" are called "divine": "the fire of personality," "a phase of common human nature," "electricity" even "fastidiousness." It is not a book to which one may resign himself without reserve "passive to the enchantment" of dainty style and bewildering imagery. In "The Game of Life" rapid moves are not always safe, and broad rules are seldom flatly true. Watch it as a play, and for a background build up solid truth; then let the nimble sprites frolic through their parts before a merrily discerning eye, prattle gaily, antic, curtsy and be off. You will have been distracted and delighted, provoked into debate, instructed too, perhaps corrected; yet withal, on having done romancing with the commonplace, your eye will be brighter, your step lighter, your tears, by its subtle alchemy, transmuted into laughter and your wrinkles into smiles. Z. J. M.

The Magic of Jewels and Charms. By GEORGE FREDERICK KUNZ, A.M., Ph.D., D.Sc. With Ninety Illustrations in Color, Doubletone and Line. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $5.00.

Dr. Kunz has had a quarter of a century's experience as mineralogist and gem expert, and the whole subject of precious stones seems to have had a lifelong fascination for him. In the search for information upon this topic, he has read the literature of all peoples, and has now gathered into this volume the results of his labors. It is not a scientific treatise, but contains a wealth of stories, legends, fancies, superstitions, tales, and facts concerning the "magic" value of minerals, gems, meteorites and bezoar stones. The author writes clearly and avoids controversy. Sources are given and the rest is left to the reader's discrimination. Only the broadest conception of the subject, however, can justify the appropriateness of the chapter on "Angels and Ministers of Grace," though to the Catholic it is naturally of great interest. Dr. Kunz believes in Guardian Angels and approves of the following substitution of saints for stars:

> St. Ottilia keepes the head instead of Aries; St. Blasius is appointed to govern the necke instead of Taurus; St. Lawrence keepes the backe and shoulders instead of Gemini, Cancer and Leo; St. Erasmus rules the belly with the entrayls in the place of Libra and Scorpius; in the stead of Sagittarius, Capricornus, Aquarius and Pisces, the holy church of Rome hath elected St. Burgarde, St. Rochus, St. Quirinius, St. John, and many others, which govern the thighes, feet, shinnes and knees.

Though a more careful distinction between faith and superstition could have been made, the author has avoided the extremes of skepticism and superstition. The book is carefuly indexed, finely printed and beautifully illustrated in color. C. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Sister M. Blanche, a religious of the Holy Cross Congregation, whose "Poems" were favorably reviewed in AMERICA, has now brought out a little volume of essays entitled "Idyls and Sketches" (Kenedy, $1.00). The best of the twenty-eight short papers in the book are those which describe out-of-doors sights and sounds, for the author has an eye that delicately discerns the seasons' changes, and she is rich in flower and bird lore. As there must be considerable literary ability among the Sisters who teach English in our convent schools, it would seem that the publication of volumes like this ought to be of more frequent occurrence.

Those who read "Aunt Sarah and the War," a little book which was favorably reviewed in our issue of July 3, 1915, will doubtless be interested in "Halt! Who's There?" (Putnam, $0.75), another war-book by the same "anonymous" author. He is commonly believed, however, to be Wilfrid Meynell, the "discoverer" of Francis Thompson. The diary is given of Miss Pauline Vandeleur who practises "hospitalities" as a Red Cross nurse and the "trenchant" journal of the late Captain Tudor whom she was to have wedded, is published. His reflections on "This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England" are as patriotic and poetical as could be desired but the eulogy of Nelson is somewhat overdone. Stephen Shireburn's thesis that English Catholics love their country more than English Protestants do is convincingly proved. The book, however, is not the equal of its predecessor.

In "The Lightning Conductor Discovers America" (Doubleday, Page, $1.50), C. N. and A. M. Williamson have written a glowing endorsement of the see-America-first movement. Captain Jack and Mrs. Winston reappear in the story, most of which is told in letters written by that lady to a friend in England. Winding through descriptions of Long Island and New England scenery as viewed from a motor car is a rather improbable but quite interesting romance. Indeed so mysterious is the hero that readers will need all their self-control to keep from turning prematurely to the last chapter to find out who he really is.—— Zane Grey's "The Border Legion" which threatens, alas! to be a "best seller" is as crowded with "gun-play" and "primitive passion" as is an uncensored "movie." The book will do nothing but harm.

"Union Portraits," (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.50) consists of nine character studies by Gamaliel Bradford, in which he does for the North what he did for the South in "Confederate Portraits." His papers are not biographical but analytical: "psychographs," as he terms them. His endeavor has been to reach the modes of thought and action that dominated the Union leaders and to present them to the reader in such a way as to show their relative importance. Although it is quite beyond the compass of such brief studies to arrive at complete character-estimate, there is a wealth of information contained herein of value to the student of the Civil War Period. When the papers on Hooker and McClellan first appeared in the Atlantic they were greeted with a storm of protest. In consequence further study has changed Mr. Bradford's original estimate of Hooker. But his judgment of McClellan remains as it was first printed. In Mr. Bradford's gallery only three pictures stand out fair and strong under the light of his probing criticism: Thomas, Sherman, and Stanton.

The leading paper in the June Catholic Convert is the first part of Mr. Shane Leslie's highly interesting lecture on Cardinal Manning. He has read all of this prelate's vast correspondence and is engaged in writing a biography that will be a corrective for many of the pages in Purcell's Life. Mr. Leslie remarks, apropos of his own conversion: "Nothing would induce me to say why I became a Catholic, because I hardly know myself." He then gives the following account of "the most curious conversion that ever occurred":

> A rowing supper had been given after the university boat races, and a great many hilarious students met to break training—that is to say, to drink champagne for the first time after their period of training for the races. And with true tactfulness, they chose Ash Wednesday for the bumping supper, as it was called. It happened that one of the most promising oarsmen was a Catholic, and that he had that day attended the rites of the Church and had some mark of the ashes on his forehead, but he went on to the supper. When he entered the room, the president of the boat, requested him to withdraw and to take off the marks of his dirty religion out of the room. Whereupon being a solitary Catholic, there was only one course open for him, which he fulfilled. He took up the tureen of soup for thirty and he emptied it over the head of the president of the boat club. That is not the end of the story, because the president was so struck by this exhibition of religious fervor that he made inquiries and before the end of the term he had become a Catholic. You have probably often heard the term "souper" used in Ireland, of those who were made to become Protestants in famine time by the gift of free soup. This is the only time I ever knew when the soup was on the side of the Holy Roman Church.

Mr. West estimates that in this country during 1915 more than 40,000 were received from other religious bodies into the Catholic Church.

A large book of 728 pages gets the small title of "We." (Doubleday, Page, $1.50). It is a plea by Gerald Stanley Lee, author of "Crowds," for the United States to lead the nations to use hereafter the first person plural instead of "I" and "you." The means to employ is advertisement, i. e., self-revelation; this revelation is that Americans are sufficiently independent, and unafraid, to face Europe unarmed, and Messrs. Ford, Roosevelt, Carnegie, Rockefeller, Taft, Wilson and Bryan are judged according to their success in making known this revelation. The book is divided into "Acts," and these into "Looks," and there is hardly a dull page in it. Mr. Lee has a way of saying the ordinary thing strikingly, and the extraordinary thing quite calmly; he is thought-provoking, and if you do not always agree with him, he makes you at least find out what you really do think.——The war-correspondent, Stanley Washburn, has collected some of his articles into a book called "Victory in Defeat." (Doubleday, Page, $1.00). The defeat is the Russian retreat of 1915 from Warsaw, in which he took part, and the victory Mr. Washburn sees is one of character, unshaken in adversity. There are many graphic pages about the last days in Warsaw, and the account of the military operations from May to August is fairly convincing. In the author's view, it was a splendidly planned offensive, and a marvellous retreat.

Into a volume called "The Daughter of the Storage and Other Things in Prose and Verse" (Harper, $1.35), William Dean Howells has gathered together nineteen stories, sketches and poems that have appeared in various magazines. The tale that gives the book its title and "The Critical Bookstore" are the best stories. "Captain Dunlevy's Last Trip" is a striking narrative poem and at the end of the volume are two clever farces. ——"An Unknown Master and Other Stories" (Pilot Pub. Co., Boston, $1.15), by the Rev. Joseph A. Murphy, is a little volume containing fourteen tales of varied character, being mostly of the reminiscent type, as the author has traveled widely in Europe and the Orient and has been keenly observant of men and customs as well as of places and institutions. As he has drawn on his diary for plots, they are not complicated or unusual. The element of suspense, almost indispensable in the short-story, is well handled in "Ravelli," a tale which together with "The Unknown Master" may be taken as specimens of Father Murphy's best work. The illustrations in the book could easily be improved.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn and Bacon, Boston:
Intermediate Algebra. By H. E. Slaught and N. J. Lennes. $1.00.

The America Press, New York:
The Education of Boys. By Condé B. Pallen, Ph.D., LL.D. $0.60.

The Catholic Publication Society of America, New York:
The United Irishmen. Their Lives and Times. By Richard Robert Madden. Newly Edited with Notes, Bibliography and Index. By Vincent Fleming O'Reilly. 12 Vols. $42.00.

The City Library Association, Springfield:
Recent Poetry. A List of Some of the Best Contemporary Poetry added to the City Library during the years 1908-1915.

Eugene Figuiere, Editeur, Paris:
Plus Haut: Nouvelles. Par Patience Warren, Adaptation Française par Perrine des Ronces. 3 fr. 50.

Harvard University Press, Cambridge:
Shakespeare: an Address. By George Lyman Kittredge.

Michigan Historical Commission, Lansing, Mich.:
Names of Places of Interest on Mackinac Island, Michigan. By Rt. Rev. Frank A. O'Brien, LL.D.

Mitchell Kennerley, New York:
Modern Germany in Relation to the Great War. By Various German Writers. $2.00.

Orange Judd Co., New York:
A Living from Eggs and Poultry. By Herbert W. Brown. $0.75.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Historic Indiana. By Julia Henderson Levering. Centennial Edition Revised and Enlarged. Illustrated. $2.25; Phases of Early Christianity 100 A. D.-250 A. D. By J. Estlin Carpenter, D.Litt. $2.00.

The Paulist Press, New York:
Italian Confessions, How to Hear Them. An Easy Method for Busy Priests. By Joseph McSorley, With an Introduction by His Eminence John Cardinal Farley. $1.00.

Pierre Tequi, Libraire-Editeur, Paris:
Jésus en Croix ou la Science du Crucifix en Forme de Méditations par les Pères Pierre Marie et Jean-Nicolas Grou, Nouvelle Edition. 1 fr.; A Jésus par Marie ou La Parfaite Dévotion à la Sainte Vierge, Enseignée par le B. Grignion de Montfort. Abbé J. M. Texier. 1 fr. 50; La Guerre en Picardie, Abbé Charles Calippe. 3 fr. 50; Pour la Victoire, Nouvelles Consignes de Guerre. Mgr. J. Tissier. 3 fr. 50; Progrès de l'Ame dans la Vie Spirituelle. R. P. Frédéric-William Faber. 3 fr. 50.

Renteria, Guipuzcoa (Espagne):
Catéchisme de la Profession Religieuse (D'après les Normæ).

University of California Press, Berkeley:
Correlations and Sex Differences in Memory and Substitution. By Arthur I. Gates. $0.05; A Comparison of the Japanese Folk-Song and the Occidental, A Study in the Psychology of Form. By Sangoro Ito. $0.15; Memory and Association in the Case of Street-Car Advertising Cards. By Walter S. Heller and Warner Brown. $0.10; The Psychology and Physiology of Mirror-Writing. By Justin K. Fuller.

University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Ill.:
Public Libraries and Literary Culture in Ancient Rome. By Clarence E. Boyd. $1.00.

The University Society, New York:
Boys' and Girls' Bookshelf. Complete Edition. Prepared by the Editorial Board of the University Society Vols. I-XX, and The Child Welfare Manual, a Handbook of Child Nature and Nurture for Parents and Teachers. $39.50.

EDUCATION

Cliff Haven

CLIFF HAVEN is the permanent home of the Catholic Summer School. Happily has the spot been named; appropriately, likewise, though some think not so happily, the institution. There on the western shore of Champlain, the lordly and lovely lake, where the green-clad granite cliffs open wide their strong arms to let the gentle laughing waters run in to dance and play upon the yellow sands, the place is verily a haven, locus tutus carinis, a harbor safe for the frail skiff as well as the most timid bather, a harbor of peace whose shelving shores invite to rest and lettered ease. A school is there. Not the little red brick sort, with bell above, bespectacled master and ferule within, standing for the elements of knowledge, reading, writing and reckoning, but a school in the real old Grecian and Roman sense of the term, a place where educated people meet to discuss and hear discussed by eminent experts things of the mind, problems of the day, subjects that interest the intelligent in the broad domains of Christian apologetics, philosophy, the sciences and the arts.

A summer school it is; a pleasant place to abide when cities and towns are ovens, and urban mortals melt and sizzle. Backed by slopes of sylvan loveliness, fanned by the breath of fir-clad mountains and cooled by the breezes that always haunt the lake,

> It lies
> Deep meadow'd, happy, fair with orchard lawns
> And bowery hollows crown'd with summer seas.

RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL ATTRACTIONS

Lastly and firstly, it is a Catholic Summer School, Catholic in its foundation, its principles, its ideals, its methods, its spirit. The whole atmosphere is Catholic, sanely Catholic, broad, comprehensive, inclusive of whatever is true and good and fair; exclusive of that only which is false or base or sordid. The little chapel, named for Our Lady of the Lake, stands in the midst, a symbol at once of the motive, the aspirations, the life of Cliff Haven. The Morning Sacrifice many times multiplied at the nine altars, the never-failing evening rosary, the semi-weekly Benedictions, the triple daily Angelus, at whose peal no head on the spacious plain fails to bow in reverent salutation, all these are the outer signs of the inner Catholic spirit which pervades, unifies, fortifies and ensures the Summer School. It is this unity of faith, enwrapping all with the bonds of charity, that begets the peculiar charm of the social life which characterizes the place. All who spend some time at Cliff Haven, be they Catholics, or as is occasionally the case, non-Catholics, are struck with admiration at the natural, joyous, homelike and refined sociality of Cliff Haven. If perchance once in a while there sound a strident note in the general harmony, the immoderate frolicsomeness of some giddy girl, or the unseemly boisterousness of an ungentlemanly boy, such discords are on the whole but the ebullitions of over-fresh youth. They are probably inseparable from a large gathering of young folk, and are for their very rarity the more noticeable and consequently the apter to jar the feelings of persons who are more sensible and moderate, more thoughtful and considerate for themselves, their neighbors and for the general reputation of the institution.

THE INTELLECTUAL SIDE

But though Cliff Haven and the Catholic Summer School fully justify their name and title, it must not be forgotten that the intellectual principle is at once the primary efficient and the ultimate final cause of the institution. It was constituted and organized a "school," inclusive of the original sense of the term school described above, but not exclusive of the modern scholastic content. Moreover, the dominant motif which its founders had in mind was to establish an institution at which Catholics could obtain not only general intellectual culture and inspiration but likewise definite instruction on certain lines of knowledge and art. This purpose has always been kept in view though it has been more obviously fulfilled in some sessions than in others. Thus regular systematic courses of lectures of a pedagogical nature have been repeatedly given, while the more or less scholastic or technical elements have in no case been wholly absent from the schedule. On the other hand, Cliff Haven has never been rich enough to compete for patronage with summer schools of the large secular universities, each of which offers to its attendants elaborate courses in almost every branch of science and art imaginable, courses conducted by trained professors and equipped with all the accessories of library and laboratory with which these institutions are so richly supplied. The Catholic Summer School can of course offer to its patrons no such opulent facilities. Nevertheless, it is only the lack of funds that prevents it from doing more extensive work along scholastic lines. On the other hand, a glance over the schedule of lectures given at any one session will suffice to show that, together with the miscellaneous cultural and entertaining features, the Summer School furnishes an intellectual feast substantial and varied enough to satisfy the cravings of almost every appetite and taste. Thus, for instance, on the program for the approaching session, which opens July 2 and closes September 8, we find fifteen lectures on philosophy, ten on sociological problems, ten on international law, thirty on historical subjects, five on liturgy, five on certain scientific problems. Besides these there is a considerable number devoted to literature and to questions of the day. To these add some forty hours occupied with music and the drama, supplement the whole with the special courses, and you have "a feast of reason" from which no one need go away hungry. "The flow of soul" is contributed to the common fund by the individual banqueters.

THE SCHOOL'S WIDE INFLUENCE

Moreover, the intellectual profits of the Summer School are reaped not alone in the auditorium. There are round-table conferences given by persons of note while the easy social converse of the people with the lecturers affords an opportunity for mental gain which is often more instructive and stimulating than are the formal discourses. Besides, there is the interchange of thought with many minds of varied attainments and experience; for Cliff Haven is somewhat cosmopolitan in its clientele. People are there from all parts of the country, not to say the world, so that the advantages resulting from this social constituency are incalculable. For the rest a glance through the prospectus, which has just been issued, and which may be had by applying at the city office, in East Forty-second Street, New York, will afford fuller information regarding the intellectuality of the Catholic Summer School.

FRANCIS P. SIEGFRIED.

SOCIOLOGY

The Test of Criminal Responsibility

THE Waite trial, recently terminated by the imposition of the death penalty, presents many aspects decidedly out of the ordinary. The praiseworthy determination of the presiding Justice, Mr. Shearn, to permit no unnecessary delays, was, in the opinion of those who must have their gibe at the profession, quite as extraordinary as the defense urged by Dr. Waite. Particular attention, however, centers in the charge to the jury, stating the test of criminal responsibility.

It will be recalled that the defendant originally pleaded compulsion, inasmuch as he had been completely dominated by a person of preternatural powers, called "the man from Egypt." Later this plea was withdrawn, and the defendant confessed "premeditation, intent and motive" in the crime charged in the indictment, denied that he was, or had ever been, insane, expressed deep repentance, and asked for speedy punishment. But it was urged in his behalf by counsel that, from boyhood, he had been cruel, vindictive, untruthful, thieving and dissolute. Exculpation was not asked on the ground of ignorance; on the contrary, it was admitted that the defendant was well aware of the turpitude of his acts. "He knew what he was doing, and he knew that it was wrong." Nevertheless he had never been able to refrain for any considerable period from the commission of acts which he thoroughly condemned. It was argued that these facts showed the accused to be afflicted with a form of insanity which, leaving the intellect practically normal, impairs or wholly destroys the freedom of the will; in other words, that he was "morally insane" or "a moral imbecile."

MORAL IMBECILITY

Judge Shearn held that the plea was inadmissible under the New York Code. If the accused had committed an act which he knew to be wrong, he was amenable to the law. This section of the charge, presented with much force and clearness, in substance is as follows:

> The defense claims that this man is a moral imbecile. Now, gentlemen, no such plea as moral imbecility is admissible under the law. It may be known to the medical profession, but not to the law. The statutes of this State say that the act of an idiot, or of an insane person, is not a crime, but that to be excusable, a person must be laboring under such a defect of the reason, that he did not know the nature and quality of his act, and did not know that it was wrong.
>
> It is not a defense to say that one is an habitual criminal, or that he is a pervert, or that he is a selfish monster, or that he has a torpid moral sense. There is a difference between moral incapacity and moral indifference, and moral indifference is not insanity. Did the defendant know the nature and quality of his act? Did he know that it was wrong? This means, did he know that it was against the laws of the State in which he lived, and contrary to the commonly accepted standards of morality which we call the law of God?
>
> The question is not, whether he is sane, but whether he was responsible under the test prescribed by law; that is, did he know the nature and quality of his act, and know that it was wrong.

In its clear refusal to excuse the habitual criminal on the ground that he is necessarily insane, or to admit that the greater the crime the smaller the responsibility, this charge shows an admirable freedom from the newer heresies in criminology. It is interesting to note, in this era of pathological research, that the charge positively disallows the existence in law of a form of mental disease, in which the will rather than the intellect is deranged. Following the accepted theory, based, no doubt, on "The Rules in the Macnaughtan Case," it affirms that the test of criminal responsibility is knowledge "of the nature and quality of the act" at the time of its commission. Contrary to the current newspaper comment, there is no novelty in this decision. Since the time of Coke, one of the first of moderns to treat of the legal aspects of insanity, the test of responsibility has been made to turn upon the defendant's knowledge of the quality of his act. Insanity has therefore been defined, from a legal standpoint, as "a deranged mental condition, such as deprives a person of the capacity to comprehend the nature and consequences of a particular act."

KNOWLEDGE AND FREEDOM

On the other hand, it is a definite postulate in law, that without a free act of the will, there can be no crime. It would seem, then, by a presumption of law, that the will is free if the intellect is normal, and that knowledge of the quality of an act connotes freedom to avoid that act. As Judge Shearn intimated, this doctrine does not commend itself universally to the medical fraternity. Many pathologists admit the possibility of a morbid condition, transient or chronic, which deprives the patient of the capacity to control his acts, without affecting to any notable degree the intellectual processes. Such a patient might reason as admirably as St. Thomas on morality in general, and on the morality of a particular act presented to his consideration, but he could neither be praised nor blamed for anything that he might happen to do. The reason is plain. Premising sufficient knowledge, moral responsibility is induced by the self-determination of the will. In the present hypothesis, knowledge would be present, but the will would either be impeded in its power of choice, or completely destroyed. The subject is afflicted with an insanity which destroys the will, leaving the intellect untouched. Granted the hypothesis, the question of moral responsibility is easily settled. There is none. But does such a variety of insanity exist?

The answer depends upon our knowledge of the nature of insanity, and that, as pathologists confess, is far from complete. The Catholic pathologist, Pilcz, remarks that while the difference between an animal-like idiot as one extreme, and a scholar like Pasteur as another, is palpable, yet "there are no definite, rigid boundaries between mental disease and mental health, but only gradual transitions." Definitions have been attempted, but all are admitted to be inadequate. Tuke, however, after describing insanity as "a symptom of disease of the brain inducing disordered mental symptoms," holds that this morbid condition is characterized by "the obliteration, impairment or perversion of one or more of its (the brain's) psychical functions," and Hammond likewise notes that insanity is accompanied "by a general or partial derangement of one or more of the mental processes." Moral insanity would be readily allowed by either definition.

NORMAL INTELLECT AND WILL

A summary of the relations of intellect and will in the normal subject may facilitate the application of these observations. The will may be briefly defined as the faculty of choice. "Its specific act, when it is in full exercise, consists in selecting, by the light of reason, its object from among the various particular, conflicting aims of all the tendencies and faculties of our nature; its object is the good in general; its prerogative is choosing among different forms of good." (Maher.) The scholastics were fond of calling the will a "blind" faculty, by which it was implied that the function of the will is not speculation, but action. Judgment, reasoning, reflection and self-consciousness, are within the province of the intellect. "In judgment, the intellect perceives the identity or discordance of two concepts; by reasoning, it apprehends the connection between conclusion and premise; in reflection and self-consciousness, it affirms the identity of the knowing subject and the object known." (Maher.) Speculation is left to the intellect, and the will, acting upon the knowledge thus obtained, freely determines itself. Normally, therefore, formal choice is preceded by formal deliberation.

These processes are typical of the normal mind, the intellect preceding in its quest of truth, and the will following in its self-determination, in the light afforded by the intellect. A description of them is like the report of the mechanical engineer on the smooth operation of an automobile, before the small boy drops a monkey-wrench into the interior of the delicate mechanism. The machine stops. It may be for one or many reasons. No parts are missing, but their coordination has been disturbed. Similarly, when disease drops into man's mental machinery, sanity stops. It may be for one, or for several reasons. The man is still a man, but there is lack of coordination between his mental and his physical parts. The learned disquisitions of the psychologists, patient and detailed, are of value, perhaps, in planning a reconstruction, but they no longer accurately describe the workings of a mind overthrown.

A Speculative Question

For the moralist, the question of moral insanity is largely if not wholly, speculative. When the intellect is patently absent, both moral and legal responsibility lapse. If so impaired that the subject "does not know the nature and quality of the act, that it is wrong," the patient is not amenable to the law; there may, or may not, be some degree of moral responsibility, although, generally speaking, formal moral guilt is not imputable. When the will, the power of choice, is in question, the matter is not so clear. It may be said that every form of insanity weakens the will, and to this extent lessens moral responsibility; indeed, if the mental disorder destroys the power of choice, there is no moral responsibility whatever. Finally, it seems intrinsically possible that disease can bear directly upon the will, forcing the subject to the commission of acts condemned by the intellect, which remains normal, as criminal. Catholic psychologists commonly hold that a thoroughly normal intellect cannot coexist with a complete absence of the power of choice. Many pathologists hold that it can, and their view has been accepted in some jurisdictions. According to Renter in the "Encyclopedia of English Laws," the criminal codes of Queensland and the Cape of Good Hope provide that "a person is not criminally responsible for an act, if at the time of doing it, he was in such a state of mental disease as to deprive him of the capacity to control his acts," and the same authority states that "on the continent of Europe, moral insanity and irresistible impulse are freely recognized as exculpatory pleas." It should be remembered, however, that the existence of insanity in this form has yet to receive satisfactory demonstration.

Possibility of Abuse

In comparison with these liberal provisions, the common ruling, as stated by Judge Shearn, may seem unduly narrow. But insanity as a rightful plea in defense stands in no danger of exclusion from our American courts. The peril lies rather in too indulgent an interpretation of its validity. "In cases of the so-called moral insanity," writes Pilcz, "one must be unusually skeptical, if one is to avoid favoring the introduction of the most dangerous abuses into the administration of justice." There is a world of needed wisdom in this counsel. In our erudite day, the Sunday supplement, with its cheerful disregard for facts and principles, is a forum for all criminal cases, and under the influence of the pathologists some of us are beginning to believe that sin is an error of mortal mind, to be eliminated by declaring that it does not exist. But whatever the pathologists may teach us, in the life of the normal man, sin and responsibility for sin must remain facts as certain as the fact of his subjection to the law of God.

P. L. B.

NOTE AND COMMENT

An attempt of the St. Louis Board of Education to discriminate against Catholic schools was recently overruled by Judge Hennings of the Circuit Court. The Board had refused to admit a graduate of a Catholic high school to the Harris Teachers' College, a training school for public school teachers, on the same favorable terms granted to public high school graduates. The demurrer of the Board of Education was founded upon the claim that the Harris Teachers' College was not part of the public school system. Though the Board actually conducts the school, it is not directed by law to do so. The Judge's decision reads:

> An advanced school, maintained by taxes for school purposes, can no more be conducted for some to the exclusion of others with equal qualification than can any other school. To do so would be contrary to natural right and the manifest purpose of those paying taxes for school purposes.

The petition to admit the Catholic pupil on equal terms with public-school graduates had been signed by thirty-eight taxpayers before it was submitted to the Board of Education.

Announcement is made of a number of retreats for laymen and women to be given at Techny, Illinois, by the Fathers of the Society of the Divine Word. Ample opportunity is afforded for all to partake of this renewal of the spiritual life. Retreats for men and young men will be given in English, July 6-9 and July 27-30; in German, July 13-16. Retreats for women will occur in the following order: a German retreat for both married and unmarried women, June 29-July 2; an English retreat for married women, July 9-12; and two English retreats for unmarried women, July 20-23 and August 3-6. Application for the men's retreats are to be made to St. Mary's Mission House, and for the women's to St. Ann's Home, Techny, Illinois. Announcement is also made of a special retreat for women teachers at St. Elizabeth's College, Convent Station, N. J., under the auspices of the Catholic Teachers' Gild, July 9-12. Similar teachers' retreats are annually given at Brentwood, L. I., and at Boston.

Our Catholic musical inheritance is widely utilized by secular organizations. A favorite production is Verdi's "Requiem Mass," which has frequently been presented by opera companies and choral societies, but never perhaps on so large a scale as in the first outdoor presentation of it in New York under the auspices of the National Open Air Festival Society. The chorus consisted of 1,200 singers selected from among the leading choral societies of New York, the accompaniments were played by an orchestra of 120 and among the soloists were four world-wide celebrities: Giovanni Zenatello, Mme. Maria Gay, Miss Lucille Lawrence and Léon Rothier. All these immense forces were under the leadership of Mr. Louis Koemmenich. To make it possible to carry out the production "on a scale of magnitude such as will inaugurate a new era in the musical development of this country," the New York Polo Grounds were chosen and a huge stage constructed with a sounding-board large enough to reflect the sound of the many voices. It was an ambitious undertaking crowned with deserved success.

Referring to the statement of a Harvard Professor that Washington was a rather dull and a decidedly badly-educated man, a writer in Our Town, the Greenwich magazine newspaper, says:

> To think and to say a smart thing or a "new thing" doesn't amount to a very great deal. To think and to act true things does amount to greatness itself. Book-learning and quickness of wits enable a man to think and say clever, witty things, often so expressed as to pass as "new." But they do not even help toward the truth, which is always as old as the hills, nor toward acting in conformity with the old truth with the fortitude and fidelity of a really great man.
>
> Washington's greatness, as Lincoln's, is a matter of character rather than of achievement, large as were the achievements of both. Neither of them can be placed beside the world's greatest intellects. But their place is not below the intellectually great of the world, it is above, very far above them.

Education is an invaluable asset for life. Lincoln's struggle to educate himself amid the most adverse and discouraging circumstances only brings home more strongly the truth of the adage that knowledge is power. But education without morality and religion, education without character is likely to be a danger and a bane to civilization. Character without brilliancy may achieve great things. Brilliancy without character is the ruin of men and of nations.

Religious bigotry not seldom overreaches itself. Such apparently was the case when recently it culminated, at St. Augustine, Florida, in the imprisonment of three Catholic Sisters under the heinous charge of having taught colored children, in their Catholic school, the knowledge and love of God. The act of violence, perpetrated under cover of the law, in a city where three and a half centuries ago, in 1565, the first Mass was said, can hardly fail to be without its good effects. The bitter intolerance which stretched out its hands against virgins consecrated to God and the service of their neighbor inevitably led to a decision of the Circuit Court freeing the Sisters and declaring unconstitutional the law under which such an abomination had occurred. It could hardly fail, moreover, to arouse intelligent interest in the Catholic Church. The words of the Bishop of St. Augustine, quoted in the New Orleans Morning Star, tell of an experience that does not surprise us:

> During my two years as Bishop I have given Confirmation in many places, in fact, all over the State, and your readers will be glad to know that I have never yet administered the Sacrament without having converts to the Faith in the class. Here's a paradox for you: some of those converts trace the occasion of their first turning to the Church to the campaign of vilification now going on. They started to inquire; they read Catholic books; they discovered the truth of the Church and the falsity of the tramp spouters, and today those searchers after truth are Catholics. I have told the bigots already, and I tell them again, that we Catholics know no fear. When they are all dead and gone and absolutely forgotten the Catholic Church will be here doing God's work as she is doing it today. She worries as much about them as does the silvery moon about the barking puppy on the porch.

Doubtless much harm can be done during their brief day by anti-patriotic cliques of the Guardians of Liberty stamp and by weather-vane politicians such as the Governor of Florida who enforced unconstitutional law against defenseless women who are revered by angels and men. Yet by God's power these evils can often be turned into blessings. They can help to unite Catholics, to stir them to action, to inflame them with zeal and, through the interest created, to bring the truths of the Church to the knowledge of many who are groping toward the light.

The Ozanam Bulletin publishes an article by the late Thomas M. Mulry on the Ozanam Association. Organized in 1908, the Association has already established nine club houses devoted "to training to right character the boys of Catholic faith in the congested localities of New York City." Referring to this splendid work the great Vincentian wrote:

> Let us always recollect that "God helps those who help themselves"; hence, we must expect no sympathy if we stand idly by with folded arms, weakly indifferent to all that goes on about us, allowing others to take our boys from us and providing them with that which it is the bounden duty of Catholics to furnish. Let us take care of our Catholic boys; let us provide them with that for which they naturally crave, and they will not be found going elsewhere and eventually drifting away from the faith of their forefathers. That many of our young men in the past have fallen away from the faith through influences which might quite readily have been counteracted, is unquestionably most mortifying and heart-rending. It will not suffice, however, for us simply to grieve over the past. If we are to effect any change we must, aided by the experience of the past, make such provisions for the future that history will not repeat itself.

Abundant recruits for this work, he believed, should go forth from our Catholic colleges and universities. "If they do not, then had these centers of education better change their curriculum." If they fail to teach practical self-sacrifice and to inculcate this spirit into the minds and hearts of their students, "then the sooner they retire from business, the better for the cause of religion." These are strong words from one who was himself, after the example of his Master, the meekest of men.

The following table indicates the actual condition of Protestantism in the various Latin-American countries. It was officially prepared by the Panama Commission on "Survey and Occupation," on whose executive committee was Dr. H. K. Carroll. Only the totals are given here, but they will suffice to form an accurate estimate of Protestant activity. Column I represents the total number of foreign missionaries, including men and women and the foreign missionary physicians; column II, the native Latin-American Protestant missionaries, ordained and unordained, men and women; column III, the number of full communicants; column IV, the "Christian adherents, baptized and unbaptized" of all ages; column V, the Sunday-school membership, and column VI, the number of missionary societies, American and British, engaged in the respective countries. Only one Continental society is included:

	I	II	III	IV	V	VI
Argentine Republic	259	226	6,407	3,550	5,725	15
Chile	148	142	5,715	4,493	7,081	9
Uruguay	29	29	1,195	2,700	1,153	6
Paraguay	33	11	119	66	142	6
Brazil	289	343	31,948	8,590	10,215	13
Bolivia	59	2	87	71	77	6
Peru	47	62	1,326	383	1,170	6
Ecuador	24	8	40	19	30	5
Dutch Guiana	88	409	7,786	20,320	2,026	1
British Guiana	102	287	20,049	2,853	5,624	12
Venezuela	14	8	117	205	165	5
Colombia	22	39	326	1,203	558	4
Central America, including Panama	129	296	8,774	8,469	8,984	14
Mexico	216	598	19,518	24,193	13,687	15
Lesser Antilles and Bahamas	126	664	82,308	277,557	55,339	9
Porto Rico	134	233	12,143	4,694	19,567	13
Haiti and Santo Domingo	31	70	2,908	7,062	1,540	8
Jamaica	119	541	45,232	51,355	38,482	11
Cuba	141	193	11,105	4,154	10,560	12

The total number of foreign Protestant missionaries in all these countries is 2,010. They are divided as follows: Ordained missionaries, 700; physicians, men and women, 34; lay male missionaries, not physicians, 280; married women, not physicians, 580; unmarried women and widows, not physicians, 418. The total number of native, Latin-American Protestant missionaries is 4,161. They are thus divided: Ordained men, 566; unordained men, preachers, teachers and other workers, 2,540; women missionaries, consisting of Bible women, teachers and other workers, 1,055. There are 575 stations with resident foreign missionaries and 1,963 sub-stations having regular work. The church organizations number 1,982, the full communicants, 257,103, and the adherents, 421,937. There are 35 theological, normal and training schools, 101 boarding and high schools and 1,000 elementary and village schools. The total contributions of Latin Americans in United States gold are estimated at $919,808. Medical missions have been established in nine of the Latin-American countries. Mexico has one hospital and five dispensaries and Porto Rico three hospitals and nine dispensaries under Protestant control. Naturally these interesting statistics are not complete, since it was impossible for the Commission to secure returns from all the missionary societies, but they are sufficiently suggestive of the work that is being done by the various Protestant denominations. Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires and the City of Mexico have been selected for the founding of universities, and a college is to be erected at Panama. Theological seminaries and publishing agencies are to be established in seven leading cities. A seminary is to be opened during the coming autumn in the City of Mexico and the several mission presses of Buenos Aires are to be consolidated into one large establishment. For a correct perspective we must take into account the population of these Latin-American countries, which often mounts up into the millions. Thus Colombia has 5,000,000 inhabitants, Central America 6,000,000, Peru 4,000,000, Uruguay 2,000,000, and Brazil as many as 25,000,000.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 11 } JUNE 24, 1916 { $3.00 A YEAR
WHOLE No. 376 } { PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE

Home News: The Democratic Convention—The War: Bulletin, June 13, p. m.-June 20, a.m. —The Russian Offensive. France: The French Army Orphanage. Germany: The Chancellor and Peace. Ireland: Bishop O'Dwyer and General Maxwell. Italy: The New Boselli Cabinet. Mexico: International Difficulties — The Press and the Church.....245-248

TOPICS OF INTEREST

"Agenics"—The Boys of Our City: San Francisco — Body and Mind: Some Contrasts — "Patent Insides"—The Charity of a Catholic Monarch 249-256

COMMUNICATIONS

French War Orphans—The Ever Neutral Flag —Who Was Father Boulanger?.....256, 257

EDITORIALS

Lawlessness and the Courts—"Unionizing" Authorship — Our "Sacred Fund" — The Outlook and the Dunphy Case—A Crisis in Catholic History—Children and Dangers.....258-260

LITERATURE

"Risus Filiorum Del."

REVIEWS: The Memory of Our Dead—G. K. Chesterton: a Criticism — Old Judge Priest — The Stories of H. C. Bunner—Paul Mary Pakenham, Passionist—The Riddle of Personality—Reveries Over Childhood and Youth.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: A Pamphlet on the New York Charities Investigation—"The Way of All Flesh"—"Yonder?"—"Shakspere"—"How Diplomats Make War"—"What is Coming?" "New Wars for Old" — "Father Bernard's Parish"—"When Pan Pipes"—The Catholic Mind—"Paradoxical Pain".....261-265

EDUCATION

Vacation Time 265

SOCIOLOGY

Fag-Ends of the Charities Investigation..266,267

NOTE AND COMMENT

Ecclesiastical Vaudeville—Real Stone Clothes—Classical Studies in the United States — The Meaning of Yiddish — Saving Catholic Children in India—Catholic Converts During 1915—The Work of the Colored Missions—Scienkiewicz and the Polish War Relief.....267, 268

CHRONICLE

Home News.—On June 16 the Democratic National Convention came to a close after nominating by acclamation Messrs. Wilson and Marshall for the office of President and Vice-President, respectively. The party Platform opens with an endorsement of the administration of Woodrow Wilson, and proceeds to this arraignment of the policy of the Republican party:

The Democratic Convention

We found our country hampered by special privilege, a vicious tariff, obsolete banking laws and an inelastic currency. Our foreign affairs were dominated by commercial interests for their selfish ends. The Republican party, despite repeated pledges, was impotent to correct abuses which it had fostered. Under our administration, under a leadership which has never faltered, these abuses have been corrected, and our people have been freed therefrom. Our archaic banking and currency system, prolific of panic and disaster under Republican administration, long the refuge of the money trust, has been supplanted by the Federal reserve act, a true democracy of credit, under Government control, already proved a financial bulwark in a world crisis, mobilizing our resources, placing abundant credit at the disposal of legitimate industry and making a currency panic impossible.

The document then stresses the good effected by the Federal Trade Commission and the Underwood Tariff, and praises legislation in behalf of labor, and the Parcel Post. "We have lifted human labor from the category of commodities and have secured to the workingman the right of voluntary association for his protection and welfare."

We have advanced the parcel post to genuine efficiency, enlarged the postal savings system, added 10,000 rural delivery routes and extensions, thus reaching 2,500,000 additional people; improved postal service in every branch and for the first time in our history placed the post office system on a self-supporting basis, with actual surpluses in 1913, 1914 and 1915.

That tariff rates are necessarily subject to change is admitted, and to ascertain just what change may be called for, the Democratic Congress

Is providing for a non-partisan tariff commission, to make impartial and thorough study of every economic fact that may throw light either upon our past or upon our future fiscal policy with regard to the imposition of taxes on imports, or with regard to the changed and changing conditions under which our trade is carried on.

We cordially indorse this timely proposal and declare ourselves in sympathy with the principle and purpose of shaping legislation within that field in accordance with clearly-established facts, rather than in accordance with the demands of selfish interests or upon information provided largely, if not exclusively, by them.

A plank on Americanism calls on men of whatever origin or creed, to unite in making clear to the world the unity and consequent power of America. That a limited number of citizens have conspired to coerce our Government in its dealings with foreign powers is charged and such conspiracies are condemned. The question of preparedness is next discussed, and an adequate "defense policy," as regards army and navy, is fully approved. In regard to our international relations, the Platform's claim is that

The Democratic Administration has, throughout the present war, scrupulously and successfully held to the old paths of neutrality and to the peaceful pursuit of the legitimate objects of our national life which statesmen of all parties and creeds have prescribed for themselves in America since the beginning of our history. But the circumstances of the last two years have revealed necessities of international action which no former generation can have foreseen. We hold that it is the duty of the United States to use its power, not only to make itself safe at home, but also to make secure its just interests throughout the world, and both for this end and in the interest of humanity to assist the world in securing settled peace and justice.

The Democratic party stands before the country as the advocate of world-peace and Pan-American concord, pledging itself to maintain in all its strictness the great principles of the Monroe Doctrine. Relations with Mexico and the Administration's attitude on the Mexican question are summed up in the following paragraph:

> The want of a stable, responsible Government in Mexico, capable of repressing and punishing marauders and bandit bands, who have not only taken the lives and seized and destroyed the property of American citizens in that country but have insolently invaded our soil, made war upon and murdered our people thereon, has rendered it necessary temporarily to occupy by our armed forces, a portion of the territory of that friendly State. Until, by a restoration of law and order therein, a repetition of such incursions is improbable, the necessity for their remaining will continue. They must remain. Intervention, implying as it does military subjugation, is revolting to the people of the United States notwithstanding that provocation to that course has been great, and should be resorted to, if at all, only as a last resort. The stubborn resistance of the President and his advisers to every demand and suggestion to enter upon it is creditable alike to them and to the people in whose name he speaks.

The merchant marine, conservation of natural resources, rural credits, government employment and the labor question, are treated in separate planks. A Federal child-labor law, a Federal bureau of safety and employment bureau are advocated. The extension of suffrage to the women of the country by the States is recommended. The platform concludes by advocating the protection of citizens at home and abroad, and a continuance of the policy regarding Federal prison reform. There is a plea for generous pensions, and the development of our waterways, with a statement on territorial policy. The last word is a tribute to the President and an appeal to the voters of the nation to support him in this critical hour.

The press of the country has published the Platform in full, and commented upon it diversely. Instance the Baltimore Sun's hearty commendation and the New York Evening Sun's declaration that the convention "has been a humiliation to the entire country. Of all the boss-ridden performances that have been witnessed in a generation it has been easily the worst. There has not been manliness or public spirit enough among the 1,093 component members to cause even a wrangle on the floor."

The War.—The Canadians have regained 1,500 yards of trenches southeast of Zillebeke, but elsewhere in Belgium there has been no change in the situation. The line in France also has remained unmodified. In the Verdun district there has been a comparative lull, and operations have been confined for the most part to artillery engagements, which have been very violent at Hill 304 and near Chattancourt. On the west side of the Meuse the French have taken a German trench on the southern slope of Mort Homme Hill, part of which they subsequently lost. On the east side of the Meuse the Germans have secured a footing on the eastern slope of Hill 321 and on both sides of the ridge southwest of Douaumont. None of these gains, however, has been important.

Bulletin, June 13, p. m.-June 20, a. m.

A marked diminution in the strength of the Austrian offensive in the Trentino has been the result of the Russian attack in Volhynia, Galicia and Bukowina. The Austrians have captured most of Monte Lemerle. They have also endeavored to take Monte Forni Alti, the Campiglia, Monte Ciove and Monte Brazone, but in all these places they have been repulsed. The Italians are said to have begun a general counter-offensive. In the Lagarina Valley they have recovered the line east of Cima Messana, from Parmesan to Rio Rimini. They have also captured Malga, Fossetta and Monte Magari in the Asiago district.

In Armenia the Turks have gained a minor victory over the Russians south of Tcheulemreck and east of Amachien. In Persia they have driven the Russians out of Bana. In Mesopotamia both British and Turks claim victories on the Tigris. In German East Africa, the Belgians have occupied Msambura, and have reached Lusaraki and Kasima. In the same region the British have occupied Wilhelmstal and Tanga, and have reached Kuyuni.

The Russian offensive against the Austrians, although it has been somewhat retarded during the past week, has continued to make progress. Between the Pripet and Kolki, the Russians have crossed the Styr, advanced more than five miles on a front of about thirty miles and in some places reached the Stokod River. Southwest of Kolki, in the Lutsk district they have compelled the evacuation of Torgovitsa, a strong fortification at the juncture of the Styr and the Ikwa, have occupied Sokul, Rojitche and Torchin; operating on a base of more than sixty miles, they have driven a salient into the Austrian lines in this region that has reached the vicinity of Lokatchi, thirty-two miles south of Kovel and about twenty miles southeast of Vladimir-Volynski. This is the greatest Russian gain, and represents an advance of forty miles. Further south, advancing from Dubno, they have captured Kozin and Radziwilow, and are six miles northeast of Brody. In the sector, however, that runs south from Radziwilow to a point west and south of Tarnopol, the Russians have made no impression on the Austrian positions, which have been heavily reenforced with a view to saving Lemberg. Still further south, the Russians have driven another wedge into the Austrian lines, for they have occupied Wisniovczyk and Buczacz, and crossed the Strypa at both points. The rest of the Strypa, from Buczacz to the Dniester, is in the hands of the Austrians. The Russians have also taken Zaleszczyki, crossed the Dniester, and captured Horodenka. They have also occupied Sniatyn and Czernowitz.

The Russian Offensive

France.—In view of the recent controversy over the "French Army Orphanage," the following letter of the late Cardinal Sevin, Archbishop of Lyons, to his Emin-

The French Army Orphanage

ence, Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, is of unusual interest:

Your Eminence: Allow me respectfully to call your attention to the unscrupulous propaganda actually carried on in North America by Madame —— for the Army Orphanage, and to the peril resulting from this campaign in France to the Catholic Faith and to the sacred cause of free education, the necessary corollary of freedom of conscience.

Madame ——, the founder in France of the Army Orphanage, had intended to endow it with the funds proceeding from a "War Orphans' Day." She did not succeed in this undertaking. She then remembered she was an American and returned to her native country, where she has very skilfully exploited the generosity of her countrymen for the development of her plans. She has organized in New York, Room 336, Fifth Avenue Building, a committee which has already gathered more than $100,000. She is carrying on in France a similar campaign with the help of M. Liard, Vice-Rector of the University of Paris, of M. Arthur Meyer and of M. Joseph Reinach, and of a Franco-American Committee. Her purpose is to gather together those helpless orphans whose fathers have fallen at the front. M. Liard is attempting to interest in this work all the children of our secularist schools, and to use the influences of the work known as the "Association of the School Penny." Thanks to the funds coming from America and from unbelievers, they will thus get hold of these unfortunate children to educate them in hatred of God and the Church.

I dare beg of your Eminence to put the Faithful on guard against such a propaganda and to exhort them to exercise their generosity toward all our Catholic works and associations for the orphans.

I trust it will not be too bold in me to beg you to organize in the United States, in concert with your eminent and most reverend colleagues, a "Catholic War Orphan Association." Mgr. Joseph Freri would willingly and efficiently act as secretary.

I remain, your Eminence, etc.

H. I. CARDINAL SEVIN,
Archbishop of Lyons and Vienne.

Another view of this same problem will be found in a letter printed in this issue.

Germany.—On June 16 the German Chancellor, von Bethmann-Hollweg, addressed the Reichstag during the third reading of the budget. Once again he insisted on Germany's desire for peace, declaring:

The Chancellor and Peace

Six months ago, on December 9, I first spoke about our readiness for peace on a basis of our military situation. I could do this, confident that the situation created by the war would develop still more to our advantage. Events have justified this confidence. Further progress has been made and we are stronger on all fronts than before. If I, considering this evolution, declared that we are ready for peace, there is now no reason to regret my words, although our offer had no success with our enemies. During the critical days of July, 1914, every statesman had duly before God, before his country and before his conscience the duty to leave nothing untried which might preserve an honorable peace. In the same fashion we, after a successful defense, will neglect nothing which might shorten the terrible sufferings of the European nations in the midst of such a conflagration. Later on I said to American newspapermen that peace negotiations can lead to success only when undertaken by responsible statesmen of the belligerent countries and on a basis of a real military situation as shown by every map of the war. This was rejected by our opponents. They refuse to recognize the map of the war. They hope they will correct that map. Meantime, the map of the war has undergone other changes, but all to our advantage. We have entered upon that map the capitulation of the English at Kut-el-Amara, the French defeats of Verdun and the failure of the Russian offensive during March, as well as the powerful advance of our Allies against Italy and the increased strength of our lines at Salonica.

The Allies refuse to take the Chancellor's words seriously. They affirm that since victory for them is only a matter of time, the war must go on "till Prussian militarism is crushed."

Ireland.—The Cork Weekly Examiner contains in full the correspondence which has lately taken place between Rt. Rev. Dr. O'Dwyer, Bishop of Limerick, and General Maxwell, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland. On May 6 the General requested the Bishop to remove from a certain locality in the county of Limerick two priests, whose presence in that neighborhood the General considered dangerous "to the peace and safety of the realm," and assign them to employment which would "deny them having intercourse with the people." The Bishop informed the General that such action would be a severe punishment which a Bishop has no right to inflict except on a definite charge supported by evidence. He asked the Commander-in-Chief to specify his charges, and promised to investigate the matter. He added: "Whatever may be the rights of the military authorities acting under martial law, a Bishop in the exercise of his authority has to follow the rules of ecclesiastical procedure." General Maxwell specified his charges as follows:

Bishop O'Dwyer and General Maxwell

Father —— has been reported as, on November 14, 1915, speaking in his church at —— against conscription. He is said to have attended a lecture by P. H. Pearse on the "Irish Volunteers of '82," and to have blessed the Colors of the Irish Volunteers at —— on January 2, 1916; also speaking at a meeting that took place at —— on March 17, 1916. Father —— is said to have been active with a certain E. Blythe, organizing Irish Volunteers. In November, 1915, he got printed a large number of leaflets appealing to young men of the Gaelic Athletic Association to join the Irish Volunteers. He is said to be president of the Irish Volunteers at —— and ——. He is said to have been present at the Irish Volunteer meeting at —— when a certain John McDermott delivered inflammatory and seditious speeches on March 17, 1916.

To this the Bishop replied:

I have read carefully your allegations against Rev. —— and Rev. ——, but do not see in them any justification for disciplinary action on my part. They are both excellent priests, who hold strong National views, but I do not know that they have violated any law, civil or ecclesiastical. In your letter of sixth inst. you appealed to me to help you in the furtherance of your work as military dictator of Ireland. Even if action of that kind was not outside my province, the events of the past few weeks would make it impossible for me to have any part in proceedings which I regard as wantonly cruel and oppressive. You remember the Jameson Raid, when a number of buccaneers invaded a friendly State, and fought the forces of the lawful Government. If ever men deserved the supreme punishment it was they. But, officially and unofficially, the influence of the British Government was used to save them, and it succeeded. You took care that no plea for mercy should interpose on behalf of the poor young fellows who surrendered to you in Dublin. The first information which we got of their fate was the announcement that they had been shot in cold blood. Personally, I regard your action with horror, and I believe that it has outraged the conscience of the country. Then the deporting by hundreds and even thousands of poor fellows without a trial of any kind, seems to me an abuse of power, as fatuous as it is arbitrary; and altogether your régime has been one of the worst and blackest chapters in the history of the misgovernment of this country.

The Irish papers contain no further item about the incident.

Italy.—The Ministerial crisis which resulted in the fall of Premier Salandra and his Cabinet, though at the first moment seemingly inexplicable, had for some time been inevitable. Two months ago, the Chamber adjourned on a vote giving a large majority for the Cabinet, after the leaders of the different parties had urged the Government to widen its composition so as to permit all parties to participate effectively in the direction of the war. Premier Salandra and Foreign Minister Sonnino declined then to add new members to the Cabinet. During the recess of Parliament, they did not keep in touch through the press with the members of Parliament, with the political organizations and the country. After the recent reverses on the Trentino, the criticism of the Opposition became more bitter. The immediate cause of the overthrow of the late Cabinet is due to the failure of the Chamber of Deputies to pass a vote of confidence in the Government following the presentation of the budget of the Minister of the Interior. After a delay of a few days, a coalition Cabinet has been formed. In addition to Radicals, Democrats and Conservatives, it includes two Socialists, one Republican, one Catholic, and a follower of Giollitti. Four Members are without portfolios. The new Premier is Paolo Boselli; Baron Sonnino remains Minister of Foreign Affairs; General Morrone and Vice-Admiral Corsi are Ministers of War and of the Navy respectively; Leonida Bissolati-Bergamaschi, Member without portfolio, is entrusted with the civil service connected with the war; Vittorio Orlando is Minister of the Interior, Paolo Carcano of the Treasury, Francesco Ruffini of Public Instruction. Other ministers are Nave, Arlotta, Acchi, Medda, Bonomi, Berra, Colosimo, Scialoia, Ranieri and Comandini.

The New Boselli Cabinet

Mexico.—The tension between the United States and Mexico has now become acute. On June 18 the President ordered the militia of all the States mustered into service, and his note, drawn in answer to Carranza's communication, rejects the demand for the withdrawal of the American troops, rebukes the "First Chief" for impugning the motives of our Administration, informs him that he has failed to police Chihuahua and intimates that his conduct is open to suspicion. Meantime the bandits in Mexico have defied the United States. According to press dispatches, General Trevino sent a curt note to General Pershing ordering him to withdraw the American troops immediately, declaring that if they were moved south, east or west, the Carranzista army would attack them. Pershing is reported to have replied as follows:

International Difficulties

I have not received orders to remain stationary or to withdraw. If I see fit to send troops in pursuit of bandits to the south, east or west in keeping with the object of this expedition, I will do so. If any attack is made on any part of my forces while performing such duties the entire military strength of the expedition will be used against the attacking force.

Gen. Trevino, as commander-in-chief of the de facto troops in the north, will be held responsible for Mexican forces within striking distances of American forces.

Raids across the border are still taking place at regular intervals, and the Mexicans, well supplied with arms and ammunition from the United States, are busy preparing for war. Even the school children are dragooned into anti-American demonstrations by their teachers who hold office by grace of Carranza. Despite this it must not be forgotten that the Mexican nation as a whole is not anti-American. It too is a victim of bandits fostered by the United States.

The Carranzista papers are still waging a relentless war against morality and religion. El Democrata for May 27 carries a long and calumnious article signed by J. A. Phillips, in which the following sentiments are found:

The Press and the Church

The basic principles of every nation are justice and love. Truth, honesty, regard and sympathy for others are foundation-stones of the State. The rule of Rome is incompatible with every republican government, for the following reasons: Romanism teaches ex cathedra . . . that the State must be subject to the Church. The Church of Rome teaches that every Romanist must obey its legitimate pastors and especially the Pope, that its members must ask their confessors how to vote, that it is a mortal sin not to vote against a Liberal. . . . If confessors have thus the right to intrigue against the State, if the priest is not bound to be a moral man, if the Church has the right to teach immorality, if devotees and bigots must obey their priests, then such power . . . is a peril and a danger to morality and the State. . . . Rome teaches its followers that theft is permissible. . . . Lying, immorality in its clergy, opposition to the State are crimes duly authorized by the Apostolic and Roman Church, and for this reason the existence of this Church is not compatible with a republican form of government.

El Pueblo, another organ of outrage and banditry, attacked the Church viciously until Carranza sent his last note to our Administration. Immediately after that it printed a violent editorial against President Wilson, in which these words are found:

Already the Americans see General Scott in the National and Chapultepec palaces, . . . with Pancho Villa as his Secretary of War, . . . destroying our institutions and substituting for them Protestant churches—cold and indifferent as the face of President Wilson and long-faced pastors.

Thus the devil became a saint over night.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

"Agenics"

LATELY we have had eugenics ad nauseam. Through skilful advertising, it has become a fetish within the decade, and imperceptibly a crop of allied sciences or fads has sprouted from its root. The ugliest of these scientific offshoots is one that curiously enough, if it reaches maturity, must destroy the parent, since its purpose is not the Pharisaic "quality rather than quantity," but out-and-out nonentity.

This derivative science has not yet risen to the dignity of a specific name. It is known variously as birth control, eugenic selection, infanticide, or child-murder, according as it is practised by the exclusives, the intellectuals, the depraved, or the Chinese. Now that it has advanced to the point of having open advocates on the lecture platform and in the press, it should have, for the sake of convenience, "a local habitation and a name" in the dictionaries and encyclopedias, and I think no term can label it more accurately as a science than the word "agenics," the science of the deliberate annihilation of human life, the science of the purposely childless wife.

The wilfully childless wife with a dog in her arms is the uttermost symbol of failure. This seems a hard saying when we look out over the mad world strewn with human wreckage, and when we consider that wherever the sun in all its course casts a shadow, those are to be found in plenty who have missed their way in life through poverty or ill-health or lack of opportunity or defect of ability or some one or other of a thousand misfortunes or through one of the seven deadly sins or a combination of them. And yet no one of these can have failed quite so miserably as the wife who through deliberate will establishes a dumb brute in the affections that were made to cherish a wingless cherub fashioned in the very image of God.

Obviously the failures in life are based on the fact of life; no life—no pain, no sin, no suffering, only nothingness. It is in this case alone—and it is this that makes it the supreme failure—that there is a reaching-out into the mysterious realm that precedes life, to the enactment there, by an act against nature, of a tragedy compared with which other ills are commonplace. In that realm, which is the eternal counsel of God, there are myriad souls awaiting the cooperation of woman for creation and incarnation. She alone can defeat the eternal design of God; she alone can make it effective. It is true that every sin, in its own weak way, blocks the harmonious fulfilment of the plan of the Creator, but the wife who refuses to be God's instrument of life rebels against creation, and that in the face of the transcendent gift of her own creation. Her attitude is, in effect, the appalling one that so far as she is concerned creation shall end with her. She does not will to reject the gift of life for herself; but she decides that the line of life, in so far as it depends upon her, shall come to an abrupt close.

What matters to her the infinite purpose of God or the failure of souls to come into immortal being? A lap-dog satisfies her yearnings for creation and for correspondence with the duty set to her hand by her Lord and Master. She will not serve; she will not be "the handmaid of the Lord"; she has received her own existence as a pure gift; she will enjoy it while she may, then let the deluge come. Lucifer rebelled against the living God; she rebels against life itself. Lucifer would rule life; she would destroy it. The parallel is terrible, but the fact is more terrible still. No other being beside such a woman can or will dry up and make barren the source of life, and that to no other purpose than that she may riot more abundantly, though it be only the silly riot of idleness and self-indulgence. Such a woman—and can it be said that there are not many of them?—may hang her throat with pearls and circle her fingers with sapphires, her limousine may be fragrant with the breath of orchids, and her drawing-room may be draped with tapestries and inlaid with lapis lazuli; but her spirit is dead and is wrapped in the vesture of the grave, when her face is turned away from the souls that God has assigned her from all eternity to clothe in fair young flesh. An Angel Gabriel is sent her, a wedded wife, "with tidings of great joy," but she rejects him; she will have no part in the incarnation appointed her; there is no "Magnificat" in her heart or on her lips; most lamentably for her, no sword pierces her heart; and though "the wideness of God's mercy" is for her as for all, most lamentable of all her misfortunes, she can never know a Calvary of her own.

The attitude of the modern world toward the wilfully barren wife is amazing. She has come to be looked upon as a rather superior person. She assumes and is encouraged in assuming the patronage of mothers. She is stage-crazy over the latest baby in the block; she adores Mrs. Smith's twins; she simply cannot keep her hands from off Mary Brown's baby boy; she is Lady Bountiful to the Jones tribe of children, though she does sympathize with Mrs. Jones; she lets it be known that she really would like to have a dear little baby of her own, if a child of hers could possibly have as little sense as her dear Fido. There is no brand on her forehead. Far from it, there is just the suggestion of a crown. She has laid hold of much of the skill of the devil in transforming darkness into light. Her neighbors begin to remark over the pity that such a splendid woman, or lady it will probably be, should be childless. But then it would never do for her to be burdened with family cares since that would mean withdrawal from charitable work and social duties. No, it is too bad that she should have to give up the hope of being a matrem filiorum lætantem, but she is altogether too important for that. God would have difficulty in handling matters without her unhampered help. Then the poor would miss her so much, and so many young mothers would lack advice, and so many unsophisticated maidens would have no one to tell them "truths" that their foolish mothers withhold from them. On the whole, the poodle is a sign of election in her case and in the cases of innumerable other women of brains and money, particularly the latter; for it is to be noted that the wife childless by design almost invariably belongs to the brainy or wealthy classes; it is the exception to find such women among the ignorant and poor; God's love of His own is wonderful.

And so this woman, who has defied the creative act of God and has been ungrateful for the gift of life, becomes by the ingenuity of her selfish diplomacy, not an outcast and a shame, but an angel of light and healing to her less fortunate sisters who have not yet learned that child-bearing is indecent among the rich and immoral among the poor.

The steps from praise to envy and from envy to imitation are not steep or far apart. Is the mother of a large family a wooden image that she should not regard with envy the fine gowns of her childless neighbor, and her jewels and motors and massaged cheeks and manicured fingers and her freedom, as of a bird, from petty household duties and her opportunity to entertain at afternoon teas and to shine at evening balls and midnight suppers? Though she indeed prizes her treasure of children, they have cost her anxiety, and pain and deprivation, sleepless nights and busy days, and perhaps hardest of all, they have brought her the contemptuous sympathy of her superior neighbor. Is it any wonder that at times there is just a suggestion in her heart of envy for the wise woman who has known how, and who has dared, to defy the laws of God, and at the same time to establish herself in the front seat before the stage of this world? Then may it not well be that some weak matron will take the plunge from envy into imitation? Thus is the woman who flaunts her Creator made to spread sin and sorrow like a plague among the wholesome members of the community which she infests, while gullible society is in admiration of the dear soul who is so interested in civic welfare, humane treatment of stray cats, and the movement for better babies, and fewer of them.

The selfishness of these women is as monumental as their ingratitude to God. They will have no part in the perpetuation of their species, but they will fight like tigresses for ease, admiration and command, and in the height of their effrontery they attempt to instruct and criticise, even to pity the noble mothers who are bearing the burdens and the joys of the race. Their effrontery is beyond measure. In so far as it rests with them, human life would cease at their death-bed, and so they would not hesitate to put a final term to the family, to the State, to the Church, to the school, to everything. Yet, through eugenic societies, clubs of various kinds, and incessant personal propaganda, they are eternally regulating the affairs of the good women on whom the Church, the State, the school, and life itself depend. It is sad enough that these women should travel the road to destruction themselves; it is appalling that they should go out into the highways and hedges to compel, as it were, others to join in their unholy pilgrimage.

In Israel of old the barren womb, even when the result of natural causes, was looked upon as a blight and a visitation of God. The hope of a quiver filled with arrows, of a table aglow with children like shoots about the olive tree, of a wife like the fruitful vine on the walls of the house, was the dearest expectation of the Jewish bridegroom and the highest ideal of the Jewish bride. A large family was the blessing of heaven upon a holy union; the lack of it was the sign of a curse upon the door-post.

Thank God, that among the virile Jews of today the tradition of their fathers has not been lost. Thank God, too, that in holy Ireland, with all its suffering and centuries of poverty, its women are still fruitful mothers of men; and the same is true in Poland and in Spain and in South America and in Italy and in parts of Boston, and wherever else the laws of God are "the truth, the light and the way." A blessing is upon them, and in spite of the eugenists and the sociologists, they and their children shall, by the promise of God and the workings of His laws, inherit the land. Their rags shall be riches when set side by side with the silks of the deliberately childless wives.

Our Lord uttered a curse upon the irresponsible, barren fig-tree; shall the judgment upon the barren wife, who is so through choice, be less severe? The words of St. Paul to Timothy, "Yet she shall be saved through child-bearing," are the passport to heaven of the wife who is fulfilling the duty of her state in life; they are also the warrant of condemnation of the selfish and cowardly wife who is a wife only in name. The inspired words of St. Paul need enunciation among modern women much more than do the specious vaporings of eugenists or pseudo-scientists. They are the words of the Holy Ghost; the latter are for a great part the maunderings of unclean minds.

In recent years there has been an immense amount of plain speaking and indecent writing in behalf of childless wives and limited families by Malthusianists, eugenists, prophylaxists, birth-controllists, and a host of others of like kidney. They have commandeered the churches, the schools, the press, the theater, the cinema, the lecture platforms and every other possible agency into their service of spreading the gospel of the destruction of the race, until the mass of the people are really coming to believe in and to practise the infamous teachings that have been dinned into their ears and set before their eyes and hammered into their heads so persistently and enthusiastically, and by such ingenious methods as to deceive even the teachers.

The net living result of all this propaganda may, it is true, be summed up in a mongrel parody of Horace's famous line, parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus "pup," but the result to innumerable souls has been mortal, and the effect on the character of the nation has been evil beyond estimation, this much at the very least, that by reason of the unholy practices developed by these vicious teachers the future American is certain to have more of the blood of the Celt and the Slav and the southern Latin in his veins than of the Puritan or the high-brow, which in many respects may not be so much of a disaster as some might think.

But the serious thing that these vampires have brought about is the reproach they have succeeded in fastening upon holy motherhood. They have made child-bearing a shame, whereas it is a glory; they have made motherhood—a most sacred state of woman, the state that made the name of Mary the most beloved that has ever been given to a created being—a state to be apologized for, if not subjected to their detestable rules and limitations. It has come to be that the mother of two children is tolerated; the mother of four endured; the mother of six is outside the pale of society; the mother of eight is a nuisance; of ten a calamity and of twelve a brute. The order of God and of normal human beings, of those whose opinions are of the least value, is precisely the reverse in an ascending scale of honor until the mother of twelve assumes the dignity of a queen.

The ostracism of motherhood is a despicable manifestation of brutality under the guise of culture and exclusive knowledge. The strength of this brutal cult of barrenness lies to a large extent in the brazenness of its propaganda. The megaphone has been at its mouth and has drowned out the occasional voice of protest. Then, too, prudery has been its efficient assistant. There is a wholesome disposition among clean minds to be over-nice and to dread uncleanness where in reality there is none. Hence they have kept quiet through dread of notoriety or of overstepping the bounds of modesty, and a clear field has been left to be sowed with the cockle by an enemy. But the voice of St. Paul is not dead, nor the voices of the Doctors in the Church who have succeeded him. They are only muffled by the clamor of the noisy horde who have been preaching the doctrine of child prevention and of defiance of God. It is time that these commanding voices should again be heard, and that the words of authority, "Yet she (woman) shall be saved through child-bearing," should be proclaimed anew, and without mincing them, as St. Paul proclaimed them through holy Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus. Then shall motherhood become once more as it really is, a most glorious and honorable title among the daughters of Eve, and the wilfully childless wife shall take the conspicuous place where she belongs, at the very head of the bitter procession of human failures and outcasts.

Was it not Chesterton who said of eugenics: "It stinks"? By these words he burned an eternal brand of infamy on the unsavory science; at the same time he robbed the language of the only phrase that can fitly describe agenics. The latter brand of human knowledge must now parade the less distinguished heraldic motto: "It's rotten." M. J. RIORDAN.

The Boys of Our City: San Francisco

AS compared with most large American cities, San Francisco's boy problem is neither pressing nor particularly vexatious. The chief reason for this favored condition is the absence of degrading poverty. There are no slums in San Francisco, as eastern cities understand slums. There is no excessive amount of unemployment. The mildness of the climate minimizes the distress of the poor. One of the healthiest cities of the land, sunshine and fresh air stream into it and through all parts of it. There are very few districts indeed that can be compared at all in congestion, unhygienic conditions and ugliness with the cities of the East.

Nevertheless, San Francisco's relation to the boy problem is not an exemption. Far be it from the purpose of this paper to suggest that the city by the Golden Gate is a sort of Utopia! Those who in their desire to help boys are struggling against hampering conditions and the paralyzing influence of lay indifference to the situation, have their hands full of work, and their hearts full of anxiety. The very absence of the most obvious tokens of necessity, namely, acute poverty, slum-surroundings and the like, has a tendency to cause people to overlook the very real need there is for wide-spread and organized work among our boys.

For in San Francisco as everywhere else in the large cities of the land, as the series of articles published by AMERICA show, all too eloquently, thousands of boys are subjected to the thoroughly demoralizing and anti-Christian influences that surround them in the streets. The young boy in the parochial school, generally speaking, is all right. He is guided by priest and Sister, and is amenable to their guidance. But the great majority of Catholic boys leave school and go to work as soon as they are of the legal age to work. During his wildest and most impressionable years, the boy is out in the world. And the world makes war upon him and his brothers, and upon those still more unfortunate ones, the orphans devoid of all home ties who leave the asylums when the age limit is reached. The street corner, the pool-room, the "clubs" which hold their sessions in scores of rooms (proof of the "gang" tendency of youth), the moving-picture theater, and dance-halls, these and other places of the kind become their haunts, and take the place of home. "Home," however, many of them have never known. Home is a thing that is disappearing from modern city life. Thus the world and the flesh and the devil bait traps to snare the souls of youth.

Against these hostile forces, the Church of San Francisco carries on many effective branches of social service. Conspicuous among these is the Youth's Directory, conducted for many years by Rev. D. O. Crowley. In this institution 15,000 boys have been cared for during the last thirty years. There is a large and exceedingly handsome and well-equipped city house, and a thousand-acre farm in the country where boys are trained to agricultural pursuits, under the direction of the Brothers of Mary. No city, county, or State aid is received, the institution being supported by an organization known as St. Joseph's Union, made up of lay people who pay a dollar a year, receiving in return a journal edited by Father Crowley. The work here is classed as preventive. No boys are received who have passed through the juvenile court. Cases of abused or destitute boys are constantly reported to Father Crowley by the members of St. Joseph's Union, and cared for by him. Places are found for the boys, and San Francisco is full of prosperous, respected men who found their start in life at the Youths' Directory.

The Catholic Humane Bureau, ably superintended by Rev. P. L. Ryan, which does a work akin to the Associated Charities, looks after many orphaned boys by finding homes for them. Several hundred children are yearly cared for.

The Childrens' Aid Society is non-denominational, and a large number of Catholic children receive the benefit of its activities.

The Juvenile Court is presided over by Judge Muraskey, whose work is highly commended by Catholics and non-Catholics alike. Father A. I. Townley, O.P., is attached to the Juvenile Court, to look after the interests of Catholic boys. In addition, Father Townley conducts a Working Boys' Club, which is doing a needed and notable work by providing a decent, pleasant home for wage-earning orphan boys.

The Boys and Girls' Aid Society is another non-denominational society, which works among cases of the Juvenile Court. As many of the cases are Catholic boys, about 75 out of every 200, a priest, the Rev. John F. Byrne, attached to St. Agnes' Parish, in which the society has its headquarters, looks after the religious interests of the Catholic boys committed to its charge.

In some respects the most noteworthy enterprise carried on in San Francisco for boys not of the orphan or the Juvenile Court class, but just the ordinary run of boys living at home but endangered by the fatal influences of street life, is the League of the Cross Cadets. The Rev. Richard Collins has general charge of the work. Total abstinence from intoxicants is required of all members. There are two branches, one being the Junior Cadets. These are small boys who take the abstinence pledge from the Archbishop at the solemn time of their confirmation; and from the ranks of the junior cadets the elder and main body is largely recruited. The annual encampment of the cadets and the annual competitive drill are under the inspection of United States army officers. The cadets form a veritable regiment, with companies in many parishes.

A smaller but very useful organization, as yet confined to one parish but worthy of spreading generally, is the Serra Cadets, conducted by Rev. John P. Tobin, in Mission Dolores parish. The boys run in age from fourteen to seventeen years, an age-period which is a most difficult one, as all who have had anything to do with boys will freely admit. There is an annual encampment, drill and gymnasium work, and degree work in which effective use is made of symbolic pictures and lessons which impress the principles of religion upon the plastic minds of the youngsters.

Another interesting experiment is being made by Rev. Michael Murray in the neighboring town of Oakland. He has formed a Greek Letter social club among boys of a class that might too readily be led into the secular High School affiliations which at their best lead into anti-Catholic institutions, and at their worst into utter irreligiousness.

Archbishop Hanna is at the present time engaged in forming a society, mainly composed of laymen, to initiate "Big Brother" work in San Francisco. The idea is to bring together a number of laymen who will each take an active personal interest in a group of boys, or possibly in some special individual case.

The Young Men's Institute admits to membership at the age of eighteen, so that part of its excellent advantages, including gymnasium work, is open to our boys.

All in all, then, as this summary account of the situation indicates, a great deal of work is being done in San Francisco to prevent boys from losing the Faith, to conserve their morality and to aid them in their way in life.

Nevertheless, all to whom I spoke agreed that much as was being done, much more remained to be done. There is everywhere a serious leakage of young souls from the Church. There is a deadening state of indifference among Catholics who should take an interest in the situation. Curiously enough, many wealthy Catholics who do not contribute to the work for Catholic boys are among the notable supporters of non-Catholic institutions like the Y. M. C. A., and the Young Women's Christian Association. Why is this? Do they prefer the plaudits of the non-Catholic world to the approval of their fellow-Catholics?

And everywhere there is discernible the great need of all Catholic social activities, namely, better organization and more efficient coordination of effort. But as the need grows, no doubt, the means to meet that need will be found. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Body and Mind: Some Contrasts

THE celebration of academic terminal festivities for the scholastic year is emphasizing as usual the interest of our generation in the cultivation of the body rather than the mind. There are special honors for popular athletes, in the shape of official positions of particular prestige that should go by preference to scholars only. This is true of elementary schools, high schools and colleges.

A recent number of the Yale Alumni Weekly gives details with regard to the "tapping" for Yale's three famous secret societies, which show that success in athletics is the surest guarantee for the coveted honor. Out of the forty-five lads tapped, thirty-five were chosen on account of their athletic prowess.

Here is a standard of reasonable mathematical accuracy by which to judge the comparative value put today on the training of body and mind. Thirty-five out of forty-five make seven-ninths. The proportion fully written out would be: training of body is to training of mind as seven is to two. Or in a mathematical formula, B: M:: 7: 2. This, I think, is a fair exposition of present-day values. If this in the green wood, what in the dry? If university men place so much emphasis on the body, what are we to expect of people in general?

The plain fact of the matter is that just now there is much more interest in the things of the body and the senses than in those of the mind. And strange to say this is a rather modern phenomenon. Not long ago some one said, in connection with the Shakespeare celebrations, that there is just as much interest in the "movies" now as there was in Shakespeare during the Elizabethan period. Indeed it is a mighty good thing that the dramatist did not come up to New York from the country, say in 1890, to earn his living. Lucky for him that he went to London, 325 years ago. At that time London had only a population of some 100,000 and probably about 200,000 when Shakespeare left that city twenty-five years later. In the meantime, however, he had made a fortune. People crowded to see his plays just as they go to the "movies" now. He and the group of men with him, the Burbages, and later Heming and Condell, made money as fast as "movie" promoters do now.

We have 6,000,000 people comparatively as near to our theater district as any of the Londoners were to Shakespeare's theater. For the Globe which he and his associates built for themselves was in Southwark, on the Surrey side of the Thames. As far as the center of population was concerned, it occupied about the same place that a theater in the Bronx or in Brooklyn would occupy at the present time, and yet there was not only no trouble about filling his theater, but manifestly all the plays had "good runs." Shakespeare wrote on the average about two plays a year and that number seems to have been quite sufficient to make his theater very profitable indeed, and that, despite the fact that probably three-fourths of the people of London could not read or write. That was the reason why their narrow streets were crowded and cluttered up with symbolic signs. There was no sense in describing merchandise in words which could not be read. There were colored lights for the drug-store and wooden Indians for tobacco shops, in Shakespeare's later years. Those, too, were the days of the big bonnet and the big boot and the key and trunk and saddle which are only now going out of use as signs, because at last all the people in the towns can read and so too can visitors from the country.

The Elizabethan Londoners fairly worshiped at Shakespeare's shrine. They may have been ignorant according to our modern standards but they had the very best of taste in dramatics. Shakespeare's name was probably as familiarly known as any other commoner's, not only in London, but throughout most of England.

Now there is the literal truth. Shakespeare was probably as well known as the best batter in either of the leagues and his name was as familiar as the manager of the team that carries off the pennant. There is no need of further comment: the contrast between our time and Elizabeth's time is clear.

We are intensely interested in the things of the body and the senses and apparently they were intensely interested in the things of the mind. Professor Shorey of the University of Chicago said the other day in the symposium on "Contemporary Ideals," held by the City Club of Chicago, that there is but one ideal in contemporary letters, but one laudable purpose. That is, "pity for suffering, the effort to look at misery and injustice through others' eyes, painstaking realism in depicting the seamy and sad sides of life." Even here it is a material ideal that makes the appeal. It is physical suffering that is exploited. "Unfortunately," he added, "the humanity is too often misdirected. It is all given to the criminal, the beast of prey, the human tiger, and nothing is left for the victims of the coddled and pitied criminal." Even in Galsworthy's "Justice," for example, Mr. Shorey found "intellectual dishonesty" since "it shirks the crime problem and arraigns society as the real or the greater criminal."

In the same symposium, Mr. Cram, the well-known New York architect, took very similar ground with regard to the present state of the various arts. He spoke with deserved bitterness of "the trivial stuff that passes as music for the tired businessman and the brainless, pleasure-seeking woman who accompanies him." He might have added that the only reason why people go to the theater is to see and to hear, not at all to understand. "Rag-time music" and ever-changing spectacles, these are the popular, the real "attractions"; they "run" for months, everybody must see them; people who do not see them are not "in the swim." No one goes to a play nowadays. Everybody goes to a "show." It is not a "holy show" either, but as a rule the main part of the show consists of a crowd of more or less disreputable women with either a great deal of dress on or a great deal of dress off.

It is all a question of the cultivation of the body and the satisfaction of the senses, with no appeal to the intellect. I think that it is no exaggeration to say that the key-note of our interests at the present time is so largely material as to stamp our era with a special stigma in this matter. The worst of it is that instead of being ashamed of it our generation seems to glory in it. It is true that in recent years great crowds have been attracted to pageants and masques, but in these it is largely the sense-element, the spectacle, that has appealed, and though the great amphitheaters of our universities have proved very useful for these masques, yet it must not be forgotten that the only reason for the existence of these amphitheaters is the athletic games which attract much larger crowds than our pageants. The Greeks built such amphitheaters to accommodate the throngs of people who, on the festival days of Dionysos wished to be present at the Greek plays. We build ours to accommodate the crowds which come to football games. The ratio of bodily to intellectual interests may be as seven to two, but our great stadia are used for athletic purposes seven times more frequently than for anything approaching an intellectual purpose. The ratio is seven to one.

The close of the scholastic year may be a time to call attention to some of this drift of our generation. It is a strange drift. We usually associate the word "pagan" with an over-appreciation of bodily as compared with spiritual interests. The pagan is typically the man who in the later times of Rome and Greece had lost all serious interest in the older forms of religion and yet had not taken up Christianity. This cult of the body developed to a marked degree in degenerate Greece and decadent Rome. That is what makes the student of history feel disturbed over the conditions that have developed in our generation and the world about us at the present time. I know there are some who will say that this is pessimism. Well, if this is pessimism, there are the facts. Make the most of them. JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

"Patent Insides"

IF you take a square yard and a half of paper and fold it over on itself twice, you may form a roughly accurate idea of the size and shape of a country paper. After this folding you will have four pages inside and four outside. The four outside pages are filled with matter supplied by the country editor; the four inside pages are taken care of by some syndicate that acts, for a consideration, as a general Providence to a score, perhaps several scores, of country newspapers. This syndicated material, which the local papers publish mechanically, is not inaptly called "patent insides."

One might fancy that this machine-made literature would not attract the attention of the casual reader of country papers. But I confess that, after I have reveled in the delightful and refreshing familiarity of the local news, I always turn with new zest to the patent insides. Somewhere in the great cities men are making comfortable fortunes by studying and supplying the literary needs of the country population. The makers of the patent insides have expended vast ingenuity and labor in discovering what remote folk on lonely farms want in their weekly paper. Their investigations presumably have resulted profitably to themselves and satisfactorily to their readers; and I cannot help thinking that I can gain more insight into rural life, habits and tastes by watching the way the patent-inside maker caters to his wide-spread clientèle than by studying the reports of government commissions. The local columns, warm with concrete humanity in their intimate relation with Joe and Bill, are for the poet: the patent insides, which transcend individual considerations and aim at the common spirit of the rural district, are for the philosopher.

Philosophers should never be surprised. But I confess that my first philosophical venture into patent insides created a mild amazement that I have never been quite able to control. I discovered, of course, a serial story by an author, who is no doubt distinguished, but whose name I had never heard. Well, I could not expect the school of Henry James and George Meredith to be popular amid the simple honesties of the country-side. I found out that statistics on any conceivable subject are tremendously exciting reading to the farmer and his family. Pictures of prize-cattle and ears of corn and county-fair presidents—these I had looked for. But I had not looked for the appalling prominence of the patent-medicine advertisement. This is the thing which amazed me. My philosophical equilibrium was disturbed by a phenomenon which seemed to nullify all previous conceptions of "our country's pride," and to upset one of the strongest traditions of life and literature.

What! was I to believe that our "stout yeomanry," with their "buxom, hearty wives and lasses," were hypochondriacs and health cranks! Another of my youth's ideals shattered! Yet the logic seemed irresistible. Patent-medicine venders would hardly pay good money for space in patent insides unless the speculation were profitable. And the patent insides, in which the patent-medicine venders vie with one another for the reader's attention, are almost exclusively for rural communities. The conclusion is unavoidable. At least, if one hesitates to draw the conclusion, he cannot help entertaining the disagreeable suspicion that the hale and robustious farmer of popular belief may not survive the test which a scientific age like ours is sure to submit him to when his turn comes.

With something of a scientific spirit I approached the matter from a different angle. I sought out a friend who owns a shop in a small town and has much to do with farmers. It took me some time to formulate my question in a manner which would not excite his ridicule if it happened to be wide of any known reality. As soon, however, as he caught my drift he laughed outright at my hesitation. It seemed I was inquiring about the existence of something of which every one knew. The shopman's mirth was brutal. It could not have been more boisterous if I had asked him timidly if he had ever heard that two and two make four. Of course, farmers are health-cranks; they load up on patent medicines. Whenever farmers meet they talk more about their rheumatism, their stomachs and their livers than about their crops. The newest patent medicine is of more absorbing interest to a group of farmers than the latest invention in threshing-machines. I am giving the shopman's words in a slightly modified form. I suggested that perhaps he meant the women folk. No, sir; he meant the men.

When logic receives such field-laboratory confirmation as this, conviction, be it never so reluctant, simply has to step forth. And then, to clinch the thing, another bit of corroborative evidence came my way by mere chance. I happened to be in a small town and was being shown its wonders. A square of huge buildings was pointed out as "the largest patent-medicine plant" in the country. The old question at once balanced itself on my tongue. I had never heard the name of this rich company, and I foresaw what the answer would be when I asked: "Where do they sell their plasters, boluses and specifics?" "Among the farming population principally," was the answer.

It is not my intention to offend a respectable and highly intelligent portion of my fellow-citizens. I am among those who hold that the leaders of men come from the country places. Moreover, it is clear that men, foregathering, can talk of worse things than the pains and aches of the body, and the various electuaries, simples and mithridates put upon the market by persons, who may be honest and who may be skilled, but who are beyond all doubt clever. I do not wish to attack the venders of patent medicines any more that the purchasers of their wares. I think the character in one of Joseph Conrad's stories, who said, "a man who has been in the patent-medicine trade will be up to anything from pitch-and-toss to wilful murder," was uttering a libel. It is not unlikely that patent medicines are good in their place. If I have any criticism to make, it is that the venders induce people to put them in the wrong place. A perfectly good liver-pill should not be encouraged to deposit itself in a perfectly good liver—a reprehensible trick of venders, which they perform by playing on the fears and imaginations of humanity. No man should trade upon our fears.

I repeat, therefore, that I am attacking no one. I only register a phenomenon which, though strange to me, may be familiar to every one else. After all, the phenomenon easily adjusts itself to antecedent processes of reasoning. When the nearest physician is miles away, the difficulty and expense of expert advice are often prohibitive. Of course, there will be a medicine-chest, and every one will be his own doctor, with the gratuitous aid of the patent-medicine publications. Nervousness will forestall imaginary symptoms with utterly irrelevant drugs; or impatience will use the ready dose to do what nature should be allowed to do for herself; and the medicine habit is formed; and the mind, which ought to be wheeling around the stars, devotes itself to wheeling around a drug-bewildered liver.

And, then, think of the lonely winter evenings in the old farm-house, and the lonely summer days on the broad acres. Only strong-minded men can remain perfectly sane and healthy in solitude. Our smart novelists and poets jeer at the anchorites. Six months of an anchorite's life would make a blithering imbecile out of the most dapper of our literary men. Read such hermit-diarists as Thoreau and Amiel, and see how unbalanced even a fairly strong mind can sometimes become in solitude.

The more one learns of life, the greater must be his admiration of the Saints. The old philosopher, who said, Nunquam minus solus quam cum solus, was boasting disgracefully. If he spoke the truth of himself the chances are a hundred to one that he was an eccentric or a health-crank. It is a rare man that can tolerate his own company for a long stretch of time. It is a test of genuine greatness. The Saints are the only ones we know who have taken the test triumphantly. Their common-sense survived the fiery trial; they never degenerated into hypochondriacs or lunatics. The explanation, of course, is that they lived less with themselves than with God. They remained perfectly natural because they could be so intensely supernatural. God's world was so vividly interesting and soul-stirring that the most solitary hour was filled with thrilling excitement. Their long thoughts never fell back, for want of support, upon their own sensations. They evaded the horrors of patent medicine, patent insides, and patent-psychological literature.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

The Charity of a Catholic Monarch

THE monarch in question is Alfonso XIII, King of Spain. Almost every day the Madrid press publishes conclusive proofs of the humanitarian and charitable services rendered by our young ruler, since the outbreak of the war, in behalf of the wounded and the prisoners of the belligerent countries, as well as of the desolate and sorrowing families of those who have disappeared in the turmoil or have fallen on the field of battle.

On becoming acquainted with the splendid work of mercy accomplished for humanity in these days of sorrow and anguish by their Soverign, Spaniards of every class and party are filled with legitimate feelings of consolation and joy. People of every foreign country, they are sure, will share in these emotions. In all his noble efforts for suffering humanity, the Spanish Monarch is only following the footsteps and the example of the Holy Father. And, be it said in passing, it is to the Supreme Pontiff that the world is turning for help in this terrible tragedy. While doing so, all hearts are filled with deep gratitude and emotion for his unflagging efforts to diminish in every possible way the horrors and sufferings of the contest.

Very shortly after the declaration of war, indeed just after the first shock of the hostile forces had begun to crimson the soil of Europe and to bring sorrow and misery to countless homes, the Royal Palace in the Plaza de Oriente was, so to say, deluged with letters, all bathed in tears. The sad messages deepened into a very wave of sorrow, rising constantly to a higher crest. The mounting tide surged to the gates of the Royal Alcazar. There, the writers of the sad missives knew, their supplications would reach the heart of a magnanimous prince, to whom Providence seemed to have assigned the noble rôle of mediator and consoler in the dark hour of this frightful struggle.

From the pages of these letters rose a wail and a prayer. The eyes of fathers, mothers, wives, sisters and friends of the combatants turned to the young sovereign, asking news of the loved ones who had disappeared or begging his intercession to obtain the complete remission, or at least the mitigation, of sentences imposed by military tribunals. The heart of the King was moved, and yielding to his generous impulses, he immediately ordered his own private offices turned into a bureau of information to take cognizance of all these war-cases. With only one end in view, the good which he might thus accomplish in behalf of all those who were suffering from the effects of the terrible struggle, he increased his staff of secretaries and assumed as his own the subsequent financial outlay. He had the pleasure to find that the bureau thus constituted was working efficiently and with the most consoling results. The number of letters received by the King's secretaries amounts on an average to 700 a day. On some days as many as 3,000 are received. From the hour the bureau of relief was organized, it is estimated that more than 200,000 petitions have been registered. In the archives belonging to the office there are records on file dealing with the fate of 160,000 French prisoners and war sufferers, whose residence it has so far been impossible to ascertain. The solicitude of the Monarch extends also to the prison camps, especially to those established in Germany. The members of the Spanish Embassy in Berlin visit these camps and hospitals regularly in order to become personally acquainted with the sanitary conditions, etc., and to see for themselves how the prisoners are treated. They then report to the King, who in turn communicates these data to the various belligerent nations, which have requested Spain to watch over their interests. But this is not the only service thus generously given by the Spanish Monarch. A special department in the bureau has been organized to seek and find news of those who are in the territories occupied by the German armies and who have not been able to communicate with their relatives or friends. In order to further the ends of this department, a special system of proclamations, advertisements and notices has been arranged. Notices are sent to the Spanish Ambassador in Berlin, who forwards them to the German authorities. These then inform the mayors of the localities where it is hoped that some clue may be found. The latter in turn send back whatever news is available, and thus, very often, correspondence is reestablished between those who for a long time had not heard from each other. Nor can we omit to mention the personal efforts of the Monarch in behalf of those who are condemned by the military tribunals. For some he obtains complete pardon. In the case of minor offences, the sentence, at his request, has been often commuted. Thanks to his efforts, war-cripples and the desperately wounded were frequently sent back to their homes. The Russian journalist, Jantchetzky, and his seven companions in captivity and misfortune; the Austrian Admiral, Müller; M. Theodor, Dean of the Brussels Bar; the Prince of Salm-Salm, and many others, must surely be ever grateful to the noble and generous Monarch for his efforts to alleviate their lot and secure their liberty.

Such in brief is the work of mercy which a Catholic and Spanish King is accomplishing for suffering humanity in these days of sorrow and woe. Two angels of Christian charity seem, for the moment, to have folded their wings and taken up their abode on the heights of the Vatican and under the walls of the Royal Alcazar of the Court of Spain. The Sovereign of all Christendom and the Sovereign of a Catholic people are constantly working hand-in-hand to diminish the sufferings of the countless victims of this cruel war. And thus, over the dark clouds which shroud the horizon, they shed the bright rays of mercy, consolation and love.

NORBERTO TORCAL,
Manager of the Spanish Associated Press.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

French War Orphans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In answering a letter published lately in AMERICA which stated that the society called "The Fatherless Children of France" was an insidious attack upon the faith of these helpless orphans, I urged that no hasty onslaught be made upon the society, but that we should wait until the adverse criticisms should prove to be incontrovertible. The cause has already awakened a hearty interest in people who have no desire to do anything to disturb the Faith of these children. Since that time I have been on the watch to collect further data. I was therefore gratified a few days ago by receiving an emphatic denial of the charge from a friend, a French lady living in this country, who keeps in close touch with people and affairs in France. In fact one of her sons has already been wounded there and another son has offered his services to his country.

My friend assures me that the society lives up to the pledge stated in the prospectus, that these children should be brought up in the religion of their parents, and she mentioned individual cases in the care of Sisters of St. Joseph and Sisters of Charity.

Since writing the above letter, I have heard that a distinguished prelate in France has warned Catholics against the society as an active agency for an anti-Catholic propaganda. To offset this, may I quote from a letter written by M. Jules Valery, a distinguished authority on international law, and professor of law at the University of Montpellier, France? After a most eloquent appeal for aid for these helpless children made orphans by this cruel war, he ventures to estimate that their probable number at the close of hostilities will be at least 1,000,000, as before the fighting about Verdun there were about 800,000. He writes of the formation of a society on the very day of the outbreak of hostilities by M. Appel, Dean of the Faculty of Sciences at the University of Paris, named "The Committee of National Help," to which every man of good-will was called, entirely irrespective of social class or party. This appeal was responded to immediately.

I now quote verbatim from M. Valery's letter:

> Such a committee was unable to cope practically and effectively with all the orphans scattered through each French Département. This is the reason of the creation of local committees, among them the "Southwestern Committee for the Orphans of the War," the headquarters of which are at Montpellier. In the meetings of these committees may be seen, seated side by side, the atheist Prefect of the Département of Herault, our Venerable Prelate, the Cardinal de Cabrières, many Protestant ministers, and the only rabbi actually in the Département; brokers and bankers mix with workmen; lawyers, attorneys, justices, professors of the university, together with modest school teachers, employees of the post office and railroad men, every class of society has here its representative.
>
> Such a diversity of classes in the cooperation of this work can be seen in the local committees established by us in every town and every village in that part of France, because, alas, there is no little hamlet to be found where some family is not in mourning.

M. Valery goes on to relate how admirably the work is carried on, cites many individual cases of dire need and reports how the society of National Help aids the committee. I leave out the practical details, but certain points I must not omit to quote:

> As a matter of fact, every mother whom we have had occasion to visit has, without one exception, expressed her formal wish to keep the children with her. Some mothers, misunderstanding the object of our visit, have plainly declared that they would rather be deprived of help than to be separated from their children. This is a declaration that honors these poor women. There is another to which I beg to call your attention. Inquiring about these applications for help or in the course of the distribution of supplies, I have often visited humble homes where you breathe, so to speak, an atmosphere of sadness and depression. I never heard a word of complaint against the circumstances which have deprived these poor wives of their husbands. All have submitted to their fate with resignation; everyone seems to understand and to appreciate the nobility of the cause for which the companion of their life, the father of their children, has fallen.
>
> I had already occasion to observe the same spirit in our wounded soldiers, too numerous alas! Since the beginning of the war, no matter how terrible their wounds, no matter from what part of France they come, no one complains. They accept their lot without murmuring, showing by their resignation that they were firmly decided to sacrifice their lives for their country and that in shedding their blood, they have simply done their duty.

Such a letter as this with its testimony at first hand ought to make one hesitate about taking any step against the society, for a stand must be taken one way or the other. Work for it if it is worthy; against it, if it is proved not to be; and this is a solemn question to decide in the face of such undoubted, widespread, tragic need.

Boston, Mass. J. G. ROBINS.

The Ever Neutral Flag

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Among the recent inventions of an imaginative scribe in the daily press there appeared the following canard:

> Rome, June 12.—The white and yellow papal flag is to wave for the first time on the ocean, according to a report in circulation here this evening. Mgr. Locatelli, the Papal Internuncio at Buenos Aires, having been transferred to Brussels, where he will be Nuncio, desiring to insure his safety while at sea, has chartered a steamer which will be called the Nuncius and will carry the Papal colors as those of a neutral power. The last ship which flew the Papal colors was the brig Maria Immacolata, which lay in the harbor of Civita Vecchia, thirty-seven miles northwest of Rome, in September, 1870, when the Italians took Rome. The brig, however, had never gone out into the Mediterranean flying the Papal colors.

Strange tales have ever been told of those who go down to the sea in ships, and this one does not contradict tradition. Moreover, it recalls the curious incident of the first and last time a ship sailing under the Papal flag appeared in the harbor of New York. The details of this latter event are preserved in official documents in the State Library at Albany, the archives of the United States Court for the Southern District of New York and the local newspapers of the summer of 1757. A contribution of the Rev. Denis P. O'Neill, in Vol. II, Part II, of the "Records and Studies" of the United States Catholic Historical Society, gives a summary of these documents and reports. From this it can be gleaned that the ship Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception and St. Ignatius Loyola, Captain Lorenzo Ghiglino, while on a voyage from Cadiz to Santo Domingo, was taken by two privateers and brought into the port of New York as a prize, to be sold for the benefit of the crew and owners of the privateers, as was the pleasant custom of that time. Captain Ghiglino naturally protested against this procedure, and in a petition to Governor Delancy claimed that he was "a Genoese by Birth and by Act of Naturalization became a subject of the Pope of Rome." He further stated that, while peacefully proceeding on his voyage from Cadiz to Cape François,

> On the twelfth of June last, he discovered near Hispaniola two Vessels being private Vessels of War, belonging to this Port, one called the Revenge, commanded by Francis Koffler, the other called the Hornet, commanded by James Spellen. Upon one of which said Vessels firing a Ball at the Ship Your Memoralist threw her into the Wind, to wait the Privateers approach, and hoisted the Popes Colours, the ship sailing under the Popes pass. That your Memoralist being subject to neutral powers was unappreciative of any hostile attack in these Seas, till the Privateers approach within Musket Shot when there was an immediate Discharge of Cannon, Musquetry, and Grenade Shells upon the Ship, which besides greatly damaging the Ship, wounded Your Memoralist's Brother, and carried off an arm of one of the Sailors, a Genoese, who since died of that Wound. That your Memoralist conceiving this Attack to be illegal and barbarous made no Resistance, did at the Time protest against the Same but was nevertheless brought with his Ship into the Port where the Ship and Cargoe were soon after libelled in the Vice Admiralty as Prize.

It is gratifying to find that the "Popes Colours" and the "Popes pass" were upheld by Judge Lewis Morris in the New York Court of Vice-Admiralty, and that the ship and one-fifth of her cargo, a valuation of £8,575, were released to Captain Ghiglino, whose contention for the neutrality of the high seas reads almost as if it were written in the twentieth and not in the eighteenth century.

Brooklyn. T. F. M.

Who Was "Father Boulanger"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your review of "Travels in the American Colonies," by T. J. C., in the issue of June 10, says: "Unfortunately, there is no Jesuit 'Father Boulanger,' either on the official list which we have before us, or in any of the seventy-three volumes of Thwaite's 'Relations.'" This seems to me a very strange statement for, in looking over my own list of missionary priests in the Mississippi Valley, I find the following notes:

> (1) Joseph Ignace le Boulanger, Jesuit, arrived (in Canada) June 16, 1703; was missionary among the Kaskasquias. Died October 16, 1744 (Tanguay-List of Canadian Clergy, p. 84). (2) June 17, 1719. Father John (?) le Boullenger opens or begins the parish Register of Kaskaskia, Illinois. Styles himself "Chaplain of the troops." Well versed in the language of the Illinois Indians, and drew up a Grammar and Dictionary, with a very full Catechism and prayers. The MSS., a large folio volume, is believed to be now in the Carter Brown Library at Providence, R. I. (Shea, History Catholic Church, Vol. I, 557). (3) October 20, 1721. Father Charlevoix, S.J., found him with Father Joseph F. de Kereben, both Jesuits, in charge of a Kaskaskia mission (Shea, H. of C. C., I, 558; Am. Ch. Hist., O'Gorman, IX, 200; U. S. C Hist. Mag., III, 303; H. of Cath. Missions, Shea, 427, 502). (4) August, 1727. One of the Ursuline Nuns, that arrived in New Orleans, Marianne Boullenger de Ste. Angélique, was a sister of the Jesuit Father of the same name in Illinois (Shea, H. of the Cath. Church, I, 570, note 2). (5) December 8, 1727. He transferred the bodies of the Jesuit Fathers Gabriel Marest and John Mermet to the church at Kaskaskia (Shea, idem, I, 585). (6) A facsimile of his signature is given by Shea (Shea, idem, I, 584). (7) 1728. He was still at Kaskaskia (Shea, idem, I, 573). (8) July 12, 1730. Mentioned in a letter, of this date, by Father le Petit, as having, for the second time, to enlarge his church (Lettres Edifiantes, 1819, Vol. IV, 298). (9) 1735. Mentioned in list of Illinois Priests as F. Boularger (Life of Bishop Flaget, p. 126).

In view of the above facts, it seems that the phonetic spelling of this worthy priest's name has misled your reviewer.

Plattsmouth, Neb. MICHAEL A. SHINE.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Lawlessness and the Courts

OPEN contempt of the rightful authority of the State is fast becoming a common phenomenon in certain uneasy sections of the country. New York, in particular, has harbored for some years vociferous crews of brainless agitators who form a perpetual incitement to lawlessness. The plan of these propagandists is simple. In common with other criminals, they find that certain laws are obnoxious. They propose to destroy these laws by repeatedly violating them. When brought to book, they will justify their course by flouting the authority of any court before which they may be arraigned. It is probably true that the majority of these agitators, parasitic males and unsexed women, are mere seekers after notoriety. Others, however, are anarchistic, both in sentiment and method. Both must be rigorously suppressed, if law and order are not to become mere empty symbols.

It is not pessimistic to say that these chronic violations of particular ordinances are but symptoms of a deeper disorder in the public and private life of a rapidly-growing group of our people. Authority is not a welcome word with the populace, nor even with the young. We fly to the defense of our "rights"; but we suffer the rights of the community and the inalienable rights of God to be flouted without concern. Popular religion, rejecting the supernatural, engages itself with the things of time. Popular sentiment views capital punishment as murder, and regards the criminal as an innocent victim of circumstances. Popular education centers on the development of individuality, and fails miserably in developing the far more important sense of obligation. And all alike, religion or what passes for religion, morbid sentiment and disorderly education, are but integral parts of the cult of a lawless god, whose name is Self.

Judge Cropsey of the Supreme Court of New York, has recently said that the faith of our people in the integrity of the judiciary is being undermined. The statement is undoubtedly correct. When belief in God, the source and center of all authority, has been rejected, men easily lose their faith in those tribunals which administer justice in His name. Yet some degree of this loss of faith in the honesty of our courts, may be traced to the apparent unwillingness of certain inferior courts to deal sternly with cases involving open and persistent contempt of authority. This weakness does not in itself invalidate the authority of a legal tribunal; but no judiciary, high or low, can retain the respect of the community, as long as it tolerates contempt from the criminals brought within its jurisdiction.

"Unionizing" Authorship

MANY American writers are regarding with favor the recent proposal that an authors' labor union should be organized in this country. Highly gratified at being considered, after all these ages, as real workers and not merely parasites, or at best dilettanti, authors are now eager to standardize their calling. One prominent writer frankly owns that as conditions are today: "Authors are about as unskilled as any class of workers. Practically everybody is born an author. The trade requires no apprenticeship." What seems to be needed to remedy this regrettable state of things is a supervising board qualified and empowered to put every would-be author through a protracted and rigorous apprenticeship, then advance him in due season to the grade of craftsman, and finally to the dignity of master-workman. Authors could then be "unionized" as readily as plumbers or carpenters.

But the difficulty lies in finding a way to effect this most desirable reform. Theology, law and medicine were standardized, of course, centuries ago. Before a clergyman can officiate he must be ordained, before the lawyer can plead he must be admitted to the bar, and the doctor is not allowed to practise till he has won his diploma. Could not some similar test be applied before persons are recognized as living authors? Mere success in getting one's "copy" into the papers and magazines should by no means be considered the sole requisite for membership in the authors' union; at least a degree from a school of journalism should be demanded. Indeed, a long period of "cubbage" with a high-class journal might well be exacted besides. Whether the bare publication of a book should be the open-sesame to further advancement in the craft, or whether proof should be required that the work in question was bought by at least seven different people, that it was enjoyed by discerning readers and praised by incorruptible critics: these are questions for the union's advisory board to decide.

When the new organization is perfected, strikes, walkouts and boycotts will no doubt be as common with scribes as they are now among garment-workers; indigent authors to whom standard wages are denied will be supported by their confrères, and the peaceful picketing of an editor's sanctum will be a familiar spectacle. Why, we may yet see all the papers of a city held up until a fearless, truth-telling reporter is honorably restored to his post! However that may be, if the formation of an authors' union results in improving the quality of the copy supplied to our daily papers, in heightening the literary excellence of our magazines and in increasing the "ethical value" of our "best sellers," let us by all means have such an organization.

Our "Sacred Fund"

THE Dionysiac theater cost Athens her liberty. It was the unwillingness of her citizens to convert to more serious purposes the money lavished on that institution and its spectacles, that left them, when the emergency came, inadequately equipped for war with a less cultured but more efficient rival. The Greek drama is certainly one of the glories of Hellas, but its enjoyment was dearly purchased at the cost of the liberty which had been its chief inspiration, at the sacrifice of the democracy which was the vital atmosphere of its great writers. Yet this is exactly what the Athenians did. Rather than forego the delights of witnessing the performance of the great classics of a previous generation, the contemporaries of Demosthenes set aside a special fund to defray the expenses of the theater and to insure the price of admission to the poorest citizens, and menaced with the severest penalties any one who should move in the Assembly that this fund should be diverted to the more serious service of Athens's navy and defenses. It was the sacred fund: sacred to the great god Dionysos or Bacchus, around whose altar the dramatic chorus danced, in whose honor and in whose theater the most heroic days of Greece were reproduced in mimicry; only in mimicry, alas! Only when it was too late were the frivolous citizens aroused from their dreams by the thunders of Demosthenes and the menaces of Philip and moved to turn their festival reserve into a war-fund, to use this theoric fund, this show-fund, for the realities of civic life, at a time when that civic life was sick unto death.

Americans are not ignorant of the history, the ideals and the institutions of Athens. We have not failed to profit by them for the betterment of our civic, intellectual and cultural life. This lesson of her history is of especial value to us at the present time. The amount spent by our people on the theater and moving-pictures is prodigious even for so vast and resourceful a commonwealth as ours. The question of taxation for our reasonable defenses is one that is enlisting if not puzzling the best minds among our Federal legislators. The equalization of this tax, or the placing it on such goods as may most easily bear it without hardship to the consumer is, as in all similar cases, the point of the problem. America's vast show-fund, a treasure amounting in the aggregate to many millions, naturally offers a tempting field for speculation to the student of public finances. He may seriously question whether, in the existing state of our laws, the show-fund devotes to the general welfare the quota which could easily be subtracted from it without hardship to even the poorest tax-payer. But the indulgence of such speculations by the practical legislator, who must also be a practical politician, is awkwardly checked by the fear that he may find himself indicted by the fearsome public for daring to suggest a diversion of the fund sacred to its great god before whose nightly blazing altars are enacted scenes and dances not unworthy of his "gold-crowned, wine-flushed" prototype of old Athens.

At all events, good citizens who contribute more frequently and more generously to the tax-collector than to the box-office may be pardoned for remarking somewhat testily that the tariff on imported dances could be raised without damage to home industries, or that "spot-lights" are less apt to save a city than search-lights, or that the erection of a new theater has rarely been known to strengthen the defenses of a nation against the inroads of foes or follies.

The "Outlook" and the Dunphy Case

THE recent decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court on the Dunphy case nerves the Outlook to a brave and bromidic editorial statement on the danger of uniting State and Church. Quite as aptly might the Outlook have based its sermon on a text borrowed from the latest report of the corn crop in Kansas. In stating, moreover, that the action of the Court sustains Mayor Mitchel in any point of the present controversy between Mr. Kingsbury and the private institutions, the Outlook proves either its complete ignorance of Judge Laughlin's opinion, or its supreme indifference to the truth.

The facts in the case are simple. On Randall's Island in the City of New York, there is an asylum for children. It is conducted by the city. It is under the complete control of the city. It neither has, nor has had, any affiliation with any religious organization. It is, in short, as secular an institution as the Metropolitan Hospital or the Tombs. For a number of years this asylum was administered by Mrs. Mary C. Dunphy, an employee of the City of New York. On May 24, 1915, she was removed by Mr. Henry C. Wright, acting for Mr. John A. Kingsbury, Commissioner of Charities of the City of New York. One year later, the Appellate Division handed down a decision that in removing Mrs. Dunphy, a city employee, without the formality of a legal trial, Deputy Commissioner Wright, another employee, acted in conformity with paragraph 659 of the City Charter.

The Court was not asked to pass upon the right of the city to inspect private child-caring institutions. That right, as the Outlook well knows, has never been denied.

Not even remotely were the private institutions concerned in this case; the points at issue were the right of the head of a city department to dismiss a subordinate, and the manner in which that right might be exercised. The decision of the Appellate Division has no more bearing on the "present controversy," or on the Outlook's cant about Mayor Mitchel's religion and "ecclesiastical opposition to the processes of law," than it has on the question of votes for women, or the mean depth of the Panama Canal.

A Crisis in Catholic History

THOUGHTS of great moment for ourselves and for the Church universal must suggest themselves to American Catholics as they read the report of the United States Branch of the Society for Propagation of the Faith, together with the apposite remarks of the National Director. The total contribution of $503,619.08, including stipends for Masses, may at first sight appear satisfactory enough. It is certainly an indication of an awakening of our dormant sense of missionary responsibility. Yet if we add to these receipts all other donations sent from our country to the foreign missions we will hardly arrive at a total of $750,000, or about five cents per capita. Compare with this the $18,793,900 contributed during the same period to the Protestant foreign missions by organizations in the United States and Canada.

It is sad, pitifully sad, to read that rich Catholics, rich congregations, fashionable colleges and academies have with rare exceptions done little or nothing for this great work of God. Yet missionary zeal is a real test of faith, if that word has any meaning; it is a most evident proof that men are seeking purely the Kingdom of God and its propagation upon earth. Catholic millionaires do not figure in the list. "They have no time to contribute to the propagation of their Faith abroad, God grant they keep it themselves at home." If anywhere, it is here that one is tempted to speak in no uncertain tones. It is difficult to excuse from lukewarmness in his holy religion the Catholic who understands the intense need of his assistance at the present moment in the foreign mission field, and who nevertheless holds tight the purse-strings of his wealth.

The excuse pleaded will doubtless be that these needs have never been seriously brought home to him. If so, it is high time that he should realize them. It is his fault if Catholic mission fields have to be relinquished to Protestants who are gaining adherents in vast numbers and are sending armies of men and women to every corner of the earth. It is a real delusion to believe that they are not making converts. With the nature of these conversions we are not concerned; but the great Eastern countries will be Protestantized while Catholics are asleep. The sects are everywhere building schools and striving to train up a native clergy for their mission work. They are doing their utmost to make these missions self-supporting. They are accomplishing their work intelligently.

God has left the promotion of the Faith to human agents. He will not send His Angels from heaven to propagate it. This duty is ours: it is imposed upon American Catholics in particular, at this great crisis in human history. The Lord of the harvest has given us warnings and exhortations in abundance. The zealous handful of men engaged in rousing mission interest among the Catholic clergy and laity are doing their utmost. It depends upon us whether we will heed the call or neglect it. The conversion of the world is given into our hands, as far as by God's Providence that can be accomplished now. This is a critical hour and we must seize the opportunity given us and gladly respond to the call. Were every Catholic in the United States to give even one cent a month, the aggregate sum would be $2,000,000 a year. All can contribute at least this much, and practically all can offer far more. The work must be organized thoroughly and carried out diligently in every parish of the land. Thus will God's blessing come to us at home a hundredfold.

Children and Dangers

THE doctors lately in session in Detroit spoke timely and wise words to the mothers of the race, warning them against the dangers to children, so common in these days of broken ideals. There is nothing new in the advice given, but the occasion and the persons who uttered it give it a new importance. Parents were told that they lack a sense of responsibility and are negligent of primary duties. Their children as a consequence are ruined even before they begin the battle of life, for their ideals are low and their wills are untrained to resist the temptations that arise.

So far so good: the doctors' words are only too true. But why not go further to the very root of the difficulty, godlessness? High ideals and strength of will are from God, and as long as He is excluded from the purview it is useless to warn fathers and mothers of perils to their offspring. There are no dangers to godless folk; they are reckless people to whom even "hygiene" appeals very faintly indeed. God is needed; the parent who possesses Him will have all else, whereas His absence cannot be supplied by motives mountain-high.

It was wise of the doctors assembled in Detroit to talk about the chaperon, the cultivation of self-respect and of a sense of responsibility, the diaphanous dress, wine and so on, but it would have been better had a whole-souled upstanding man spoken to parents of God and eternal reward and punishment. Americans need just such doctrine and until they get it, girls and boys will continue to go wrong, despite sex hygiene which, unassisted by higher motives, has always been quite powerless against the onrush of the primal passion.

LITERATURE

"Risus Filiorum Dei"

THE main business of our time, said Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton recently, is the resurrection of the Middle Ages. Now Mr. Chesterton is a writer of such clarity of thought that whatever else he may mean by this saying, he cannot mean the resurrection of the Catholic religion, for you cannot resurrect something that is not dead, though the Catholic religion is the most important thing about the Middle Ages. But it means, among other things, the resurrection of the idea that every man stands in relationship to every other man, and to God, and it means, one may surely believe, the resurrection of some of the lost joy of life, and of that very peculiar quality we call the sense of humor.

Now the sense of humor began to decay, among the English at all events, when in the sixteenth century the small tradesmen began to get prosperous (and proud), and with the aid of Protestantism, which was more or less of a novelty, took themselves seriously. It began to decay when they no longer, as did their Catholic fathers and grandfathers, called themselves just plain sinners, but discovered that they were miserable sinners—as indeed they were. And so it went on, until the once robustious sense of humor, having suffered in contact with miserable sinners, fell into the hands of the efficient. And now we think of a humorist as a gaunt gentleman with a green shade over his eyes, who sits in an office and draws funny pictures, for which he receives, say, $50,000 a year. Or he may, possibly, receive less than that sum, in which case his funniness is proportionate.

But the medieval and older Christian and Catholic sense of humor, even though it was a trifle bourgeois at times, was measured not so much by efficiency as by spontaneity. It took its rise in such human motives as the love of God, or the salvation of souls. And even a Pope like St. Gregory the Great could not resist a pun when he contemplated the salvation of the English. Non Angli sed angeli, "Not Angles but angels," was a witticism that in no way affected the thoroughness of his mission to England. Or take another Catholic gentleman of a somewhat earlier period, St. Lawrence. His persecutors roasted him to death over a huge gridiron, and the Saint turned to them and said, not in reproach, Assatum est jam, versa, "The meat is cooked now, turn it over!" and so he died with a glad heart the death of the martyr.

Now it is something of this old sense of humor that is so great a characteristic of much of Theodore Maynard's poetry, a slender volume of which, entitled "Laughs and Whifts of Song," Erskine MacDonald has published. This poet has that sense of the laughter of the sons of God that inspires him to write about the relationship between the high mysteries of heaven and the very ordinary things we meet with in ordinary life. He sees, for example, something particularly spirited in the vision of Christ and His cohorts riding in triumph through the gates of heaven:

> Ah no! These few, the maimed, the dumb,
> The saints of every lazar's den,
> The earth's offscourings—they come
> From desert and from fen
>
> To break the terror of the night,
> Black dreams and dreadful mysteries,
> And proud, lost empires in their might,
> And chains and tyrannies. . . .

He sees, as it were, an almost sacred jocoseness in the picture of contrast between these two stanzas, a Divine relationship that can laugh at our modern and solemn "uplift."

But to say that Mr. Maynard has the medieval sense of humor is not to label him a humorist. There is humor, but there is also terror, and something more that is too vast and impressive for any sort of analysis in the last stanza of his poem called "A Song of Laughter":

> The stars with their laughter are shaken;
> The long waves laugh at sea;
> And the little Imp of Laughter
> Laughs in the soul of me.
>
> I know the guffaw of the tempest,
> The mirth of a blossom and bud—
> And I laugh when I think of how Cuchulain laughed
> At the crows with their bills in his blood.
>
> The mother laughs low at her baby,
> The bridegroom with joy in his bride—
> And I think that Christ laughed when they took Him with staves
> On the night before He died.

Only poetic genius combined with a sound belief in the truths of a revealed religion could paint such a picture of eternal scorn, infinite magnanimity, and the stooping of Omnipotence to meet the onslaught of impotence, as is shown in the last two lines of this poem.

Mr. Maynard is now a Dominican, and in many of his poems there is the touch of the mystic,—the true mystic, that is, not the false mystic who turns everything he sees into a fog, but he who sees the familiar thing not only as it is, but as it appears in its relation to him and to the whole of creation. For instance in looking at the trees, in the third stanza of "Cecidit, Cecidit Babylon Magna!" the poet sees a picture of a well-ordered community. But read the entire poem:

> The aimless business of your feet,
> Your swinging wheels and piston rods,
> The smoke of every sullen street
> Have passed away with all your gods.
>
> For in a meadow far from these
> A hodman treads across the loam,
> Bearing his solid sanctities
> To that strange altar called his home.
>
> I watch the tall, sagacious trees
> Turn as the monks do, every one;
> The saplings, ardent novices,
> Turning with them toward the sun,
>
> That Monstrance held in God's strong hands,
> Burnished in amber and in red;
> God, His Own priest, in blessing stands;
> The earth, adoring, bows her head.
>
> The idols of your market-place,
> Your high debates, where are they now?
> Your lawyers' clamor fades apace—
> A bird is singing on the bough!
>
> Three fragile, sacramental things
> Endure, though all your pomps shall pass—
> A butterfly's immortal wings,
> A daisy, and a blade of grass.

This is an exquisite allegory. For the trees turn toward the sun as to the source of their life, and the poet sees in them something that reminds him of a choir of monks turning toward the altar, to the Sol Justitiæ. And not only is it an exquisite poetical fancy, but it is sound mysticism. The trees do not remind the poet of temple bells, for example, that are blown about in the wind; nor do they make him think of water-jars which, when they are dropped, are smashed to pieces. But they do remind him of persons with a definite idea of what is called their "vocation"; they remind him of something positive, and not of a candle fluttering in the wind, which is the spirit of the temple-bells mysticism. And this touch of the mystic is more true to its kind in such a poem as "The Mystic," which is a poem about Almighty God and a poor old woman who earned her bread as a seamstress; in "The World's Miser," which is the antithesis of our modern Pantheism because it postulates a relationship between the Creator and the creature; and in "Easter," where the poet laughs in his soul in company with the inspired poet who wrote Benedicite omnia opera Domini Domino.

Now because Theodore Maynard has this medieval spirit of humor and Christianity, he finds for his themes such things as the love of God, the love of his fellow-man, in every phase of life, and a pious hatred of fraud. And so he can write his poem, "To a Good Atheist," and salute the atheist as a man of conscience and courage. And he can also write his poem, "To a Bad Atheist," a little chap "who wrote what he called a trinity of meek retorts to the preceding poem, which were not meek, but full of pride and abominable heresy." He describes the bad atheist's mind as having room for nothing but sawdust, sun and sand, which is comprehensive and to the point, and he addresses him as "a solemn little chap," which sums up the whole case against him.

But there is something that puts the poet immediately in company with the quaint wit of many an old scribe as he finished the tail-piece to a page of illuminated manuscript, or with a wood-carver of a bygone age as he carved punning devices on the misericordes of the choir stalls, and that is his "Ballade in Praise of Arundel." This is a nobly democratic poem about a parish church and a village inn, and it ends with this superb absolution offered to the Duke of Norfolk:

> Duke, at the dreadful Judgment Day
> Your soul will surely be well shriven,
> For then all angel trumps shall bray,
> He kept pubs open till eleven!

A poem which is worthy of the pens of two such Christian men as Hilaire Belloc or Gilbert K. Chesterton. And there is the same kindly love of man in "Requiem."

Therefore the message of this poet is not that the poor are blessed because they are poor, or the good because they are good, or that the humility of the violet is anything for it to be proud about. But it is an old message about the Fatherhood of the Creator and the relationship and interdependence of His creatures: it is an echo of the laughter of the sons of God.

HENRY C. WATTS.

REVIEWS

The Memory of Our Dead. By HERBERT THURSTON, S.J., St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.80.

Father Thurston has collected in the volume before us material already published for the most part in the Month, the Dublin Review and the American Ecclesiastical Review. These materials thus "manipulated and adjusted," as he tells us, contain a "brief but fairly comprehensive sketch of the Catholic practice of prayer for the dead from the first centuries of Christianity down to the close of the Middle Ages." At a time when thousands of families are mourning for their loved ones slain on the far-flung battle-line of the European war, the volume becomes something more than a fine piece of historical writing. It is a herald of consolation. Instructive from the critical and dogmatic point of view, it will also prove spiritually strengthening and edifying. The reader, on laying it down, will feel his piety and devotion enkindled, and his heart new-opened to the deep and touching cry of distress ascending from the prison-house of the King. Thanks to the writer's rich and luminous exposition of the consoling dogma and practice which he has studied from so many angles, that cry of distress will have a deeper meaning and a more heart-stirring pathos. The volume is sound and correct in its historical research and data but its practical results in fostering devotion to the Holy Souls and in keeping alive the memory of our departed far outweigh even its historical value.

The book is made up of seven chapters. In the first chapter "The Early Centuries," it begins with a brief reference to the antiquity of the prayers for the dead as evidenced in the Second Book of Machabees and what is probably the earliest example of Christian prayer for the dead, that afforded by the Abercius monument discovered some time ago at Hieropolis by Sir William M. Ramsay. After discussing "The Diptychs and Their Developments," "A Medieval Mortuary Card," "All Souls and Its Three Masses," "The Month's Mind," "The Devotional Appeal of Prayer for the Dead," "Observances, Abuses and Survivals," the volume ends with the All Hallows and the "Midnight Bells" ringing in our ears. Father Thurston has so skilfully and richly harvested in the field before him, that he is fully justified in writing at the close of the book: "It would not be too much to say that prayer for the departed was one of the great pivots of social, ecclesiastical, educational, and artistic life in all medieval Europe." J. C. R.

G. K. Chesterton: A Criticism. By JULIUS WEST. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.00.

Mr. West writes more as an "English" politician than as a literary critic. The book is full of defenses of the Labor party, defenses of Socialism, and Shavian impertinences about Belloc and Chesterton manifestly not being economists simply because they do not accept Collectivism. The author is addicted to that indiscriminate handling of general terms that is so characteristic of Fabianism. Thus Mr. West calls Chesterton a "Catholic Tory," a term which might apply to the late Wilfrid Ward or the present Duke of Norfolk, but is quite unsuitable to "G. K. C." Moreover, the volume contains numerous misrepresentations. For instance, where in "G. K. C.'s" work does one get the impression that he views God as "an idiot child"?

On the subject of Mr. Chesterton's so-called "Anti-Semitism" Mr. West cannot distinguish between historical analysis and insult. Simply because the "Chesterbellocians" are among the few who have considered the Jewish question of sufficient importance to discuss it, they are "Anti-Semites" The author's suggestion that Chesterton owes most of his beliefs to Belloc is absurd. Even when Mr. West praises the great romanticist there is a sting in his eulogies, a disgruntled approval of Chesterton's "brilliancy"—how tired one becomes of that word!—"paradoxical cleverness" and "intellectual energy." Could one not say that Chesterton parodies himself in his minor literary efforts? Gilbert Chesterton, far more than Mr. Roosevelt, who revels in "G. K. C.'s" books, is the apostle of the "strenuous life," for he calls to mankind from an easy-chair in his garden to be more romantic and vigorous. As to Chesterton's style, Mr. West might have remarked that its origin is in the King James Version of Holy Scripture. On the whole the book is literary gossip rather than literary criticism. H. M.

Old Judge Priest. By IRVIN S. COBB. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.25.

The Stories of H. C. Bunner. Two Volumes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

These pages from the life of Judge Priest, late of Nathan Bedford Forrest's cavalry, at present commander of the Gideon K. Irons Camp of the United Confederate Veterans, and an ornament to the Kentucky bench, will delight all hearts that first began to beat south of Mason and Dixon's Line. Irvin Cobb is probably the last of living authors to prate of his "art" and his "literary methods," but he can tell a good story, and his humor is always wholesome and clean. Moreover, he knows how to draw an accurate picture of a Catholic priest. "Father Minor," who is a real ecclesiastic, and not the curious cross between a gull and a fanatic customary with the novelists, suggests in many points the late Father Thomas Major, sometime of the Confederate army, and for many years a priest of the diocese of Covington. A delicate subject is treated with much restraint and beauty in "The Lord Provides," while "Sergeant Jimmy Bagby's Feet" discusses with amusing accuracy the present relations of both parties to the late unpleasantness between the States.

Bunner's two volumes will be heartily enjoyed even by those critics unwilling to accept the judgment of Brander Matthews, that Bunner was "a master of the short story." "Love in Old Cloathes" loses none of its charm by age, and perhaps the jaded reader of a century hence will discern the pathos of "A Letter and a Paragraph," and delight in the quaintness of "Our Aromatic Uncle." There is a distinction about Bunner's work which raises it immeasurably above the average of magazine-fiction, yet to say with Professor Matthews that any one of his stories "can withstand comparison with any example selected from Hawthorne or Poe, Bret Harte or Cable" is to push friendly appreciation to the verge of unthinking panegyric. P. L. B.

Paul Mary Pakenham, Passionist. By the Rev. JOSEPH SMITH, C.P. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.50.

This little book reflects the worth of a man whose name was identified during his short life with much that is noble. The Honorable Charles Reginald Pakenham came of a distinguished Irish family, his father being the second Earl of Longford and his mother the daughter of the first Earl Beauchamp. Led by the Divine light into the one Fold, young Pakenham disposed of his commission as an officer in the Guards, divided his property among charitable institutions, and was received as a novice by the Passionists. While his fondness for the spirit of his Institute was consuming, we find nothing very extraordinary in the complexion of his sanctity, for, as his biographer well expresses it: "The simplicity of his spiritual life matched the noble simplicity of his natural character." Soon after his ordination to the priesthood, Father Pakenham was called upon to found the Congregation of the Passion in Ireland, and readers will marvel at the varied activities which were a part of his daily life at this time, though the state of his health called for rest. When he died he had not completed the thirty-sixth year of his age nor the sixth of his religious life, but "being made perfect in a short space, he fulfilled a long time." The beautiful lines of Lionel Johnson are his fitting epitaph:

> The freedom of the living dead;
> The service of a living pain:
> He chose between them, bowed his head,
> And counted sorrow gain.

A. H. R.

The Riddle of Personality. By H. ADDINGTON BRUCE. New and Revised Edition. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. $1.25.

This book might well be styled a study in the abnormal, undertaken with a view to gaining a clearer and a fuller idea of the nature of personality. The author believes that the popular concept which emphasizes the unity and continuity of the ego is inadequate; it fails to account for the phenomena of insanity, hysteria, somnambulism, hypnotism, in a word, for the disintegrations, partial or complete, that often affect the ego during its bodily life. He is convinced that the discoveries made by the investigators in this field of inquiry have not been sufficiently appreciated; and, particularly, that the therapeutic possibilities which the work done by these pioneers has disclosed are invaluable. The work of some, however, viz., the psychopathologists, tends toward materialistic conclusions, and so a corrective is needed. It is proposed, then, "to correlate the discoveries of the psychical researchers and the psychopathologists with a view to showing that, instead of undermining the long-cherished faith in the immortality of man, the results of their inquiries and experiments confirm and buttress it."

In his search for a satisfactory definition of personality the writer seems to forget that such an attempt is necessarily foreordained to failure when the abnormal states of consciousness are made the starting-point of investigation; and this precisely because these states are abnormal and, frequently enough, merely transient. If, however, it is designed simply to supplement, as far as possible, our present knowledge of the complex and often mysterious workings of the one abiding mind underlying and remaining substantially unchanged throughout all these manifestations, then we have no quarrel to find with his purpose. Only it is well to remember that the upholders of a dual personality often overlook the many links that bind together the two states of consciousness, the normal and the abnormal, which can usually be readily detected by those who view the facts in their entirety. J. A. C.

Reveries over Childhood and Youth. By WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

This book is an example of simple, graceful writing and it will doubtless interest "those few people, mainly personal friends, who have read all" that the author has written, but the taint of sordid "realism" mars the book's literary value. Mr. Yeats's father believed that "Ideals make the blood thin and take the human nature out of people." May not this unconscious revelation of a father's shortcomings account in a measure for the vagaries of his son? In his narrative the author tells of going to a spiritualistic séance at the invitation of a "Catholic" friend: a precious "Catholic," that! Mr. Yeats's mental twist is no doubt responsible for the misleading notions he has of Catholic Ireland. He remarks that "The Irish Catholics among whom have been born so many political martyrs had not the good taste, the household courtesy and decency of the Protestant Ireland I had known." Yet the courtesy and refinement of Irish Catholics have won the admiration of travelers of all nations and all creeds, and their decency is such that it certainly would never allow them to write of such subjects as the refined Mr. Yeats has done in this book. It is clear that the author's youthful "Reveries" have been deeply colored by the opinions he now holds, but he was never really normal at all. A. J. H.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The America Press is publishing a five-cent pamphlet containing the papers on the New York Charities Investigation that have been running in these columns. Father Blakely, Father Tierney, Dr. Higgins and Mr. Hebberd examine from different angles the value of the investigators' testimony, and throw light on the motives that prompted the attack. The pamphlet will be illustrated by thirty-eight photographs taken in the maligned institutions so that readers may see for themselves how baseless are the charges made by the investigators. As the attack on the Catholic charities of New York is only one maneuver of what is evidently a widespread campaign to secularize and paganize all relief-work in this country and to take God from the hearts of children, the pamphlet should have more than a local appeal to Catholics.

It would be illuminating to know just why "The Way of All Flesh," a posthumous novel of the Samuel Butler who did not write "Hudibras," has lately been republished, a professor of Yale contributing a flippant introduction. In the course of this bitter satire on Church of England clergymen, the author, who was an ex-minister, attacks Christianity itself. Much of the book seems to be an account of his own life. Given a man who, in Caliban's phrase, is such a "thrice-double ass" as the "hero" of this novel, his adventures are not surprising. There is not an agreetable character in the book. The author could use excellent English but sadly misused his gift in writing this pernicious novel.

Said an officer to a Catholic missionary who had just come to Africa: "You will be home again, Father, in a couple of years; we can't live long out here." "Live long? We came out here to die, Sir, not to live." Most missionaries do live, however, and find life interesting too. The work is hard, and self-sacrifice becomes a commonplace virtue; there is no room for "half-timers" in the field; character is what counts. This is what the Rev. F. Gavan Duffy, P.F.M., shows in the score of short papers on the missionary's life in the Orient which he has gathered into a volume called "Yonder?" (Devin-Adair, $1.00). Though the book is rather fragmentary and discursive in its make-up, there are many pages in it that should stimulate the reader's zeal for foreign missions and foster vocations for that noble work.

"Shakespeare is the great asserter of the ineradicable soundness of human nature" is the thesis that George Lyman Kittredge admirably demonstrated in a lecture on "Shakspere" he delivered in Sander's Theater, Cambridge, on April 23. The address has now been published by the Harvard University Press and is very refreshing reading after the quantity of commonplace essays on the great poet that his tercentenary year has already produced. The author shows that there are as many Shakespeares as there are people who read him, that all attempts to identify the real Shakespeare with this or that character in the plays are futile, and with sound sense and good humor takes deft shots at the critics who read their own vagaries into Shakespeare's lines. Professor Kittredge has no mercy on the purveyors of literary jargon. Would that we had more lectures like this!

In "How Diplomats Make War" (Huebsch, $1.50), Francis Neilson, formerly a member of the House of Commons, bitterly arraigns the governments of the warring nations, and calls for the abolition of secret diplomacy, foreign-office strategy and cabinet rule. Only when government is made amenable in every particular to Parliament and Parliament made primarily and finally responsible for all affairs affecting the lives of the people, argues the anonymous author who is described as a British statesman, shall we have an era when only a just war can be waged. There is a deal of diplomatic history packed into these 370 pages that repays the reader who may not agree with the writer's viewpoint on the present blood-orgy. Francis Neilson in his closing chapter puts a very weak ending to a rather strong book in prating about "a discredited Christianity." True Christianity is about as much responsible for the present world-conflict as is the man in the moon.

Such a book as H. G. Wells's "What Is Coming?" (Macmillan, $1.50) does not call for serious criticism. A man with the author's industry must find it very easy to produce quantities of idle speculations about what the world will be like fifty or a hundred years from now. But the public's keen interest in Mr. Wells's chatter is not so easily explained. He modestly calls himself "a prophet by use and wont," and then proceeds to forecast the end of the war, the exhaustion of the belligerents, the conditions of peace, the future of woman, the map of Europe, the Socialism of tomorrow, and so forth and so on. It is worthy of note that this popular seer failed, however, to foretell the present war.——In "New Wars for Old" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50) the Rev. John Haynes Holmes makes a rather weak plea for pacifism. The book is full of historical errors and equally lacking in logical cogency. We are told, for instance, that "In 312 . . . the religion of Jesus disappeared like a hidden river, not to emerge again for more than a thousand years."

"Father Bernard's Parish" (Scribner's, $1.25) by Florence Olmstead is a novel that gives a good description of life among New York's poor. But the author is not very familiar with the Church's beliefs and practices. Catholic children are not "destined" by their parents for the convent or the seminary. That call comes from God. As Annie Halligan is religiously inclined her mother would pack her off to a Sisterhood, but the girl's marriage to a non-Catholic, who is not well disposed toward the Church, does not say much for the strength of Annie's faith. Nor is Father Bernard, who seldom appears in the novel, the type of pastor Catholics know. He is made "broad-minded" enough to suit all classes, but is not particularly fond of asserting his own convictions.——Mary Taylor Thornton's "When Pan Pipes" (Doran, $1.35) is an old-fashioned romance with lords and ladies, a duel, a forced "vocation" to the religious life, and a highly improbable sham marriage. The early part of the story is less conventional than the later chapters, little Jerry and Betty being attractive figures. There is a very unflattering portrait of a minister in the story and the priest of the manor "serves" Mass,—his own perhaps. The scene of the novel is the England of the eighteen-thirties, and there are several amiable characters who are Catholics.

Apropos of the numerous conversions from the Church of England which Catholicism is making, Gladstone once remarked: "The conquests have been chiefly, as might have been expected, among women." Whereupon Mrs. Margaret F. Sullivan, that gifted Catholic journalist who died, all too soon, thirteen years ago, wrote for the Catholic World, a rejoinder that is reprinted, with leave, in the current Catholic Mind. These are some of the questions which, with admirable and convincing erudition, she answers in her article:

> What, then, are the facts? Did women in the early days submit to torture and death, side by side with men, rather than deny their faith in Christ? Was their faith, too, sealed with their blood? Did women share the labor and the danger of teaching the truths of religion? Did they, when such study was extremely difficult, and required more intellect because it enjoyed fewer aids than now, devote themselves to the investigation and elaboration of sacred subjects? Have they contributed anything to the learning and literature of the Church? Have they gone into uncivilized countries as missionaries? Have they furnished conspicuous examples of fidelity to God under circumstances seductive or appalling? Have they founded schools, established and maintained houses for the sick, the poor, the aged, the orphan, the stranger? Have they crossed the thresholds of their homes, never to re-enter, but to follow whithersoever the Lord beckoned? Has their zeal led them into the smoke and rush of battle, into the dens of pestilence, into squalor and the haunts of crime? Have they proved by evidence which will not be disputed that, to win others to their faith, they have given up everything, they can give up everything, that their faith is dearer to them than all else on earth? Then, surely, a faith which has made its progress even "chiefly among women" has made a progress as solid as if it were chiefly among men, for no greater things can man do than these.

Mrs. Sullivan's paper is both a historical survey of all that Catholic women have accomplished to promote the world's civilization, and a refutation of the charge that the Church keeps woman in a state of intellectual thraldom. The number concludes with a short account of "What One Woman Did."

Dr. Robert Maxwell Harbin, the author of "Paradoxical Pain" (Sherman, French, $1.25), seems to be a Christian with a firm hold on such dogmas as God's fatherly Providence, the eternity of hell, and the expiatory value of suffering. Drawing on an experienced and well-read physician's study and observation he has gathered together a great deal of valuable information, and his reflections, while not free from platitudes, are generally sensible and apposite. It is interesting to learn, for instance, that "In the world of nature there are 50,000 species of plants, 5,000,000 insects, 10,000 birds, 2,500 animals, 35,000 extinct mammals," and he well says that: "The truest and best things are always given and never bought. The most valued friendships are those which we acquire free-handed, and which we have never sought to win by conferring some favor." Among the best chapters in the book are those entitled "The Rod," "Altruism" and "Striving."

EDUCATION

Vacation Time

THE advent of summer's melting warmth results in a nationwide, promiscuous rush to the mountains, the seaside, the socially-correct baths, the flashy, out-of-the-way and high-priced hotels. Old men and women, young men and women from every walk of life, wherein throughout the year they have been conducting themselves most decorously, are disposed to put off the restraints of their calling and "make a run for it." Youth and age, simplicity and superciliousness, innocence and worldly-mindedness commingle to spend money as though it were water, time as though it were eternity, and their energies as though they would be born again within another generation. There is a certain large percentage of humanity which hypocritically apes respectability during the major portion of the year and unhesitatingly casts discretion and convention to the soothing breezes when summer comes. These "semi-respectables" are generally endowed with that gift of the devil, perpetual middle-age. They retire from one summer's excesses to await with anticipatory glee those of another. Wassail does not turn a hair of their heads; wantonness does not seam their souls.

"CAMPING OUT"

But 'twere a waste of time and sentiment to bemoan the end of these professional tempters of fate, for they will doubtless go their way with hardness of heart while the breath is in their bodies. We are deeply concerned, however, with what is going to happen to the thousands of young men and women who in all innocence go "camping out." The vacation season which broadly covers the months of June, July, August and September is likely to have a powerful influence on the lives of the young. The schools of the country are sending forth thousands of callow visionaries and day-dreamers to the realities of vacation time. They have been planning a summer of some kind of pleasure. They are all a-flutter at the thought of stepping into the unknown. Many strangers they heartily hope to change into lifelong friends. These innocents have long been scrimping for this brief holiday. They are going far from the checks which home-life places on them. For a space at least a new world will be open to them, new companions will attend their sports. Father and mother, and the demands of school and work will be in the dim distance. The pleasure of uninstructed freedom may be indulged without stint. They are going to promote a miniature revolution in their lives: fancy will be dethroned and fact will be crowned king. Reality will step proudly over the prostrate form of imagination.

These thousands of released spirits are going to disregard the sturdy, oft-repeated "No's" and "Thou shalt not's" of father and mother. Very many will get what they ask. Some will be escorted on their vacation by father and mother; still others will be safeguarded by chaperons. And a few go forth into the summer holidays, alone, with joy-crowned faces, and laggingly make their way home after some harrowing experience has changed their brief joy into lasting sadness. Those who know the dangers of vacation time are apt to preach when they get on the subject, or they are prone to over-emphasis. One is as bad as the other. It is difficult to keep calmness at the reins; but I am going to attempt it.

THE CALL OF THE WILD

"Camping out" in its exact and technical meaning has often meant for untested youth a lengthy attack of illness. The precautions of campers are generally of a passing nature; there is little or no attempt to copy and benefit by the perfect sanitation and prophylaxis of the average city home, whence most campers come. Milk and water in the open differ greatly from the milk and water to be found on city tables. The site of the camp may be pestilential, and though the keyed-up spirits of the campers make for immunity, there is a risk which no family physician would suggest encountering. Soft youths and coddled maidens manage to get themselves into hundreds of situations where every physical detail is new. The novelty invites investigation, the risk does not seem so great, and the climax, coming either during or after the holidays have passed, means illness. So much for the physical side. What of the moral?

"Oh, to be sure," explains Mrs. Trust-to-luck, "Gladys is going with the Take-a-chance party and the girls will be looked after by Mrs. Leave-it-to-the-young-'uns, the popular and much-loved chaperon. The girls will like her and will, I am sure, have a good time. Gladys needs a rest, for she has worked hard during the school year!" Mrs. Leave-it-to-the-young-'uns is a "popular" chaperon because she has managed on many an occasion not to see the excesses of her charges. Her policy in the direction of young people has ever been: "When in doubt, say nothing; trust to luck." She believes philosophically in the truth of the idea that there is an especially high place reserved in heaven for "those who mind their own business." She loves her young charges because, as she might phrase it: "The boys are just too sweet for anything, and the girls treat me like a mother and confide to me every evening the doings of the day." But when the party is on, or when one of the couples ventures, knowingly or otherwise, into a dubious situation, Mrs. Leave-it-to-the-young-'uns is not at hand or does not see as far as she should. Mrs. Trust-to-luck may mean well; indeed we may say as much for Mrs. Leave-it-to-the-young-'uns. But "well meaning" is not "doing well."

VACATION RISKS

Mrs. Nothing-could-happen sends Berenice to Palm City or Atlantic Garden with no companion save a suit-case or a woolly dog. Berenice has been about the world and knows a thing or two and "is able to take care of herself." But down underneath all this pretence at motherly satisfaction, there is the all-settling fact that Miss Berenice Nothing-could-happen is "the autocrat of an American home" and does as she wills. She is presumed to know and her cowed mother is the guarantor of that knowledge.

The vacation risks which have here been particularly applied to girls affect the courageous male in a like sense and degree. A decisive, sudden change may be desirous for the vivifying shock it administers to the nervous system, but a deliberate choice of shock should be prepared for in advance by precautionary measures. There's the rub. Parental authority is often set at naught by wilful vacationers. Insistence and nagging, in the way that American youth know how to use those weapons, often break down the sternest Spartan spirit.

I should like to say a word or two to Mr. and Mrs. Deeply-Thoughtful and Mr. and Mrs. Very Earnest: "If you have the welfare of your children at heart, and your name means that you have, examine all vacation projects carefully before you put the seal of approval on them. Do your thinking before, and not after, the harm is done. Apply the worry-lessening principles of 'safety first' to the problem."

EDWARD FRANCIS MOHLER, M.A.

SOCIOLOGY

Fag-Ends of the Charities Investigation

A NARROWED outlook and a gelid charity, in fact a certain degree of snappishness, may be pardoned one who has dwelt in an Arctic Circle igloo, with only dogs, fleas and natives to aid in whiling away the tedium of a six months' night. The Reverend Hudson Stuck, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, now on leave from Alaska, evinces signs that he harbors these unchurchly qualities in his missionary bosom. Selected to address the graduates of Columbia University at the recent Convocation, the Venerable Archdeacon of the Yukon transmitted volumes of perfectly innocuous subjects, and forgetting that he was to speak in the cloistered home of Giddings and Devine, chose to express his extreme dislike and "dread of the trained sociologist," with his card catalogue, his filing cabinet, his statistics, and "his last glorious achievement, the plotting of a curve." For this unseemly outburst, the Archdeacon was very properly taken to task by New York's arbiter elegantiarum, the Evening Post, and now, no doubt, feels that life is as hollow as an empty canoe.

SOCIOLOGY IN ALASKA

Dr. Stuck entertains the odd impression that modern sociology needs less of the professional spirit and more of the spirit of Jesus Christ. A guileless Israelite is this Yukon missionary, not to know that, in modern sociology, Christ is merely a human reformer, with many very reactionary views on the subject of poverty, and some shockingly shiftless principles on not taking thought for the morrow. The Archdeacon thinks, further, that the card-catalogue charity worker lacks "sympathy." The cataloguer is quite convinced that you can put John Smith's soul on a yellow card and file it away in section "S." He does not know that the greatest things in the world, like the blush of a rose, or the tremulous silver fire of a star, or the delicate curve of the cheek of a child, or sacrifice, or home, or the song of a thrush, or faith or love, or anything worth living for or loving, cannot be reduced to a system, or be found in an index. Nor does he understand that the most wayward, unconfinable, uncontrollable force in the world, is the human will, made more wilful, more perverse, more impatient of clumsy, rigid curve-plotting, by delusions and the buffetings of fate.

But this is not quoting the Archdeacon of the Yukon. His expressed sentiments end with the word "sympathy"; the intervening patches are my own. Yet as all readers of the Evening Post will feel, Dr. Stuck rises to a climax of uncharitableness, when he says that the trained sociologist lacks a sense of humor. That is why he has so high a conceit of himself.

HATRED OF SELF

Plainly, these are dreadful charges, for a professional philanthropist is a sacrosanct person. He is infallible; all who oppose him are, to poach on Dr. Devine's preserves, "strabismic." He does not "like" criticism; it is always unmerited, and then, like Mrs. Gummidge, he feels it more. He must have adulation; he grows fat on it; and if withheld by a cruel, strabismic public, he feeds upon the vast stores of his self-esteem. "The closing address was a stirring appeal by Graham Taylor," writes Graham Taylor in the Survey for May 27, "whose words went straight home to the hearts of his audience as they did a year ago in Baltimore," but they do not seem to have stayed there, for here they are in New York. When the professional philanthropist is not a Niobite like Mr. Kingsbury, weeping over the woes of the boys and the pigs at Mount Loretto, or a most engagingly simple person, caught up by the magic of his own oratory, he would seem to suggest the less pleasing type of Messrs. Doherty, Bernstein and Reeder, bearing tribute to one another in the presence of the Strong Commission, or of Messrs. Devine, Tucker and Folks chanting, at the Syracuse convention, the greatness of Messrs. Folks, Tucker and Devine. These gentlemen apparently make their living by taking in one another's washing.

MR. KINGSBURY'S NEW BOARD

The Archdeacon of the Yukon here passes out of our picture. Yet at the same time he was delivering himself of his heretical message at Columbia, the martyred Mr. Kingsbury was drawing up a plan for the Board of Estimate of New York. This plan proposes to create, at one fell swoop of Mayor Mitchel's somewhat facile pen, forty-two new charity investigators. The work committed to these persons will be the inspection of all private institutions to which the city entrusts dependents. The army will consist of a director, a man, or perhaps a woman, of "broad social view," twenty-two inspectors, seven physicians, and a clerical staff. The annual cost will be the trifling sum of about sixty thousand dollars. Unlike Browning's Mayor and Corporation, who, if memory serves, started up in a fury when asked to pay the piper, the Mayor of New York and the Board of Estimate approved the proposal. The matter will now be considered by the Board of Aldermen, and although the President of that body has announced his opposition, it is fairly probable that the establishment of a permanent staff of inspectors will shortly be announced as one of the crowning glories of the present city Administration. In view of this probability, I shall answer a brief and pertinent question, for the benefit of a few timorous and misinformed Catholics. "Do the Catholic institutions, caring for children committed by the city or State, refuse to allow regular and complete inspections by the public authorities?"

A BRIEF AND PERTINENT ANSWER

No; and they never did.

SOME MISLED CATHOLIC JOURNALS

It is truly regrettable that a few Catholic newspapers, one of which quoted the Literary Digest with an air of finality, have unwittingly countenanced certain calumnies against the Catholic institutions. The Fortnightly Review, for instance, in its issue for April 15, cites approvingly a paragraph from the Catholic Citizen of Milwaukee, in which that journal advises the Catholic institutions of New York "to challenge full and thorough investigation, and show the disposition of every cent that they get from the public treasury." This they have always done; though the reason why our Sisters should show what they do with the money received after they have cared for the city's charges is not clear. They get none before. The Citizen's advice indicates not only a general misapprehension of the points at issue, but complete ignorance of the financial relations of the city with the institutions. The Catholic Messenger of Davenport, Iowa, is a sinner of deeper dye. In the number for June 8, this journal deplores "the strenuous controversy . . . between Mayor Mitchel and some of the clergy, Catholic and non-Catholic," the responsibility for which "will probably not be known until further investigation." No non-Catholic clergy are involved; Daniel Potter was once a minister; but that may pass. Apparently, the Messenger does not know that the clergy accused by Mayor Mitchel of crime are learned and blameless priests, one the secretary to the Auxiliary Bishop of New York, another the Chancellor of the Archdiocese, a third prominent for his work among the poor. They are not men who seek controversy; but they are men who speak out bravely when the interests of Christ's little children are at stake. Neither does the Messenger seem to be aware that the only legal body, which has passed on the matter, indicted the Mayor's Commissioner of Charities and his counsel for felony, and just stopped short of indicting the Mayor himself.

FALSE ASSUMPTIONS

After quoting the Literary Digest, the Messenger continues:

> The Church in her charitable work, in her charitable institutions, must be above reproach, and must see that the people in charge of such institutions rightly and honestly and efficiently conduct them. There ought not to be any effort on the part of the representatives of the Church, whether clerical or lay, to conceal actual conditions in these institutions. They should at all times be subject to inspection and be in a condition to invite inspection from any decent and legitimate source.

Apart from the presumption of instructing the ecclesiastical authorities of New York in their duty, there are five assumptions in this indirect criticism, and all are false. The assumptions are: (1) the Catholic institutions in New York are not "rightly and honestly and efficiently" conducted; (2) the ecclesiastical authorities are remiss in not requiring the institutions to be "above reproach"; (3) "representatives of the Church, whether clerical or lay," endeavor "to conceal actual conditions"; (4) the institutions are not subject to legitimate inspection; (5) they are not always in a condition "to invite inspection." My personal comment is that these assumptions could not be improved upon by Doherty or Kingsbury.

AN OFFICIAL STATEMENT

More to the point, however, is a statement signed by Mgr. Dunn, Chancellor of New York, and Dr. James J. Higgins, Secretary of the Catholic Charities Bureau in the diocese of Brooklyn. The statement announces no new policy; as everyone knows, the Catholic institutions have always been open to inspection.

> The institutions of New York and Brooklyn do not resent reasonable criticism or inspection. Our doors are open to the public. We welcome at any and all times healthy and helpful criticism and suggestions. We have nothing to conceal and are not ashamed of our work. On the contrary, we are proud of it.
>
> You ask, "Have not the people who pay the taxes a right to know what becomes of their money?" They have. "Have not those who subscribe for charities a right to know how their wards are cared for?" They have. No one, least of all the managers of our institutions, will gainsay this right. To ask these questions is to answer them.

This should settle the matter for all fair-minded men. Yet no later than the first week in June, certain New York papers, among them the Globe and the World, repeated the old charge that the Catholic institutions oppose inspection.

ON RANDALL'S ISLAND

I am a poor man and can give nothing but advice, and a small bit is herewith respectfully tendered to Mr. Kingsbury. There is a well-known institution for delinquents, conducted by the city on Randall's Island. It is called the House of Refuge, and more than one uplifter has contributed to its fame. Last April, a few of its young guests, determining no longer to inflict their company upon the house, planned to murder a guard and escape. The plot failed; they murdered no guard and they did not escape. But they did their best. An assistant engineer barred their way; so they promptly beat him to death with shovels. On May 23, these boys were held without bail to the Grand Jury on a charge of homicide. I have not heard of the case since that time. Perhaps the new penology has decided that in interfering with the development of youthful initiative, the real crime was the engineer's. I do not know.

My advice is this. Murder and such trifles are commonplaces in institutions conducted by Papists, some of whom, palpably, are ignorant Irish; but they belie somewhat the sweetness and light of the new sociology. Perhaps Mr. Kingsbury may be able to loan a dozen or two of his forty-two sleuths to the city institutions, to investigate those milder forms of felony, which do not require the imperative intervention of the police. The results would be interesting; as a basis of comparison with the private institutions, they would be invaluable. But Mr. Kingsbury will never act upon the suggestion.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

No particular comment is required on the following description of a sermon preached by a Baptist minister in an Ohio town:

> Dressed in a robe and sandals similar to those used in Biblical times, and with a wig and cane, he represented the father of "The Prodigal Son" and preached a very appropriate sermon. The choir sang appropriate hymns at intervals which fitted in nicely with the services. Dr. Hall's sermon was a great surprise for he had not told any member of his congregation what was to be done. He received many compliments for his unique plan from the hundreds of persons who filled the large auditorium.

The Living Church in offering this item to its readers remarks that the preacher "is nothing if not dramatic." Ecclesiastical vaudeville is apparently the latest sensation.

An excellent suggestion for parents anxiously concerned about the purchase of vacation clothing for their romping youngsters, clothing that will not wear out, is contained in a short notice found in Stone, a magazine whose name is sufficiently descriptive of its purpose. This is not a fairy tale: real clothes are said to be manufactured from stone, and to be generally worn by the peasants of a certain district in Russia. They are made of a substance woven, its Russian manufacturer claims, from a gray stone of Siberian origin. This stone, according to further details, is susceptible of being drawn into a fiber, and the fabric woven from it is described as soft, durable and presentable. "There is nothing in the newspaper report of this invention," adds Stone, "to identify the material with asbestos, the fibers of which have long been woven for various purposes."

At the instance of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, the Rev. Henry Browne, S.J., of the National University of Ireland, has visited many universities and educational centers in the East and Middle West of our country in order to report upon the progress made in visual instruction in teaching classics. He was greatly impressed, he says, with the interest taken in classical studies, which exceeded his anticipations. He particularly noted the fact that practical museums for teaching classical antiquities have been formed in some of the State universities and are put to considerable use. He was not so favorably impressed by our public high schools, and learned with surprise that in these schools there exists a great deal of pessimism regarding the future of literary education in the United States. There was reason he believed, for this misgiving. He has returned to Ireland to report to his Committee and will send a paper on the subject of "Visual Instruction in Teaching Classics" to be read at Chautauqua.

A description of the jargon familiarly known as Yiddish was recently given in the Nation. It was originally based upon the dialect of the Rhineland of the fourteenth century and thence was carried by the Jews into Poland.

> As it stands today, it is still predominantly a German dialect, written in the Hebrew alphabet, with borrowings from every land it has touched, and a structure that can only be described as a grammarian's nightmare. In the same sentence, Hebrew, German, Russian, and disguised Latin may jostle each other. Upon Biblical verbs and nouns are superimposed German inflections, and these according to no ascertainable rule.

Yiddish is said to be spoken by ten million people. Newspapers in this language are widely read in some of our larger cities, and are everywhere in evidence in the streets and street-cars of New York.

It is a delightful surprise to hear, amid the cries of distress arising from our foreign mission fields, the occasional reports of unusual successes. "Although the terrible war has crippled our resources and diminished our numbers," writes a missionary of the work accomplished in Pekin, China, "it has been given us this year to register the largest number of conversions ever recorded in a single year, 38,293 baptisms of adults." Such blessings of God should the more stimulate our generosity. The needs are great on every hand, while Protestantism is particularly active in the eastern countries. Thus the Rev. Gregory Coelho, S.J., Director of the Holy Childhood, Mangalore, S. C., India, writes:

> Allow me to express some needs of our poor mission, and especially of our poor boys. There is a very keen competition here. If we do not help our poor Catholic boys, many of whom are destitute but intelligent, the Protestants and Hindoos will take possession of the entire field. Many of these boys, educated in our schools and colleges, have turned out very good Christians and are occupying high positions in the Government offices. They are full of faith and many have joined ecclesiastical seminaries and more than thirty-five have become Jesuits within the last few years. But their education costs us a great deal. Besides these we have a number of children converted from paganism. The support and education of these means money. Up to a short time since we received some help from England and other European countries, but the war has upset everything and now we receive nothing. If we give up the care and education of these poor children, they will be lost to the Church and the Catholic community will be diminished in size.

Here, as elsewhere, any help is welcome: money, church vestments or articles, books and Mass stipends. Such are the appeals still pouring in from every side. Catholics are more than ever seeking to respond to them. They are helping to bring relief to the missionaries afar, and are receiving in return a more perfect sense of Catholic responsibility, one of the most needful blessings for the Church in America.

According to an estimate made by the editor of the Catholic Convert, the number of converts received into the Church in the United States during the year 1915 was well above 40,000 and may probably have risen as high as 45,000. The publishers of the "Catholic Directory" have been able to obtain figures from sixty-nine dioceses only, containing a Catholic population of 8,082,900. The thirty-two remaining dioceses which did not report embrace many of the largest cities of our country and have therefore even a larger Catholic population, amounting to 8,481,500. Since the total number of converts in the reporting dioceses was 19,009, or one convert for every 425 Catholics, it is estimated that with the same ratio the total number of converts for the United States would be approximately 39,000. Attention is called, however, to two other factors which increase this total: one being the converts annually received in the convents throughout the country, many of which, not being asked, do not make returns to the diocesan authorities; the other, the Episcopalians of the High Church party, whose Protestant Baptism is often accepted as valid. As further evidence of such additional conversions, mention is made of the considerable excess of adult confirmations over baptisms, which can only in part be accounted for by attributing it to the negligence of Catholics who do not receive the Sacrament in their youth. While the general ratio of conversions is one convert to every 425 of the Catholic population, it is one to every 313 in Cincinnati, one to every 280 in Omaha, one to every 271 in Louisville, one to every 221 in Indianapolis, and one to every 170 in Columbus, Ohio. The glorious record of this last-named city should serve as a stimulus to Catholics everywhere to strive by their prayers to obtain for their respective dioceses the success which the Lord has granted to Columbus. He alone can give the increase, but we must do what lies in our power to plant and to water.

A congratulatory letter received by the Director of the Catholic Mission Work among the Colored People, the Rt. Rev. John E. Burke, from Cardinal Farley, indicates that forty-four new missions have been established among the ten millions of the colored race in this country and an additional five thousand children are receiving the blessing of a Catholic education. Thanking the Director-General for his zealous work, the Cardinal, as President of the Mission Board, adds:

> For these splendid results, The Catholic Board for Mission Work among the Colored People is indebted to the generous and loyal support of the American Bishops, priests, and laity. They have contributed $63,615.79 for buildings, and $85,962.00 for the maintenance of missionaries, paying $2,720.00 each month for the support of the 126 teachers, mostly Sisters, who have charge of the schools. The Board wishes in an especial manner to thank the Bishops who have welcomed you to their dioceses, and the clergy who have given yourself, the Rev. D. J. Bustin, Rev. W. J. Gibson, and Rev. C. A. Edwards permission to make appeals in aid of its work in their churches. From the Bishops of the South I hear most encouraging reports of their hopes for the future. May God grant you and your devoted assistants the strength and grace to make their needs known in every Catholic home throughout the land!

His Eminence finally alludes to the subscription list which has been opened by the Director-General for a Pius X Memorial Chapel, and generously contributes to this fund. "I am sure that no monument would be more gratifying to the heart of the great and lamented Pontiff, who loved America so well, than a chapel for America's most neglected race."

In an interview with a New York Times correspondent Henryk Sienkiewicz earnestly warns Americans against the suggestion, exceedingly detrimental to the cause of suffering Poland, that alms intended for the Poles are absorbed by Germany and Austria:

> It is with very great regret that my friends and I have read the suggestion that the food which we collect for our own people really goes to the Germans. I can state definitely that there is no possibility of this happening. In the whole country (in the Kingdom of Poland as well as in Lithuania and Galicia) are local committees, formed entirely of Poles, who are acting with us and who would certainly not have undertaken such a task if they had not been convinced that the money and other supplies are distributed only among the local population.
>
> Just as relief is conveyed to the Belgians who have remained in their own country, so it is extended to Poles in the territory occupied by German armies. It is as unjust to describe our efforts as pro-German as it would be to apply this description to the relief of the Belgians in the occupied parts of Belgium. It is true that relief has been distributed in Vienna, Graz, Innsbruck, and other Austrian towns, but exclusively to Polish refugees in those places. Many of our people fled from the zone of war to the towns of the interior, where their misery is also very acute. Shall we refuse to succor them because they happen to be in Austrian towns?

It will be remembered that in the "Letter of the Polish Bishops to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Catholic world" the request was made that the donations collected in the various dioceses should be sent to the National Swiss Bank, Banque Nationale Suisse, at Lausanne, Switzerland, to be placed to the account of the General Committee for the Relief of the Victims of the War in Poland, Comité Général de Secours pour les Victimes de la Guerre en Pologne, Vevey. This committee, it was stated, was the only one that has free access to all the provinces of Poland without distinction.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XV. No. 12 }
WHOLE No. 377 }

JULY 1, 1916

{ $3.00 A YEAR
{ PRICE, 10 CENTS

CHRONICLE

Home News: The President and Carranza. The War: Bulletin, June 20 p. m.-June 26 p. m.—The Russian Offensive—Greece Yields to the Allies. France: Vote of Confidence in the Government. Ireland: The Belfast Conference. Rome: The Ambassadors of the Pope. Spain: Catholic Press Campaign—La Cierva's Politics. 269-272

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Witness of Oliver Twist—A College Indictment—Catholic Lawyers and Reading—Saying My Prayers in Latin—A Triumph in Stained Glass—The Sweet Girl Graduate—Catholic Landmarks of Pittsburgh.....273-279

COMMUNICATIONS

The Dependent Child—Pussyfooting—A Mythical Ordinance—Fra Junipero's Habit—An Error Corrected—Vacation Schools—Another Historical Myth?—Not Talk but Work.....290, 281

EDITORIALS

Forty New York Immortals—The Freedom of the Press—Nuns, Newspapers and the Restaurants—The Soldier—A Comprehensive Prayer—Wimona's Enterprising Catholics.....282-284

LITERATURE

XXIX--Francis Thompson.

REVIEWS: Filbusters and Financiers—Saint Catherine of Siena: Her Life and Times—Under the Apple-Trees.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Latest "Best Sellers"—"The Soldier Boy"—"Wild Animal Ways"—"Scouting with Kit Carson"—The July Catholic World—"Freshman Rhetoric"—"The Ideal Catholic Third Reader"—"A Book of Princeton Verse"—"The Perfect Guest."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....285-288

EDUCATION

De la Salle and Popular Education....289, 290

SOCIOLOGY

In Praise of Folly and Crime.....290, 291

NOTE AND COMMENT

G. K. Chesterton on the Rich and Divorce—Nomination by Acclamation—A Valuable Nugget—The Aims and Objects of American Teaching—Where Responsibility for the Printed Page Belongs—The Regulation of Amusements—Rebuke for a Florida Bigot—The New Theology—Censorship for Advertising.....291, 292

CHRONICLE

Home News.—The President's note, whose contents were summarized in AMERICA for June 24, has had the effect of making the First Chief more defiant than ever.

The President and Carranza

The passage which seems to have caused the most displeasure in Mexico recounts some of the atrocities committed by the bandits as follows:

It would be tedious to recount instance after instance, outrage after outrage, atrocity after atrocity, to illustrate the true nature and extent of the widespread conditions of lawlessness and violence which have prevailed. During the past nine months in particular the frontier of the United States along the lower Rio Grande has been thrown into a state of constant apprehension and turmoil because of frequent and sudden incursions into American territory and depredations and murders on American soil by Mexican bandits, who have taken the lives and destroyed the property of American citizens, sometimes carrying American citizens across the international boundary with the booty seized.

American garrisons have been attacked at night, American soldiers killed and their equipment and horses stolen. American ranches have been raided, property stolen and destroyed, and American trains wrecked and plundered. The attacks on Brownsville, Red House Ferry, Progreso Post Office and Las Peladas, all occurring during September last, are typical of these attacks on American territory. Carranza adherents and even Carranzista soldiers took part in the looting, burning and killing. Not only were these murders characterized by ruthless brutality but uncivilized acts of mutilation were perpetrated. . . .

So far has the indifference of the de facto Government to these atrocities gone that some of these leaders, as I am advised, have received not only the protection of that Government but encouragement and aid as well.

Hardly had the contents of the note become fully known in the United States, when word was flashed from Mexico that, on June 21, the Carranzistas had attacked our troops at Carrizal, east of Casas Grandes, the American base, killing thirteen men and taking seventeen prisoners. After that the Mexicans gave every evidence that they were preparing for war. Hence, on June 23, the American Militia was ordered to the border, and on the same day our Secretary of State sent the Southern Republics the following notice of "the critical relations existing between this Government and the de facto Government of Mexico":

Should the situation eventuate into hostilities, which this Government would deeply regret and will use every honorable effort to avoid, I take this opportunity to inform you that this Government would have for its object not intervention in Mexican affairs, with all the regrettable consequences which might result from such a policy, but the defense of American territory from further invasion by bands of armed Mexicans, the protection of American citizens and property along the boundary from outrages committed by such bandits, and the prevention of future depredations, by force of arms against the marauders infesting this region and against a Government which is encouraging and aiding them in their activities.

Hostilities, in short, would be simply a state of international law without purpose on the part of the United States other than to end the conditions which menace our national peace and the safety of our citizens.

ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

Carranza on the other hand is equally sure that the United States is the aggressor. On June 23, Ferrara, Speaker of the Lower House of the Cuban Congress, cabled the First Chief urging him to avoid a war "which would destroy the equilibrium of the American continent." The reply of Carranza places all blame on the United States:

Your kind message received. It is neither the people nor the Government I represent, but the Government of the United States, which has caused the present situation between the two nations, by its lack of tact in international affairs and its lack of respect for Mexican sovereignty. To repel with arms the Americans who on any pretext invade the national territory—there remains no other recourse than this, to defend the sovereignty of the Republic. Consequently, the American Government can avert war by respecting the sovereignty of Mexico.

V. CARRANZA.

As the strain continued great, Chile, Argentina, Ecuador, Salvador, Honduras and Spain made offers of mediation to the Mexican Republic, but apparently quite without success. On June 24, President Wilson, realizing that Carranza was not inclined to recede from his position, demanded the release of the prisoners captured by the Mexicans at Carrizal. This demand was justified by the Mexican note requesting an explanation of the presence of American troops in the vicinity where the clash occurred. On June 24, Arredondo, Carranza's representative in Washington, sent the following communication to our Government:

I am directed by my Government to inform Your Excellency, with reference to the Carrizal incident, that the Chief Executive, through the Mexican War Department, gave orders to General Jacinto B. Trevino not to permit American forces from General Pershing's column to advance further south nor to move either east or west from the points where they are located, and to oppose new incursions of American soldiers into Mexican territory. These orders were brought by General Trevino to the attention of General Pershing, who acknowledged the receipt of the communication relative thereto. On the 22d instant, as your Excellency knows, an American force moved eastward quite far from its base, notwithstanding the above orders, and was engaged by Mexican troops at Carrizal, State of Chihuahua. As a result of the encounter several men on both sides were killed and wounded and seventeen American soldiers were made prisoners.

On June 25 the President returned this answer through Rogers, our representative in Mexico City:

The Government of the United States can put no other construction upon the communication handed to the Secretary of State of the United States on the 24th day of June, by Mr. Arredondo under instructions of your Government, than that it is intended as a formal avowal of deliberately hostile action against the forces of the United States now in Mexico and of the purpose to attack them without provocation whenever they move from their present position in pursuance of the objects for which they were sent there, notwithstanding the fact that those objects not only involve no unfriendly intention toward the Government and people of Mexico, but are, on the contrary, intended only to assist that Government in protecting itself and the territory and people of the United States against irresponsible and insurgent bands of rebel marauders. I am instructed, therefore, by my Government to demand the immediate release of the prisoners taken in the encounter at Carrizal, together with any property of the United States taken with them, and to inform you that the Government of the United States expects an early statement from your Government as to the course of action it wishes the Government of the United States to understand it has determined upon, and that it also expects that this statement be made through the usual diplomatic channels and not through subordinate military commanders.

This letter makes the issue clear beyond misunderstanding.

The War.—In France the only event of importance has been the resumption by the Germans of a heavy offensive in the Verdun region. East of the Meuse the Germans stormed the Thiaumont fortifications, captured the greater portion of Hill 321 and Hill 320, gained a footing in the village of Fleury, and made progress south of Vaux. Increased activity is reported in the Champagne district, and near Moulainville in the Woevre district. In the Trentino the only gains have been made by the Italians, who have advanced north of Rimini in the Arsa Valley, have reached the Piazza Valley north of Monte Pasubio, and further to the east are approaching Monte Pruche.

Bulletin, June 20, p. m.-June 26, p. m.

In Armenia the Turks have gained a victory north of the Chorokh River, and the Russians in the direction of Diarbekr. In Persia the Turks have driven the Russians from the Paitak Pass to the village of Serail. In Mesopotamia the Russians have been successful in engagements near Mosul and Rowandus. Further south in Mesopotamia the Shii Moslems have risen in revolt against the Turks at Kerbela and Nejeft. In Arabia a similar revolt against the Turks has resulted in the capture by the Arabs of Mecca, Jeddah and Taif.

The Germans have inaugurated an offensive along the Dvina and especially in the vicinity of Dvinsk, but their efforts in the region have been rather in the nature of a demonstration than a serious attack. In the district north of Widsy, the Russians have made a counter-offensive, but without having accomplished anything important. Further south, along the Beresina, the Germans have advanced a short distance in the direction of Minsk. They are also endeavoring to force back the Russians along the Oginski Canal, north of Pinsk. In Volhynia the combined forces of the Austrians and Germans have not only maintained a stubborn defensive, which has effectively blocked the Russian advance, but are exerting a steadily increasing pressure, which has forced the Russians back toward Lutsk, in some places as much as five miles. Battles of a very sanguinary nature have taken place west of Kolki and Sokul, between the Styr and the Stochod, especially at Grusiatyn. Furious fighting has also been in progress in the vicinity of Kisselin, northeast and southeast of Lokatschi, at Gorochow, and along the railroad that runs from Berestetschko to Radziwilow, but at no point in this section has either side gained any decided advantage. In East Galicia the situation has remained unchanged, except that the Russians claim to have reached the Zlota Lipa in one place. They have, however, advanced west from Sniatyn and established themselves on the banks of the Rybnitza.

The Russian Offensive

In Bukowina the Russians have swept forward with great rapidity. Moving south from the Dniester they have occupied Okna and Zastavna; leaving Czernowitz and the Pruth River they have taken Gliboka, Storozynatz, Zadowa and Widnitz. They also crossed the Czeremosz at Widnitz and captured Kuty, but this last place the Austrians claim to have recaptured. Advancing south and west from the Sereth, the Russians have also occupied Straza, Radautz, Gurahumora and Kimpolung. The Austrians in this region have been avoiding battle as far as possible, evacuating town after town, and have reached the foothills of the Carpathians. Their purpose is to avoid loss of men, and in this they have been in the main successful, although the Russians put the number of Austrian prisoners at 185,000. Practically all of Bukowina is now in the hands of the Russians.

Greece Yields to the Allies

Yielding to the coercion exercised by the Allied fleet through the recently inaugurated embargo and blockade, against which the Ministry of M. Skouloudis entered a formal protest with the Neutral Powers, King Contantine has accepted all the demands of the Entente, which are as follows: a general demobilization of the army, the formation of a new Cabinet which shall be nonpartizan, the adjournment of the Chamber, to be followed by new elections, and the removal of certain objectionable police functionaries. Already orders have been given for disbanding the army; a new Cabinet has been formed with M. Zaimis again at its head; the Chamber is soon to be adjourned, and elections are to take place within forty days. The action of the Allies was taken partly on account of the entry of Bulgarian forces into Greece and their occupation of Fort Rupel, and partly as a result of the renewal of active German propaganda among the Greeks.

France.—The Government has for some time been the object of severe criticism on account of the political, economic and military conduct of the war. But on June 22, after protracted discussions in the Chamber, it came successfully out of the ordeal, obtaining a vote of confidence by 440 to 97. The proceedings, which were secret and extended over seven sittings, were welcomed both by the Cabinet, which was enabled to explain and defend its action freely, and by its critics, who, by reason of the exigencies of national defense, had been unable to give particulars to support their complaints in a public session. When the public sessions were resumed, several motions were read by the President of the Chamber; of these only one was adopted. This resolution was drafted jointly by the leaders of the different groups and expressed full confidence in the Government. It then declared that the secret sessions had given the members of the Chamber a valuable insight into the general conduct of the war, and that the Chamber had decided to organize a delegation to exercise, with the assistance of the Government, a direct general check on all services supplying the needs of the army. While having no intention of interfering with the conception, direction or execution of the military operations, the Chamber held that it was its duty to see that preparation of a defensive and offensive nature, both industrial and military, were carried on with a care and energy commensurate with the heroism of the army. After the passage expressing confidence in the Government was adopted, the motion as a whole was carried by a vote of 444 to 80. A motion introduced by the Socialist, M. Léon Accambray, calling for the appointment of a committee of forty to investigate and report on the conduct of the war and the relations of the high command and the public authorities, with a view to taking steps, if necessary, to organize and control Parliament in the best interests of national defense, was not voted on.

Vote of Confidence in the Government

Ireland.—According to special cable dispatches to the New York press, there was held in Belfast, on June 23, a convention of the Irish Nationalist delegates from the six Ulster counties which, according to Lloyd George's plan, are to be excluded from the operation of the Home Rule Bill. By a substantial majority, the convention decided to accept Lloyd George's proposal as a basis for a provisional settlement of the Irish question. Mr. John Redmond, who according to one report presided at the conference, spoke in favor of exclusion and was supported by Messrs. Dillon and Devlin. After a prolonged discussion, 475 delegates voted for acceptance of Mr. Lloyd George's scheme, while 265 voted against it. One account of the proceedings, which were held in private, adds that Mr. Redmond declared that if the proposals were rejected he would not again take the platform as the leader of the Irish Party; this declaration, it is said, determined the result. The dispatches say further that acceptance of the proposal is generally looked upon as a settlement of the Irish problem during the period of the war. According to the press "Nationalists of the rest of Ireland are counted upon to follow the example of the Ulster Nationalists. Opposition from the British Unionists is not likely to be pushed to the length of imperiling the negotiations begun by Lloyd George."

The Belfast Conference

A feature of the voting was the position of Counties Antrim and Down, including Belfast, where the Catholics are in a considerable minority and have most to lose by the exclusion. These counties voted almost solidly for the scheme, the vote being 117 to 10. On the other hand the Sinn Feiners of Tyrone and Fermanagh were practically solid against it. According to the same dispatches, opposition to the proposition was manifested by many of the younger members of the Catholic clergy. Previously the Catholic Bishops of Ulster had declared against Mr. Lloyd George's plan. Mr. John Dillon said that he would not shed a tear if the convention rejected the proposed settlement, but that in view of all the circumstances and the changed situation which the late uprising had brought about, he felt certain that it was for the advantage of the cause of Ireland.

Rome.—The new Delegate and Envoy Extraordinary of the Holy Father to the Republic of Colombia, Mgr. Enrico Gasparri, Titular Archbishop of Sebaste, was received on his entrance into the country at Sabanilla with the greatest marks of respect by the political, civil and ecclesiastical authorities, the army and the people. At Bogotá, the presidential carriage awaited him and conducted him to his quarters. On the day of his formal audience with the President, the Delegate was escorted with every mark of honor to the Executive Mansion, where he was awaited by the Chief Executive, Dr. Concha, the Cabinet and the most prominent civil and military authorities. In presenting his credentials, Mgr. Gasparri assured Dr. Concha, that in the midst of the anguish and sorrows of the war, the Holy Father turned with peculiar sentiments of affection, gratitude and love to the Republic of Colombia, "one of the most devoted and loyal portions of the flock entrusted to his care." The President in his answer gave expression to the sentiments which he and the whole Republic felt toward the Holy Father for the signal mark of honor shown them, and added: "You can count, Monsignore, on the loyal cooperation of the Government. For my part I have always found it an easy and welcome task to fulfil those duties which the Executive Power must observe toward the Church. And that Church itself is considered by the Constitution now in vigor as an essential element of social order." Everything augurs well for the mission thus auspiciously begun.

The Ambassadors of The Pope

In the troubled and faction-torn Republic of Haiti, Mgr. Francesco Cherubini, Titular Archbishop of Nicosia, met with a similar welcome. He was received with the greatest marks of respect by the President of the Republic, by the Haitian and American authorities. At the religious function, attended by the President and his Ministers, by the chief civil and military officers, the Archbishop of Port au Prince cordially welcomed the Delegate, expressed the feelings of loyalty and devotion of the Haitian people to the Holy Father and voiced the hopes of all present that the sojourn of the Holy Father's Ambassador would be the signal and the sign of the return of prosperity and peace for the whole country. In his answer to the Delegate's official presentation of his credentials, in which the Pope's representative told the President of the Holy Father's affection toward the Haitian people, the President assured Mgr. Cherubini of the high regard in which he was held both for his mission and for his own personal virtues and attainments, and begged him to transmit to the Holy Father "the assurance of the constant and unalterable devotion of the Haitian people and Government to the Chair of St. Peter."

The reception given to Mgr. Ceretti, Delegate Apostolic in Australia, on his official visitation of New Zealand, to use the words of Civiltà Cattolica, proved to be a triumphal manifestation of genuine Catholic faith and of love and veneration toward the Holy Father. At Christchurch, at Auckland, in every town or village through which he passed, the whole Catholic population, increased in nearly every instance by the non-Catholic inhabitants, poured out to meet him. At the village of Waichi, where there is a large settlement of Maoris, the Papal Envoy was adopted into the tribe of these once fierce warriors and made one of their chiefs. He presented them in turn with a Papal banner, amidst an enthusiasm and joy which deeply affected him. The day closed with solemn Benediction, at which these faithful and pious Maoris harmoniously sang the Tantum Ergo.

Spain.—The Catholic press of the country is active, vigilant, practical and in some respects superior to that of most other countries. In one field especially, that of

Catholic Press Campaign

Catholic social action, it has done splendid work. And what is better still, intelligent enthusiasm for its needs and extension is everywhere growing. The latest event in this propaganda, and a strong proof of the interest prevailing, is the approval lately given by the Papal Nuncio, Most Rev. Archbishop Ragonesi, to the project of the Archbishop of Zaragoza, to hold a monthly collection in all the churches of Spain to further the cause of the press. These collections were to begin this month. In addition to this, Archbishop Ragonesi has directed a circular letter to all the Metropolitans, in which after expressing the pleasure which the proposal of the Archbishop of Zaragoza caused him, he points out the advantages accruing from a concerted action in every diocese in Spain. He then calls attention to the "Legionaries" or "Promoters" of a pure press, and recommends that they should be encouraged and their numbers increased. He advises that the monthly collection should be put in charge of some zealous priest. The letter ends with an appreciation of the importance of good papers, and draws attention to the earnest desire of the Holy Father, who, like Pius X and Leo XIII, sees in the press one of the most important means to combat error.

Señor La Cierva, formerly Home Secretary in the Maura Cabinet, has ever been a puzzle in Spanish politics. In his recent speech at Murcia, he seems to have expressed his views a little more plainly than usual. He has made one thing evident, the unjust and illegal conduct of paid and official agents in the recent general elections. The method of procedure, according to Señor La Cierva, was simply to destroy the votes of whole districts and to substitute for them others already prepared. He again asserts that he cannot and will not belong to any faction of the Conservative Party, because one section opposes another and he will not oppose any Conservative faction. In Parliament he will work for economic reform, but only with his own followers. He stands for the nationalization of railways, for "preparedness," and for the peaceful colonization of Morocco. His methods and striking personality may recall to some the characteristics of one or two of our well-known American statesmen.

La Cierva's Politics

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Witness of Oliver Twist

IN the recent attack on the private child-caring institutions of New York, the experiences of Oliver Twist supplied the pamphleteers and the journalists with a classical reference that has been employed with unwearying repetition. "Worse than 'Oliver Twist'" is the stock phrase that is understood to describe the extreme limit of ill-treatment. There is a peculiarly relevant lesson in Dickens' great novel which the controversialists have apparently overlooked. Private child-caring institutions are vilified to make a case for the exclusive guardianship of the dependent child by the State.

Now it happens that the very institution which supplies the pamphleteers with their supreme illustration of what is reprehensible in the treatment of children was a State institution; and that the cruelties and inhumanities which Dickens satirized were not mere isolated abuses, but part and parcel of the established State system of public relief.

The problem of State relief versus private charity is coming to the front. The trend of opinion among secular philanthropists in this country is in favor of a State system, as was shown, for example, by the National Conference of Charities and Corrections held recently at Indianapolis. It is worth while, therefore, to learn something of the experiences of the only great country that has given a thorough trial to the policy of making the relief of the poor a State function. That country is England, and the history of the English Poor Law is perhaps the most instructive study to which any secular philanthropist could be recommended. The peculiar vices to which State action is prone, and which constitute one of the fundamental arguments against Socialism, there receive their fullest exemplification. We need not say anything of the "Old Poor Law," the system prevailing prior to the reform of 1834, because that system always receives the condemnation it merits from every writer who mentions it. The "New Poor Law" is more to our purpose, because its history is not so well-known, and it is commonly assumed to have represented an enlightened and successful policy. The truth is that the New Poor Law was no less bad than the old, though in a different way. The evil of the old system was the pauperization it produced, bringing the whole nation to the verge of bankruptcy; indeed, many of the parish communities were carried over the verge. The Reform of 1834 was designed not to make better provision for the poor, but to reduce pauperism, which in the minds of the reformers meant to reduce relief.

Two basic principles for the administration of legal relief were then laid down: one was the principle of "relief for destitution only" and the other was the principle of "less eligibility." The first principle meant that destitution, and not mere poverty, must be proved in an applicant before he had a right to claim relief; the second principle meant that the treatment accorded to dependents must be such as to make their condition less eligible, less desirable, than the condition of the poorest persons outside the Poor Law. The argument for this principle was that if the paupers were better treated than the poorest class of self-supporting laborers, the latter would prefer to become paupers. The administration of the Poor Law was to be deterrent, it was to prevent people from becoming paupers by making the condition of a pauper well-nigh unendurable. The Reform of 1834 succeeded in its object. It did cause an enormous reduction of pauperism, but the saving of public money was attained by the sacrifice of human lives. Dickens was one of the insurgents against the callous utilitarianism dominant in his day, and the first four chapters of "Oliver Twist" are a fierce satire on the principles and practice of the reformed Poor Law. This is how Dickens speaks of the reformers in the second chapter of "Oliver":

> The members of the Board were very sage, deep, philosophical men; and when they came to turn their attention to the workhouse, they found out at once, what ordinary folks would never have discovered, the poor people liked it. It was a regular place of public entertainment for the poorer classes; a tavern where there was nothing to pay; a public breakfast, dinner, tea and supper all the year round; a brick and mortar elysium, where it was all play and no work. "O-ho," said the Board, looking very knowing, "we are the fellows to set this to rights; we'll stop it all in no time." So they established the rule, that all the poor people should have the alternative, for they would compel nobody, not they, of being starved by a gradual process in the house, or by a quick one out of it. . . . For the first six months after Oliver Twist was removed, the system was in full operation. It was rather expensive at first, in consequence of the increase in the undertaker's bill, and the necessity of taking in the clothes of all the paupers, which fluttered loosely on their wasted, shrunken forms, after a week or two's gruel. But the number of workhouse inmates got thin as well as the paupers; and the Board was in ecstasies.

Incredible as it seems, Dickens scarcely exaggerated. The inhumanities of the "less eligibility" policy were ruthlessly practised, until it was proved that the policy did not even save expense. The first abandonment of the principle of "less eligibility" was in the case of pauper children. It was found that by giving them a better education than other poor children then received, there was more prospect of getting them to a profitable trade, and thus making them self-supporting. The next thing found was that Poor Law institutions were periodically in the grip of infectious diseases, and that, especially among the children, diseases of the eyes were endemic. As the paupers did not all die off quickly, but in many cases lived on in a chronically sick condition, it was deemed more economical to safeguard their health by applying better hygienic standards in the workhouse than prevailed in the least salubrious districts outside. Further, it was eventually found that in regard to the sick in the workhouse-hospitals it was cheaper to try to cure them as quickly as possible, than to prevent the patients from getting any excess of care or comfort, such as might make their lot seem enviable to the unpauperized poor outside.

Never in its whole history, from its beginning in the reign of Elizabeth to the present day, has the English system of State relief been anything but a mischievous thing, constantly amended but always remaining a failure. Not a single sociologist in England today regards it as anything but an unavoidable evil at best. It is in dealing with children that the State system most signally fails, and it may interest philanthropic experts in this country to know that of recent years the policy of English Poor Law authorities has been to take children from State Homes and board them out with private institutions, paying the latter sums ranging up to eleven shillings a week per child for maintenance.

Thus England is departing from her State system and turning to private agencies just at the time when certain factions in the United States are intent on crushing out private charities, and setting up the system which has proved so disastrous in the older country.

HENRY SOMERVILLE.

A College Indictment

A NEW book has been hurled at our colleges for the purpose of rousing them from their lethargy. It is alleged that they are teaching their men plain facts about everything except American life. They are failing to transmit to America's sons the soul of their sires, which was eminently the spirit of revolution. Religious revolt made the Mayflower sail; it was political revolt that affixed signatures to Thomas Jefferson's Fourth-of-July manuscript. Today social revolution is in order; but the eyelids of faculties are heavy. Why? Because, thinks Mr. Seymour Deming, it is policy for professors to nod on this subject. They depend upon capital for their salaries, and can expect nothing from championing the cause of labor except dismissal. Generally, institutions of learning are large corporations; they decline to preach revolution against themselves. This, of course, is well, for themselves, but, according to Mr. Deming, is a serious incapacitation to their students. Graduates are released from the hands of Alma Mater in tender innocence of the seething sea of American life, and with nothing to buoy them up, when they trip into it, but a beribboned roll of sheepskin. They have a yawning acquaintance with Euripides and Kant; they know nothing about the masses under their very eyes, that are growing blacker and surlier every day and, if not befittingly calmed, will cause the country to quake from Maine to California. Yet these callow and unsophisticated intellects are those to which the country must look for future leadership. How can the nation progress; they fill its chief positions and hold it back? No; our college men should be educated to face the world with nostrils aquiver with the spirit of change, and so on. And in such wise the specious plaint goes on in favor of Socialism.

But should there be a social revolution? The radicals themselves will admit that this is a sane and sober question; else they would not expend so much energy and earnestness in trying to answer it. But so long as it remains a question, why should the colleges be censured for not teaching it as a positive doctrine? This is certainly clear: that the country is groaning under social afflictions and that a remedy must be found. This certainly is dubious: that the glittering ungolden knife of Socialism should dash across our population and cut it to a clean level and equality. The colleges teach the former necessity; they have no right to urge the latter speculation.

Besides, economic professors are far from being the fossils that the latest remarks about them would indicate. They are quite alive to the questions of the day; sometimes too much so, witness the recent celebrated case of Scott Nearing. That they so infrequently become inflated with the heat of enthusiasm and float away into Utopia, may be due to their good cool reasoning. It is possible that they have prudence and stamina enough to keep from sinning in the name of progress. They are not blown about by every wind of social doctrine, but stand firm, piercing the gloom for truth and ready to travel in its direction when the path thereunto is opened up. Colleges should not be the seats of social cranks; they should diffuse the light of truth through the land, not exhale the sparks of sedition. The genius who loses his head at the contemplation of the woes of the nation, is hardly the one to right those wrongs; much less to mold the thoughts of young men. It is the social scientist who quietly conducts his investigation, quietly considers the results, quietly seeks the remedy and quietly proceeds to apply it, that should be acclaimed as the people's friend. Opposite conduct indicates amateurs, sentimentalists, enthusiasts; an abundance of whom, in the sphere of economics, our colleges happily do not possess.

To the good of social science and the shame of ourselves, we have become aware that every twelfth corpse in New York City arrives at the Potter's Field or the dissecting table. But is this any reason for rank Socialism? Hardly. It strikes the normal professor of economics that an old-age and sick-insurance provision, such as obtains in the "Fatherland," would be a more expedite and less tumultuous specific.

We know that three-fourths of our laborers receive less than twelve dollars a week. It is a modern miracle that families subsist as often as they do on such incomes; it is sadly easy to understand why they degenerate. What the average department-store wage of six-and-a-half dollars a week means to the virtue and happiness of young girls adrift in the city, may be conjectured. But is all this a reason for teachers to unfurl the banner of rebellion? On the contrary, they perceive that the solution of the problem is a minimum-wage law. Happily nine States have passed such wise legislation; the colleges might help inspire the residue to do the same. This would not be revolt against the old order but sensible effort to abolish its abuses; a teaching to capitalists of the good old virtue and ultimate profit of fairness and a sensible non-inflammatory exposé to working-men of their real, in contradistinction to their imaginary, rights. Such a dignified measure is worthy of learned professors and intelligent pupils. But a wholesale slaughter of the existing order and a throwing of fiery brands into the masses can be deemed patriotic and productive of good only by the radical, who imagines twice as much as he thinks and thinks half as much as he feels.

We know that our country is strewn with the human wrecks of industry, that public institutions are too inadequate to attend to all of them, and that the burden of taxpayers is being constantly increased. But is Socialism the means to brush away these sorry conditions? Not clearly. It appears that the workman's compensation law will be a far more timely and effectual sweeper. Thirty States have already adopted this to their satisfaction. Surely this indicates that the gray matter of our country is not being steeped in the waters of Lethe, and that our college faculties, which so largely influence public opinion, are not all lolling in the land of the lotus.

Six millions of our women do the work of men, under unsanitary conditions too. What this means to the children of tomorrow, is gloomily obvious. But to our consolation and confidence, twenty-four States have already passed mothers' pension laws; the others may be induced by the intellects among us to follow suit.

With such plain and commendable steps in the right direction, who will be pessimistic enough to assert that America is not even beginning to solve her problems? Is it at all right that professors who make important social investigations and exhortations and educate scholars to do the same, should be denounced as guilty of supineness or of a greater desire to pinch pennies than to recognize the needs of the day, simply because they refuse to be out-and-out Socialists?

The necessity of national improvement is not, as Mr. Deming would have it, synonymous with the need of social revolution. A mighty national gyration might just as well bring us backward as forward, or leave us precisely at the point of discord where we already are. Our real desire is to progress, not to pirouette. Let us not be deluded by the fact that sometimes in the past revolution and progress were concomitants; the combination was accidental. Professors are to be praised for not canonizing a social doctrine of chance.

The great force for improvement is public opinion. The more it is Christianized, the more it will be humanized, the sooner will it settle our social problems by aiding the perverse will of man and thereby inspiring the enactment of equitable and ameliorative laws. Not Socialism, which subverts the present order, but Christianity, which perfects it, is our country's present need. If, with so little of the old doctrine of Christ in American life, we have accomplished much for the betterment of our society, how much more we might effect if we possessed the precious dispensation in all its fulness! Though colleges are to be esteemed for not yielding immoderately to the extravagant social ideas of present-day materialists, they might well be criticized for deferring to their extravagant scientific opinions. By following precipitately modern theories of the universe, they are leading our young men, in whose hands the future of our nation rests, from Christianity. And in proportion as true religion departs, the rumbles of an approaching storm grow louder. We shall simply have to invoke the tempest-soothing Voice sooner or later. Why not sooner?

Our teachers behold France, chastened with sorrow, kneeling in supplication to the erstwhile Repudiated One. Do we need sorrow to be chastened? Are the sinister results of positivistic doctrine so dim that it should still be taught from rostrums?

If indeed, as Mr. Deming opines, the nostrils of our students should be treated to revolutionary saltpeter, let professors give it to them and plenty of it; but let it be of a religious rather than a social brand; let the revolt be against the godlessness of the day; let the object be the placing of the Rock of Ages back in its proper place. Then America may look forward to calm sunshine instead of lurid lightning-flash. When the Kingdom of God is first sought, all things are added.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Catholic Lawyers and Reading

I STRENUOUSLY object to being deemed an alarmist. I am not one at all. I am taking the situation at its face value and the proof of my contention is to be found in the daily paper. We are today facing a most disturbing condition of affairs in almost every phase of life. Our ideas, our conceptions of fundamental principles are attacked by the "newer thought." This would lead us to adopt immoral standards for the accepted and Divinely-given precepts that are world-old. Politically, the trend of our legislation is veering toward Socialism; and religious bigotry, the least subtle danger of all, has of late raised its crass, snaky locks and shaken them more violently than ever. It is not so much a question of the existence of these evils as an adequate preparedness on our part to combat them. Inasmuch as we are quite convinced that they do exist, it is rather a waste of time to argue gravely over their existence, and meanwhile to neglect entirely the more pressing demand for forces to meet them.

The first thought a person has in discussing preparedness in things military concerns the number and the equipment of the standing army in existence. It is with a somewhat similar idea in mind that one surveys the field and takes total of the standing army of Catholic laymen. It is our Catholic laymen upon whom the brunt of the contest largely falls, and it is, therefore, our Catholic laymen who must prepare if they are not properly prepared at present. Particularizing still more, it is respectfully submitted that it is to Catholic professional men to whom we must turn as to a trained standing army. For he, if any one, is qualified to take a place among the "regulars."

By reason of his training and the breadth of experience and sympathy which the wide scope of his endeavors opens to him, the standing of the lawyer is altogether unique. He is in a position to lead, and usually does lead, in all matters of public interest. His voice is accepted as that of an authoritative commentator on almost every question of public interest. Thus he frames more than others public opinion. It is not, therefore, at all unreasonable to suggest that our first line of defense and offense should be our Catholic lawyers. To them the Church has a right to look not only to scent danger and provide for it, but to take a prudent initiative.

In a battle of brains preparedness is as important as in a battle of strength and steel. Are Catholic lawyers properly prepared? Proper preparation means constant reading and study, constant looking to the guns, constant watchfulness that the armor be ever shining.

It is some months since a friend of mine did his best to spoil a dinner for me by painting the terrible waste of time of which I had been guilty in confining my literary grazing in the past two or three years to fields of professional pertinence. It was, therefore, quite apropos for me to inquire of some of my lawyer friends just how much reading lawyers do in these latter days of alleged progress in everything under the sun. One well-known New England lawyer expressed the consensus of opinion by saying, "The lawyer who reads a solid book, interesting from a purely intellectual point of view, is rare." I think that this is true. Some of the older school have kept up and re-read the classics of their college days. One well-known jurist confesses to a fondness for military history and has read all that has been written on the Civil War, and most of what has been written on the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. The average lawyer of standing, however, apart from matters pertaining to cases with which he is connected, reads to greater or less extent books bearing upon matters of professional interest, and the development and trend of legal thought. Aside from what we may term "reading shop," lawyers do not turn to books in serious mood but rather simply for diversion, and in doing so confine themselves to the very lightest and frothiest of fiction. I do not submit this as a guess, but as the opinion of men who have been members of the bar for years, and who speak not from mere hearsay but from certain knowledge.

In defense of the profession it is only fair to say that, without reference to the pressing requirements of such cases as he may have in hand, the reading which a lawyer must do, in order to keep up with the trend of legal thought and the vast number of decisions constantly being handed down, is staggering. A New York attorney, for example, must run through, at least in cursory fashion, a couple of hundred pages of recent decisions in the State courts alone every week. To have his equipment properly up-to-date he must go beyond that and at least take a bird's-eye view of the legal thought of the nation at large. Hence, except during the vacation time, a lawyer active in his profession confines himself rather closely to subjects intimately connected with his daily work. Indeed the mental and physical exhaustion incident to his practice makes it extremely difficult for him to delve into other serious fields, even when he has the inclination to do so.

It is hardly a hazarded suggestion, therefore, that the answer to the question, What do lawyers read? is that lawyers read practically nothing at all, outside of professional matters, and what is true of lawyers in general is exactly true of Catholic lawyers. Returning to my earlier thoughts in this paper, it is clear that we must reach but one conclusion. There is need of trained minds to combat the unethical ideas which surcharge modern thought. There is need of men capable of challenging Socialism with a mental equipment worthy of that foe. There is need of informed men who can refute bigoted attacks upon the Church and insidious attempts by her enemies to injure her in ways familiar by reason of their recent occurrence. There is no body of laymen in the Church so able and so enthusiastic in the protection, defense and prosecution of rights as the members of the bar. There is nothing that needs protection, defense and prosecution today more than simple Christian ethics, more than the ordinary fundamental ideas of property and liberty within reason, more than the Church herself. The Catholic lawyer is willing to do his part, but he is not prepared. He cannot be prepared until he appreciates the situation and is willing to undertake the mental preparedness that is essential to what can only be considered plain duty. What do lawyers read? Very little. What should lawyers read? The answer, by reason of the multifold necessities that confront us, would be encyclopedic. But each should do his individual best. The lawyers have been in the past the leaders in the community. Theirs are trained minds and they it is who will continue to lead in the future.

Granting that this entails added labor and personal sacrifice, it is nevertheless such a pressing duty that further discussion of this phase of the question would amount to a discussion of the axiomatic. The realization of our needs and the fact that the average Catholic lawyer reads practically nothing at all make for us premises leading to but one conclusion. The services of our Catholic lawyers are needed but they must prepare in order to render them effectively.

A Catholic member of the bench of a Southern State characterizes outside reading for the Catholic lawyer as a duty, that he may "know how to keep Christ in the law." But his duty goes beyond that, for he is an apostle in even wider fields and for even broader endeavors.

EDWARD KELLY HANLON.

Saying My Prayers in Latin

"LEARN to sing great songs like Credo and Veni Creator in a great tongue like Latin," writes Father McNabb in the striking little set of directions wherewith he points the pilgrim along the "way to medievalism." Latin is indeed a great tongue to sing in, and a great tongue in which to pray. Those of us who were altar boys learned this unconsciously while serving Mass and assisting at Vespers. We lisped in Latin at first; gradually we came to use it piously, with spiritual profit. And with some of us the habit has endured.

Is it considering too curiously to wonder why a Latin Pater Noster yields more comfort than an English Our Father, and why an Ave Maria seems more prayerful than a Hail Mary? Perhaps it is. Yet the fancy is pleasant and persists. Though there be no more merit in a Salve Regina than in a Hail Holy Queen, one may be pardoned for confessing the preference. Latin will not take us to heaven, but there are many who speak it there. There is satisfaction in the thought that one is praying as Jerome prayed, and Augustine. Their fervor is beyond us, but we may follow them closely through their formal devotions.

We are not asked to suspend our admiration for good Latinity whilst we are engaged in the solemn business of prayer. There is a literary excellence in the great prayers as in the great hymns; and if it be a distraction to dwell on it a little, doubtless it is a minor weakness. Who can recite the Salve Regina without valuing the music of its phrases, the insinuating grace of its appeal? The great prayers were not worded carelessly, and to me the Salve Regina is one of the greatest. It was not poverty of language which caused the use of dulcedo and dulcis so close together. For the Salve Regina is compact of sweetness. That Eia ergo has a fragrance which the English words could not imprison. It is irresistible. It is as though a little child plucked pleadingly and with a smile at his mother's dress. There is another phrase in this prayer which I never cease to admire: illos tuos misericordes oculos. Only those who love the savor of good Latin appreciate the suavity of that illos tuos. It is as though we had taken a liberty in saying Eia ergo, and sought to atone with a little extra politeness.

The Latin of the Mass is full of these felicities of style, this verbal dignity. There are those who speak of "Church Latin" and imply a reproach; but it seems to me that your love of Latin is neither deep nor Catholic unless you enjoy this Latin of the Mass as well as the Latin of the Augustans. There is style here and form no less than in an eclogue of Vergil or an oration of Cicero. The Mass is a drama which mounts steadily to its climax, and the Latin mounts with it. The musician in the choir understands this better than the worshiper in the pew; unless the worshiper has the habit of reading the Ordo Missæ.

That reading is a never-ending delight. I gave it up once for a compilation of Latin prayers translated principally from the liturgy of St. John Chrysostom. The superlatives and the Oriental ornament of phraseology soon sent me back to it. Here are many "great songs," as Father McNabb so justly terms them —not Credo alone but also Confiteor and Gloria and Lavabo and Vere Dignum and Communicantes and Nobis Quoque Peccatoribus, to say nothing of any number of little songs, the lyric cries of the great Sacrifice. Have we all our favorites among these? I confess a special liking for the Munda Cor Meum and the Suscipe, Sancte Pater and the Suscipiat Dominus, although this last is a knotty piece of Latinity, the altar boy's pons asinorum. But there is one little prayer in the Mass which above all others puts upon me a curious charm. It is the Memento for the Dead which ends with the words: Qui nos præcesserunt cum signo fidei, et dormiunt in somno pacis. I know of nothing which affects me in quite the same way except certain lines on purgatory in "The Dream of Gerontius."

EDWARD F. O'DAY.

A Triumph in Stained Glass

EVERY one interested in medieval stained glass would do well to visit the new Church of St. Agnes, Euclid Avenue and Eighty-first Street, Cleveland, Ohio. The edifice is destined to become a hallowed spot of artistic pilgrimage. With scarcely half-a-dozen exceptions, there is not a Catholic church in America where the glass can at all approach the excellence there attained. Indeed, it is not unworthy of comparison with that found in some of the ancient French and English cathedrals, whose glass is still the wonder and admiration of the world.

The Catholic churches of the United States are desecrated with caricatures of stained glass. For centuries a blight has been put upon the great art of glass-making, until it has well-nigh perished from the earth. Go where we will throughout the length and breadth of this fair land, we will see the selfsame catalogue windows, the same insipid Madonnas, the same feminized saints, the same baby-doll countenances, the same monotonous and perpetually repeated designs, the same stereotyped attitudes, without life, without interest, without individuality, without character.

The glass at Cleveland merits attention and study simply because its makers, possessing the instinct of genius and true creative power, knew the boundaries of their art. They did not trespass its frontiers, but kept well within its confines. They did not set out to rival Raphael or Veronese by giving us vast reaches of perspective, nor did they attempt to make the glass the most important feature of the building. There is not a single window in the church in which we find realism displayed, or natural forms copied, or natural colors imitated.

Although the Cleveland windows did not cost a great amount of money, yet they are grandly conceived, nobly expressed, and they flash back fire from every side, because they accord with every basic law of the exquisite art of glass-making. By so doing, they separate St. Agnes's Church as if by an abyss from practically every other Catholic church in America. A stained-glass window is simply a piece of colored or translucent decoration. It must never give a description or tell a story, or fade away into a distant perspective, however lovely. It should be treated in a flat, formal and conventional manner, without any attempt whatever at modeling. That belongs to another art, to other craftsmen, and to other media. There must be no great sheets of glass modeled into flowing drapery, no wind-blown veils, no enchanting scenery. Furthermore, each panel in the window must be a unit, and its figures must not reach out beyond the dimensions of that panel; that is, there must be no outstretched arms, interrupted by mullions, no recumbent figures cut into segments and occupying several compartments of a window.

Too often we lose sight of the fundamental purpose of a stained-glass window. In its historical significance, it is not an opening in the wall, but a portion of the wall itself. The window is not an end in itself, but merely a means to that end. Originally, the stone tracery was pierced by a small opening, and this opening was then filled with colored glass. This was the birth of stained glass in the Orient long centuries ago. Hence the very essence of a stained-glass window is that it continues the structural surface of the wall; it must keep to its place, for that place is an honored one, hand-maiden though it be to surrounding architecture, which it embellishes so magnificently. Consequently, it must subordinate itself to architectural requirements. It must be planned and executed with a serious regard for its place as a component part in a great artistic whole. A stained-glass window is not the whole orchestra. It only plays a part, and it must keep to that part, and beat time in unison with the master mind, the architect; otherwise, the result will be a clashing discord, not a melodious symphony.

This is why a stained-glass window should be a mosaic of comparatively small pieces of glass, held together by strips of lead, of varying widths. The leads, the heirs of the iron bands of former days, are of quite as much importance as the glass, and great skill is required in their handling, for they punctuate and divide paragraphs of flame with lines of ink. The leads must not be minimized, or concealed, or reduced to invisible lines, as if they were a mere expedient or an inevitable misfortune, from which an escape was sought. They are of vital structural importance, and must be as carefully studied and as fully respected as the glass itself, for to the glowing colors of the quivering glass, they add a strength and vigor and an energy that would otherwise be lacking.

These are some of the fundamental laws governing genuine stained glass. They are not new, for they are to be found imbedded in every text-book on the subject, but they are briefly repeated here to indicate that the leaded glass windows in the new Church of St. Agnes, Cleveland, conform to every one of these laws, and the result, worthy of the best days of the Middle Ages, is well-nigh marvelous.

This article is not intended to describe the windows in detail. No third-hand account will do them justice. One must be present and feel the effect. The great northern rose, high up in the façade, twinkling with an almost barbaric burst of splendor, is the crowning glory of the edifice, with its amazing, deep, gem-like coloring. The tones are as rich and as soft as those of a Persian rug, and the black lead lines give a continual contrast to the unaccustomed dignity and refinement of this glowing labyrinth of translucent jewels. The windows in the nave and apse and clerestory flash out into the cool darkness like the glow of dying embers. No imperial robe could exceed the splendor of their sheer loveliness, with their sparkling greens and lordly violets, their royal purples and brilliant yellows. Where can we find such infinite variety, such a wide range of color, such sudden and harmonious contrasts, such fine restraint of tone? It would be difficult to parallel the glory of their deep, rippling, virginal blues, or to resist the imperious bugle cry of their resonant, dancing, gorgeous reds. Nowhere else in Cleveland, and in but few places in America, can one experience such a subtle sense of beauty as in their rich, sober, mysterious tones. They make one feel that he has wandered back into the forgotten centuries, and beholds once again the dusky hues and blazing colors of the great western rose at Chartres, or the far-famed lancets high up at Poitiers.

THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

The Sweet Girl Graduate

YES, it was all over now. She was home at last, a little tired after the day's excitement, a little frayed in nerves, but radiant and beautiful and wonderful. She sat down in the chair by the window, close to a little table on which a vase of roses stood. They were the choicest of June flowers, but as she sat there, pensive and quiet for the moment, it would be hard to believe that even they could rival the perfection of her beauty. Pensive and quiet, yes, that was just it, as she looked out across the water to the green hillside loveliness beyond. But it was not the water, and it was not the green-clad heights, that made her thoughtful and full of reverie. It was something else. Perhaps that roll of parchment beside the vase of roses could tell the story, the long white cylinder tied with blue ribbon. For it was Commencement Day, and it was all over now.

Only a few hours back, and she was the center of interest on the flower-laden platform. We had seen her enter with her classmates, all in fairest white, and watched them as they took their places in the half-circle, to look forth upon the admiring throng of guests with a quiet composure altogether unstudied. For all the world they resembled some of the fragile glories of Puvis de Chavannes, and it would evoke no subtle power of imagining to fancy them a frieze of a master, living in all the color and glow of a master's craft. For they were wonderful as Roman vestals gathered to hymn the song to the hearth goddess, lovely as Grecian maidens assembled in Arcadian days of yore to hear a poet chant the legends of fair Hellas. But it is always Arcady in June-time, and it is ever the maidens of Vesta, when the white-vestured graduates come forth to greet their friends.

It was only for a few, brief, fleeting moments that she sat there, glancing across the water. Very little could have happened in the world at which she gazed, or seemed to gaze. A little cloud crossed the sun, blown by an ambitious wind; a boat blew its siren horn and pushed up the stream; a sea-gull glided down from aloft and bathed her wings in the cool water; and ever the motor-cars whirred by on the road below. But in that short space, while the miraculous commonplace was acting its part, she remembered the entire content of the morning, her morning, which was such a priceless possession only a little while before. The memory of it, too, clung close to the actual fact, and it gave her something just short of reality, like a very vivid dream that one retraces in wakeful hours, the music, the flowers, the sea of faces in the audience, glad, joyous faces that had forgotten every care and anxiety, the addresses, the applause, the laughter and congratulations of mothers and fathers and friends.

She glanced from the river to the roses. How strange it all was. Yesterday she had been a schoolgirl, and today she was just a girl, with the school door closed behind her, and the precious school-days receding farther away with every thought she gave them. Yesterday she had been living for what each hour gave her, a gladsome, fairy life of seemingly eternal childhood; today she was a mortal, beginning to wonder, as mortals ever wonder, what was coming next. Tomorrow? Perchance that query wove itself in a nigh-subconscious way in her dreaming. Tomorrow—she might be grateful to the gods, perhaps, that she could not see to the long vistas of tomorrows that lead the way to the last syllable of recorded time.

But she had plans, fair counselings for herself and for all girl graduates of this lovely June-time. Was not her essay full of hope and optimism and forward-looking thoughts? Surely the audience had applauded her as she spoke, and there had been many there old enough to judge the value of her words.

"We stand at a juncture," she had said, "when a woman must do more than simply be a decorative effect in the household, or a continuous sweet chord of harmony. The feminists tell you that women have been mere violin solos long enough, and that they are tired of being passive landscape pictures, full of joy and sunlight, but signifying nothing; that it is woman's place to compete with man in the toil and moil of the day's work, for the applause and prizes of the world. Perhaps these thinkers are right; perhaps they are wrong; we girls who are finishing our school-life today do not know. It may be that we shall find out; it is possible that we shall not. But at all events, I feel, and we all feel, that the day has passed when the whole duty of a girl consists in looking pretty, in attending parties, and in never seeming tired. I do not mean by this that we must give up our teas and our dances; I mean that they must be incidental to life, and not life itself. We must be more than spectators of life, and we must be more, and do more, not in a random, haphazard way, but by taking thought, by premeditation. Our hearts have been trained to the right ideals, and the right sympathies, and the right motives; we must ever be keen and alert to weigh the scales between the good and the bad, the true and the spurious, the flawless and the faulty; we must ever follow the guidance of the inner light. What our work will be, we know not, but that there will be no idle souls we pledge our hearts and hands."

They had seemed to like it, she now reflected, all those mothers and fathers and friends; and she, who had been a child yesterday, and today was no longer a child, wondered if they had ever heard anything quite so ideal, or quite so sane and constructive.

These young graduates, fresh from school, would show the world the new order of womanhood; they would be feminine knights, ardent and full of derring-do, ready to cleanse the world of darkness and dreariness and deceit. They would not sit as idle virgins, with lamps untrimmed, waiting, waiting for what? They would learn to labor, and not to wait. The world was before them, and they before the world; the great adventure was about to begin; and they, who had been children but yesterday, and today had put away the toys of childhood, were eager for the quest.

Eager for the quest, indeed, even as June-time is eager for them. She is no dream-girl, this maiden of my meditations, no vision conjured up from futile imaginings, but your sister and mine, looking out on the world for the first time with woman's eyes. She is glad of life, glad of the years to come, glad of the golden glories that she believes are awaiting her. There is no room in her magical city for the shadow of sorrow. It may come even tomorrow, but there is none today, and her whole heart is a symphony of joy, whose notes ring blithely in the burden of a long Victura. She who is about to live sings her gladness to the world; nothing finer, nothing fairer, nothing braver can the world ever hear. And so, with her thoughts and her roses, we leave her, radiant and beautiful and wonderful.

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM, M.A.

Catholic Landmarks of Pittsburgh

THERE are few spots in western Pennsylvania richer in historical interest than the site of the rude fortification at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, from which sprang what is now the city of Pittsburgh. Here are enshrined the memories of fierce wars between savagery and civilization and between soldier of France and soldier of England. Above the bustle and smoke rise Pittsburgh's innumerable hills, once forest-clad, over which Catholic missionaries laboriously climbed on their toilsome apostolic journeys. These same hills bear today abundant evidence of Catholicism. How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that preacheth salvation! Let us take our stand on Duquesne Heights, the crest of one of its many steep cliffs. There in the shadow of the Church of St. Mary of the Mount, one of the most conspicuous in the city, we see spread out before us in every direction an enchanting panorama. The Cross crowns the summit of the city's seventeen hills, and on all sides the eye is confronted with ancient and modern Catholic landmarks. At our feet stood the old French Fort Duquesne. It was here, within the limits of the stockade, in a chapel bearing the name of "The Assumption of the Virgin of the Beautiful River," that, 162 years ago, Father Denys Baron, chaplain of the French forces, offered up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for the first time on the spot where now stands the city of Pittsburgh. The forest primeval was the sacred spot, the stately oaks with their soaring branches and wide-spreading arches was his cathedral, the flowers sent up their perfume as incense, and instead of a deep organ there was the music of the birds.

From this high point we look down into the very heart of the business district. In every section there is ground sacred to Catholics. The first parochial school in the diocese stood at the corner of Webster and Chatham Streets, adjoining the present Sisters of Mercy Home for Working Girls. The first hospital in the city was opened by the Sisters of Mercy in Stevenson Street; the first orphan asylum was located in lower Penn Avenue; the first college was erected on Wylie Avenue, in the "Hump District," and has since been succeeded by Duquesne University, one of the most striking landmarks of the city.

Enthroned upon the crest of a hill is the Mother House of the Sisters of Mercy. Pittsburgh was the first home of the Congregation in America, and their first convent was on Penn Avenue, now in the business district. It was by members of this community that practically all the other communities of the Congregation in this country were founded. There were seven Sisters in the little band that first crossed the Atlantic, but they were a distinguished company, two of them being cousins of Cardinal Wiseman, one a relative of Cardinal Cullen.

To the south, on the slope of another hill, is St. Paul's Monastery, the first foundation of the Passionist Congregation in America. It stands today as it has for many years, a source of comfort and consolation to numberless souls. The mere mention of this holy cloister brings up memories of the saintly Father Anthony, the founder and first superior of the Congregation in the New World, whose name is still in benediction among those who are of a former generation.

On another height to the north, still known as "Nunnery Hill," once stood the Convent of the Poor Clares, in the year 1828 the only convent of the Congregation in the United States. Farther east on still another sharp cliff, known as Troy Hill, is the Home of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd. This hill was the scene of the labors of Father Mollinger, whose fame as a healer spread through the United States and Canada a quarter of a century ago. On Troy Hill he erected a shrine in honor of St. Anthony, an object of pilgrimage to thousands. To the southeast, on still another elevation, is the convent of the Passionist nuns, the first and only community of the Congregation in this country.

The many thousands who pass daily through the Union Station do not realize that they are treading on holy ground, for here was the site of the first Catholic cemetery. Directly across from the Union Station once stood "old St. Patrick's," the first church of the diocese. For half a century after 1758 Pittsburgh had no resident pastor, and the spiritual needs of the Catholics, who comprised a few scattered families, were ministered to by missionaries, among whom were Bishop Flaget of Bardstown, Kentucky, and Prince Gallitzin.

Not far from the Union Station are St. Philomena's Church and house, the scene of the labors of the Redemptorist Fathers, the first religious community in Pittsburgh, for they came to the city in 1839. The names of two of the saintly priests of this Congregation, Father Neumann, later Bishop of Philadelphia, and Father Seeles, are now placed on the list of candidates for canonization. The Western Hemisphere can now boast of only one canonized saint, but Pittsburgh hopes to see two of her zealous workers raised to the altar before many years have passed.

To those who know the history of the city there is no site more reminiscent of the past than the plot of ground on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Grant Street, for there old St. Paul's once stood. In 1843 the Rev. Michael O'Connor was made first Bishop of Pittsburgh, and St. Paul's became his Cathedral. Bishop O'Connor was in many respects an extraordinary man and he had an unusual career. As he knelt before the Pope to ask permission to become a Jesuit, the Pontiff replied: "Yes, but you shall be a bishop first." Nevertheless he later resigned his see and became a Jesuit, visiting Pittsburgh as a missionary. In 1851 old St. Paul's was destroyed by fire, and work was immediately begun on St. Paul's Cathedral, which stood until it was sold in 1903. It was a nursery of bishops, and no less than eight have been stationed there, as pastors or as assistants to pastors.

Did space permit, one might go on describing the growth of many other religious institutions in Pittsburgh and recounting the lives of its zealous workers. The Catholics of the city rejoice today in the memory of more than 150 years of work well done, and they review with pride the roll-call of Pittsburgh's many laborers in God's vineyard.

HELEN SCHMIDT.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

The Dependent Child

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The heartfelt gratitude and thanks of the entire Catholic community, not only of New York City, but of the country at large, are due in no small measure to AMERICA and its editors, for the manner in which they are laying bare the undercurrents of the Charities Investigation. From the beginning it was apparent to all fair-minded persons, of whatever creed, that "some one had blundered," but now the mask is off and the real situation is revealed in all its insidiousness. The movement had better be abandoned, because the secularization of our institutions will never be tolerated by the Catholics of the United States. Our people have given abundant proof of their loyalty to the Church by building and maintaining schools where the faith of their own children may be preserved; but not less precious in their eyes is the faith of the dependent children, those "least ones" of the flock of Christ, whose protection and care they consider a sacred trust imposed upon them by the Master Himself. From Him they have learned in what regard He holds His little ones. He tells us, "The poor you have always with you." "The poor have the Gospel preached to them." And who is poorer than the dependent child? The Catholics of this country have a bounden duty to safeguard the dependent child's faith, and this duty they will not shirk.

As for the capability of the devoted men and women who have in charge the physical and moral welfare of these children, there never was, and never will be a doubt. Nor has the time arrived when the Catholic Church must look for instruction to those outside her Fold "for the purpose of raising the moral standards" of her institutions. The Church has been engaged in "raising the moral standards" of the world for nineteen centuries, and will continue to do so until the end of time. It was precisely for this purpose that her Divine Founder instituted His Sacraments, and to these must be subordinated all other agencies of so-called moral uplift.

The question is asked in AMERICA for June 17: "Will this insidious attack upon the Faith of our children fail?" Emphatically, yes, it must fail. If "the answer depends upon the practical devotion of every Catholic in New York to the Church and to her maligned institutions," then it has failed, and every effort to take the Faith from the heart of the dependent child will be met by a counter-effort to implant it there more securely. This has been the history of the Church in the past, and there is no doubt that she will remain true to her traditions. There need be no fear then that the Catholic citizens of this country, for any consideration, will ever "lend their aid to the further spread of the kingdom of darkness."

Brooklyn, N. Y. ROSALIND X. SHIEL.

Pussyfooting

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In many of the large centers of this country Catholics measure up about as follows: fifty per cent protest, forty per cent aspiration, and ten per cent constructive work. It is to be expected that this calculation will meet with objection, and this to a certain extent will assist in proving its correctness, because the identity of the probable objectors is obvious. If consistent and persistent efforts were to be made, the percentage of waste represented by aspiration and protest could readily be resolved into constructive work, and it certainly would do no harm to charge up to protesting about ten per cent of our total effort. This would leave about ninety per cent of our efforts to the salutary and necessary work of self-capitalization.

Never in the history of this country have Catholics been better organized. In this respect at least we are models for other creeds. We see on all sides that sincerest form of flattery, imitation; and emulation on the part of other churches directly points to the absolute need of continued effort and work, along what might be termed the same lines, but in a different direction. We have been extending our activities, and very profitably too. Is it not time that we began to do some intensive work? We can do it, and the call has sounded. Trade may be coarse, it may be vulgar, and leaders with temperamental natures warn us not to dissipate our varied gifts in the crass work of money-making, but an examination of our moral, mental and physical makeup reveals the fact that we also have capacity for leadership in things commercial. Our rights and our destiny both demand that we cease being hewers of wood and drawers of water and that we turn a deaf ear to the siren voice of politics.

Let any one who doubts these statements make careful, quiet investigation for himself. The effort will repay him, and will bring him some surprises, more or less disagreeable, according to the degree of his interest in the question. Some one has said that only about one per cent of the total population of this great country does any independent thinking. A frightful indictment, if figures can be produced to support it. Color is given to the accusation by observing the life around us, and if every thinking reader of your paper would resolve to do some necessary independent thinking about material things, it would not be a great while before the Catholics of this country would be ninety per cent efficient in the matter of their material welfare. We need the improvement; we appreciate its dire necessity; if we will, we can.

Dorchester, Mass. JAMES D. RUSSELL.

A Mythical Ordinance

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue for June 10 there was an article on "Catholic Landmarks in Cincinnati." Among the statements made was the following:

> The first settlers of Cincinnati were chiefly Presbyterians, and their hatred of the Church stamped their conduct in the framing of an ordinance, which forbade the building of a Catholic place of worship within the confines of the town.

This statement has no foundation in fact, so far as any original documentary evidence can show. Some fifteen years ago I had occasion to prepare a paper on "Early Cincinnati." Having heard this statement many times, I gave the matter a systematic investigation, looking up the old ordinances and the newspapers of the period, especially the files of the newspaper that contained the call for the meeting at Michael Scott's house.

The explanation of the selection of the site, in Northern Liberties, is simply this, that inasmuch as the Catholics were scattered throughout the county, a church located outside the city limits would be more convenient than one within the city itself. I could find nothing further, nor has the alleged ordinance ever been referred to, nor can it be found in any of the compilations.

It would be difficult to imagine how, with the Ordinance of 1787, the Constitution of the United States and the Ohio Constitution of 1801 in existence, all of which documents provide for religious liberty, any such ordinance could have been passed, however narrow some of the inhabitants might have been. This item has been given wide circulation. The "Catholic Encyclopedia" repeats it in its article on Cincinnati, and doubtless many more publications have given it circulation. In the interest of historical truth, some effort should be made to stay its course.

Cincinnati. W. F. Fox.

Fray Junipero's Habit

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I trust I may be pardoned if I venture to draw attention, although it is perhaps late to do so, to a minor inexactitude which appeared in AMERICA for October 2, 1915. In his interesting account of the Franciscan pilgrimage in California, in the article on Padre Fray Junipero Serra, Mr. Michael Williams says: "Most of the pilgrims were members of the Third Order of Saint Francis, and the Fathers of that Order accompanied the pilgrimage, wearing the brown, corded robes, as did their predecessors in the days gone by." Padre Fray Junipero Serra did not wear a brown habit, which is the one adopted by the Leonine Union of the Friars Minor. He wore the blue habit, characteristic of the Observantine Friars Minor of Mexico, to which branch of the Franciscan family he belonged. I may mention that during my residence in Mexico City I lived opposite the church and former convent of San Fernando, from which "Seraphic and Apostolic College" Fray Junipero set forth and obtained his coadjutors, and I am most interested in all that pertains to matters connected with my Seraphic Father's spiritual children.

Quito, Ecuador. LUCIEN J. JEROME, III O.S.F.

An Error Corrected

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reading Father C. C. Martindale's biography of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson I have discovered an error which, it seems to me, is worth pointing out, and which Mr. Shane Leslie, in his very remarkable review of the volume in your columns, apparently did not notice. Father Martindale states that the late Father Tyrrell wrote "The Church and the Future" under the pseudonym of Ernest Engels. He is certainly mistaken in this. The pseudonym used by Father Tyrrell in that particular instance was Hilaire Bourdon.

New York. LOUIS H. WETMORE.

Vacation Schools

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Can we not do something to make more universal throughout the country a movement which seems to be meeting with some success in St. Louis? I refer to the "Association of Vacation Schools." During the summer months our parochial schools lie idle, barring the time required for the necessary repairs which must be done after the wear and tear of the year. Could they not be used throughout the hot months for our poor children? Surely we need some place for our waifs at this season of distressing heat. The Protestants are each year taking larger and larger numbers of our city children to the country during the summer. It is to be feared that among them many of our Catholic children are to be found. Evidently a sojourn in the winning environment that Protestant wealth can provide cannot be helpful to their faith. Can we not do something to save them from such temptations which of course must be very alluring both to parents, especially foreigners, and to the children? Cannot our schools be thrown open to the poor, and have we not devoted men and women enough to make sacrifices, and look after our Catholic poor at this time? As a general rule the schools with their playgrounds would afford room for recreation and for some respite at least from the heat and suffering which the children experience too often in the small rooms of their contracted homes.

By their ingenuity, zeal and self-sacrifice our pastors can surely invent not only recreations for the little ones but some useful employment such as sewing, perhaps too some little reading in common, possibly some instruction in Christian Doctrine. We owe it to our Catholic children to try by every means to save them from the allurement of the Protestant outings, and also to relieve them as much as possible from the intense sufferings which they must endure during the hot months. A movement of this kind, I am persuaded, could not but be very salutary both for health and for faith. Any little expense connected with it would be gladly borne by an appeal to the more charitably disposed in our congregations. It does not seem right that our large, cool and roomy school-buildings, built mainly by the contributions of the poor, should be bolted and barred during the sizzling months of July and August, while our little ones swelter and melt in the narrow, hot tenements in which they live, or in the scarcely less torrid streets.

New York. GEORGE HARTLEY.

Another Historical Myth?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The statement, said to have been made by John Quincy Adams at the placing of the corner-stone of the Cincinnati Astronomical Observatory, November 10, 1843, to the effect that the "Popish" cross should never be planted on the summit of Mt. Adams, seems to be without historical foundation. The story, which is referred to in Miss Minogue's article in the issue of AMERICA for June 10, has been told so often, that it seems worth while calling attention to the fact that it lacks foundation. The lengthy address of Adams was printed in Cincinnati in 1843, by Shepard & Co., under the title: "An Oration Delivered before the Cincinnati Astronomical Society on the Occasion of Laying the Corner Stone of an Astronomical Observatory on the 10th of November, 1843, by John Quincy Adams." There is no mention in the entire seventy-page pamphlet of the supposed utterance. The oration is an outline of the history of astronomy. The only statement that might possibly be suggestive of bigotry is the reference made by Adams to the treatment of Galileo by the Roman Congregation.

Washington, D. C. RAYMOND PAYNE, S.T.L.

Not Talk but Work

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The way to resume is to resume," said a politician when there was question of how to resume specie payment. This was my thought when I read the repeated plans for organizing and the appeals for funds to finance a "Legion of Defense," "Social Work," "Federation of Societies," and similar enterprises. There is too much talk and too little work, too much of schemes and too little of accomplishment. Organization is good when there is something to organize; but just as it is the small, fibrous rootlets that keep the tree alive, so it is individual local efforts that are effective in moral uplift, social service or defense of Catholicism. The principal object of conventions should not be to pass resolutions, but to show what has been done, and to thunder on every ear the question: What has your parish or diocese done? It is not to foster vainglory that the world should know which places are working and which are shirking.

Baraboo, Wis. J. T. DURWARD.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Forty New York Immortals

FORTY citizens of New York, modest creatures who shrink from public gaze and newspaper notoriety, recently wrote to Mayor Mitchel about the Charities Investigation. Forthwith his Honor, who had been "consulted" about the letter, sent it to the papers which promptly did their noble duty by publishing the document. It is well they did so, for citizens now have another illustration of the nature of the press campaign that is being carried on in behalf of a broken idol and a lost cause.

The first paragraph of the document is worthy of a pensive Mariana who, confined in a moated grange far from madding politicians, has just "heard the news," and, being unaccustomed to discrimination, has mixed it up. That accomplished, there are set down these following statements which are worthy of comment:

(1.) We think it important to express our belief in the principle that the city government is charged with the duty of insisting that all private charitable institutions to which public moneys are paid to defray the expense of caring for the city's child-wards be required to conform to proper standards of cleanliness, nourishment and care of those children, prescribed by the public authorities. . . .

That's a splendid principle; everybody believes it, even those who are not "noted citizens." But why did the forty immortals write it down? Do they mean to say that Catholic charitable institutions have not conformed to such standards? If so, they are hereby challenged to prove their statement. If not, they are reminded that a false insinuation is unworthy of one gentleman, much more of forty immortals.

(2.) We condemn the attempt of any and all representatives of such private institutions . . . to interfere with the impartial and thorough application of that principle. . . .

This is excellent too; everybody agrees to it. But why did the forty immortals write it down? Do they mean to say that representatives of Catholic institutions attempted the aforesaid interference? If so, they are challenged to prove the assertion. If not, they are reminded that a false insinuation is not in keeping with their high estate.

(3.) We especially deplore the attempt of a certain group of persons interested in some of these institutions to force the appearance of an issue on this subject between the Catholic Church as a whole and the civil government of the city.

Excellent again! But why did the forty immortals write it down? Do they mean to say that certain groups connected with Catholic institutions, and not Mayor Mitchel himself, attempted to force the appearance of such an issue? If so, they are challenged to prove the proposition. If not, they are reminded that a false insinuation is vulgar, to say the least.

(4) In our opinion the attempt of anyone, claiming to represent a religious organization, to obscure the issue by an appeal to sectarian prejudices deserves emphatic condemnation.

The forty demure immortals got mixed here, once again. They meant to write: In our opinion the attempt of the chief executive officer of the metropolis to obscure the issue by an appeal to popular prejudices deserves emphatic condemnation.

That is a fitting climax to the immortal document of the forty immortals. Everybody approves it. But of what avail all this? Are the Mayor and Kingsbury and Hotchkiss right? If so, cannot commissions and committees and courts vindicate them? If not, do Wickersham, Choate, Gary, Schiff and all the other immortals of the unblessed litany intend "to try" the case in the public prints, thus hoping to cripple the hand of justice?

The Freedom of the Press

SPEAKING before the National Editorial Association at its thirty-fifth convention, Mr. Lee J. Rountree, in the annual presidential address, said among other things: "The freedom of the press knows no North or no South; it knows no East or West. Where there is no fraternity or freedom of the press, there is no liberty, only tyranny." He declared that the curtailing of this freedom is responsible for the European war:

It is my deliberate judgment that had the newspapers of Continental Europe been allowed by the royal censors to tell the truth, or even a substantial part of it, the dastardly and inhuman conflict would not now be a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night on the world's horizon.

No one is likely to quarrel with Mr. Rountree for his championship of a sane freedom of the press. It is a right guaranteed by the laws of our country and one that is exercised, though not always wisely, almost without legal restriction. All the same, the editor is at fault in contrasting so unfavorably the official censorship of Continental Europe with the boasted liberty allowed in Great Britain and the United States. There is a censorship among us which is no less powerful than that to which our continental brethren are subjected, a censorship which few of our editors are brave enough to disregard, public opinion. The tyranny of public opinion is no less a tyranny than that of legislative restriction, and submission to it is all the more inglorious because it is wholly voluntary.

The newspapers of the United States, and the magazines as well, with a few exceptions which are so uncommon as to stand out as things apart, pander to the wishes of the people. They do not intend to form public opinion, they cater to it. They keep their fingers on the pulse of the nation and give "the people what they desire." They are afraid to insist on sound principles consistently, to refute error disinterestedly, to tell unpalatable truth unreservedly. They are the thralls of patronage; they are slaves to subscribers and advertisers; they truckle to their readers. And although they are perfectly aware that the ethics of journalism demands that they should publish only such news as is fit to print, they open their columns only too often to items that are sensational, indecent and scandalous. No attack on religion or morality is too bold to be refused a welcome in their pages. Most emphatically journalism has a North and a South, an East and a West; but unfortunately they are often points in the land of darkness. The President of the National Editorial Association would have spoken more practically had he raised his voice in protest against this domestic tyranny, the tyranny of cowardice, the subservience to greed for wealth, the contemptible sacrifice of principle for gain. Nor was Mr. Josephus Daniels expressing the sense of the better portion of our population, in fact he was departing from the clear dictates of the natural law, when he solemnly told the same association that the first duty of any editor is to "print all the news. He has no business to deny his readers reports of everything that touches mankind." The Secretary of the Navy wants "no expurgated newspaper." It is, of course, a truism that there is no accounting for tastes, but there is comfort in the thought that the country is not accustomed to take this ex-editor's pronouncements too seriously.

Nuns, Newspapers and the Restaurants

NEW YORK seems decidedly unfortunate in the character of its investigators. As if the recent Charities Investigation were not evidence enough, additional proof has been furnished by the Health Department which has been "investigating" the city's restaurants. According to an indignant editorial in the New York World, an establishment was rated "bad," if it did not furnish an individual towel for every employee. As a result, of 181 restaurants, including many of the largest in the metropolis, only one was found to be "good." Of the rest, 175 were "bad," and five were "fair."

Perhaps these restaurants were bad, but so is the reputation of the typical municipal Paul Pry. Of one establishment, Paul reported that "water from mildewed, leaky pipes dropped into simmering pots on the stove." Dr. Alfred W. McCann of the Globe, promptly camped on the trail of this charge. He found (1) that the pipes were not mildewed, (2) that they were not leaky, (3) that the stove was covered by an iron hood, through which not even water from leaky, mildewed pipes could drop. Whereupon he remarked that a certain city official had been guilty of "a lie, an indecent lie, an ignoble lie, an abominable lie."

Interesting as all this is, still more interesting are the action of the Health Commissioner and the attitude of the New York press. The Health Commissioner suddenly removed the chief investigator, on the ground that the matter was getting too much undesirable publicity. The New York World gravely remarked that "after all, it is the food and the way it is served, and not a crack in the ceiling that is of most importance." Other journals followed suit. The Times solemnly warned the public against panic. "The probability is," said the Times, "that in most of the restaurants, the handling of the food is better and safer than it is in the homes of the patrons." One restaurant in particular, exclaimed the Globe, had not been "inspected." "It had been raided." And the chorus swelled. The investigation was creating "a false impression."

Possibly the Health Department's investigators were indiscreet, inaccurate. If so, the city authorities and the watchful press promptly squelched the inaccuracy and indiscretion. But no one remembers any similar action on the part either of the newspapers, or of the municipal officers, in connection with the slanders spread broadcast during the Charities Investigation, although, to adopt the World's philosophy, "after all, it is the child, and the way it is cared for, and not a crack in the ceiling that is of the most importance." The conclusion seems plain. In New York a newspaper may say what it chooses against defenseless religious women and their little charges. But it must not say one word against the restaurants. The reason for the distinction is not written in Sanskrit. Nuns do not advertise. Restaurants do.

The Soldier

ANXIOUSLY awaiting orders to march, more than 12,000 National Guardsmen assembled in the New York City armories within twenty-four hours after the President had summoned the Militia to mobilize. The scenes enacted in the metropolis were reflected the country over, wherever the call to the Colors had sounded. There was very little shouting, but a calm business-like air pervaded the assembly that preceded entrainment for camp and possible war.

These men in khaki were from every walk of life. The business man, the clerk, the broker and the tradesman, the ignorant, and the educated, all united for a common purpose—to do their duty at their country's call. An hour before, their interests were diverse, their ambitions varied. At the bugle's blast, individual purposes were blended into the paramount interest, private aims melted into the Nation's aim. They were soldiers. A serious business was at hand. They were ready to do it, unpleasant as it might be. They did not speak of patriotism, they lived it. They had left desk and counter, not because they liked to do so, but because their country ordered it and being soldiers they obeyed. Some of them had tasted war in '98, and they knew it meant much more than a summer camp. Others were inexperienced youths, like the four million who wore the "Blue," in '61, before the age of twenty-three. Yet one and all rallied to the Flag, for they knew it was their duty.

The President's voice was the word of authority, and the word of authority calls for obedience, for it is the voice of God. And because these men of duty answered the Nation's summons, God's blessing will go with them, and a Godspeed from every good man and every noble woman in the land will follow them. We do not want war. But we want the honor of America held sacred and inviolate by every nation in the world. The prompt mobilization of the National Guard is America's message to the nations. It is patriotism energized into action.

A Comprehensive Prayer

"O God, make bad people good and good people nice," is the admirable prayer that a child in a recent novel used to offer every day. If that petition were granted without reserve, the earth would be an Eden, the Golden Age would return, sin would cease to be attractive and virtue would always be amiable. But now, alas! so fallen is the world, that often a winning personality robs vice of ugliness, human imperfections obscure the beauty of holiness, and arrogant pretense triumphs over modest worth. This was the sad spectacle that made Shakespeare call for "restful death," so tired was he of beholding:

> . . . Desert a beggar born,
> And needy nothing trimmed in jollity,
> And purest faith unhappily forsworn, . . .
> And right perfection wrongfully disgraced,
> And strength by limping sway disabled,
> And art made tongue-tied by authority,
> And folly, doctor-like, controlling skill,
> And simple truth miscalled simplicity,
> And captive Good attending captain Ill.

Without question, much could be done toward securing the desired answer to the first part of little Sally's prayer, and more "bad people" would become "good," if "good people" would only make greater efforts to be "nice." Piety should be amiable, and true Catholic piety, because it is so cheerful, sensible and practical, is always amiable. But the Novatian, the Jansenist, the Puritan, or whatever the rigorist of the age was called, invented a dour, inhuman and unworkable "virtue" which he misnamed piety, but which differs as widely from real piety as pinchbeck differs from gold. In the Ages of Faith, Christians were no less "merry" than pious; the Catholics of our day besides being "good" should also be "nice."

Winona's Enterprising Catholics

THOUGH Winona, Minnesota, is not a large town, it seems to possess a remarkably enterprising and well-organized Catholic population. This is evidenced, for example, in the far-reaching influence exerted by St. Teresa's College and by the Catholic Press Club, two wide-awake Winona institutions of which any city might be proud. The latest expression of the Club's zeal for the spread of Catholic literature is a five-cent pamphlet bearing the title "Are These Your Friends?" and containing information about "a few of the most representative Catholic magazines and newspapers published in the United States today." Then in answer to several other pertinent questions, the compilers of the pamphlet name the editors of our leading Catholic periodicals, give a list of prominent Catholic authors who are writing today, mention nearly fifty representative Catholic magazines and papers published in this country, call attention to the value of the "Catholic Encyclopedia" and end with practical suggestions as to how readers of the pamphlet, by organizing Catholic Press Days, Catholic Press Hours, Catholic Press Programs, Catholic Press Lectures, Catholic Press Exhibits and Catholic Press Circles, can make themselves and others better acquainted with our Catholic periodical literature.

This worthy movement, moreover, has nowhere been promoted with greater zeal than in St. Teresa's College. Last year an admirable Catholic Press Program was given there consisting of an address on "The Apostolate of the Press" by a member of the faculty, brief papers by the students on typical Catholic periodicals, and closing remarks by a prominent clergyman. With a view to stimulating interest in the history of the Church in the United States, St. Teresa's College is likewise offering fourteen one-hundred-dollar scholarships to the young women graduates of high schools and academies who write the best one-thousand-word essay on the first bishop of the ecclesiastical province from which the candidate applies.

The means Winona Catholics are using to awaken interest in the history of the Church in this country, and to make Catholics appreciate practically the value of our periodical press, could be imitated with profit by the Catholics of other American cities and towns. It is with the young, moreover, that the work should begin. If the boys and girls who now fill our high schools and academies, if the youths and maidens who attend our colleges, can only be taught to read intelligently our representative Catholic periodicals and to enjoy the writings of our best authors, the future of the Catholic press in this country is secure.

LITERATURE

XXIX—Francis Thompson

"WHY indeed should it be that the poets who have written for us poetry richest in skiey grain, most free from admixture with the duller thing of earth, are the very poets whose lives are among the saddest records in literature?" As we read this we can almost see in imagination the frayed sleeve of a shabby coat nervously pushed through the open door of an editorial sanctum. The hand was Francis Thompson's and it held "The Hound of Heaven" a masterpiece of modern literature.

Thompson was one of those poets who, while he lived with men, still dwelt among the untrodden ways of the land of vision. "The earth he treads is to him a star, vibrating with radiance. He feels the stellar light breaking beneath his feet, through all its rocky crust; he hears its planetary song, star to star across the holy gulfs of space. He is lonely, and yet never alone, homeless and yet strangely at home." Poetry had made of Thompson her confidant, whispering many of her inmost secrets into his musical ear, and Thompson was as impotent to suppress the burning truths with which he had been trusted as is the sea to pause in its ceaseless roar.

Thompson was truly Catholic and hence it is that he has presented Catholic truth in language burning with inspiration and the noblest of art; for what else is literature but "the living utterance of a man's inmost soul caught up into the emotion which some visioned truth excites in the soul of the seer"? For Thompson was "a seer and singer of rare genius." And why should it not have been so? His was that true faith which is born in the heart of the Catholic babe and is nurtured by the warmth of the true Catholic home. Thompson's faith was instinctive and he was powerless to remain silent. He of all English poets has sung of the true Catholic spirit such songs as never before were heard. Indeed one of the striking qualities of his poetry is his reverence for things unseen; unseen with the eye of sense, but blazing with brightness to the eye of faith. His was a spirit which caught Nature's sweet harmonies fresh from the hand of Him who first made chaos ring with the music of the spheres. Hence it is that the personality of the singer is felt throughout his works, and realizing this we are not surprised at the gorgeous imagery with which he framed his songs, for he told only of what was in his soul.

Such a personality was it which has sung in the immortal verse of "The Hound of Heaven," the story of the loving Master following after the soul fleeing before, which vainly seeks in earthly love the happiness it yearns for. When at last all human hopes are vain, the fugitive submits to his Divine Hunter who speaks in accents of tenderest forgiving love:

> All which I took from thee I did but take,
> Not for thy harms,
> But just that thou might'st seek it in My arms.
> All which thy child's mistake
> Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at home:
> Rise, clasp My hand, and come!

This poem profoundly stirred the literary world. It was hailed as one of the greatest odes in our language. The deep thought that pervades the entire poem, the brilliant imagery in almost every line, the deep knowledge of the human heart that it discloses, and the deep love of the Master running through it all, holds the reader almost spellbound. Surely "'The Hound of Heaven' fingers all the stops of the spirit—but under all, the still sad music of humanity."

Thompson's imagination was ever seeking an outlet for the images with which it was seething, "to give vent to the thoughts that craved language birth." No one but Thompson could have written in the "Orient Ode:"

> Lo in the sanctuaried East,
> Day, a dedicated priest
> In all his robes pontifical exprest,
> Lifteth slowly, lifteth sweetly,
> From out its Orient tabernacle drawn,
> Yon orbèd Sacrament confest
> Which sprinkles benediction through the dawn.

The sun likened to the Sacred Host, the sky the monstrance, day the priest; surely this is the height of "devout audacity."

But lest it be thought that Thompson could sing only of visioned sights, we must remember that he was preeminently the poet of childhood, the rightful successor of Blake and Patmore. His songs of childhood possess that tender simplicity and sweet sincerity so characteristic of children. For Thompson himself was ever a child. One who met him just before his death remarked in him the "sancta simplicitas of the true poet and real child." "Know you what it is to be a child? It is to have a spirit yet streaming with the waters of Baptism." He was ever playing, even to the end, with his great toy of imagination whereby this world became to him a box of toys. It was this that made him "dabble his fingers in the day-fall, made him gold-dusty with tumbling amid the stars." He tells his godchild to "Look for me in the nurseries of heaven." Through all his works that childlike spontaneity is apparent. For who but a "real child" could thus address the Babe of Bethlehem?

> Little Jesus, wast Thou shy
> Once, and just so small as I?
> And what did it feel like to be
> Out of heaven, and just like me? . . .
> Hadst Thou ever any toys,
> Like us little girls and boys? . . .
> And did Thy Mother at the night
> Kiss Thee, and fold the clothes in right?
> And didst Thou feel quite right in bed,
> Kissed, and sweet, and Thy prayers said?

What more natural, more childlike! And still it is real poetry. Thompson had early learned the necessary lesson that "we must stoop to the child" if we would understand childhood. And it was this rare faculty which made him beloved of his children friends. This was the secret of his success—he could feel and realize that though "children's griefs are little, so is the child, so is its endurance." Indeed an important lesson some moderns might learn from Thompson is his reverence for childhood.

The strange personality of the singer pervades his songs, and at times it is a sense of loneliness, even of sadness. However there is a vast difference between the hopeless songs of Shelley and Thompson's cry of faith under all his wanderings. Take the exquisite lines in "Daisy," for example:

> The fairest things have fleetest ends,
> Their scent survives their close;
> But the rose's scent is bitterness
> To him that loved the rose. . . .
>
> Nothing begins, and nothing ends,
> That is not paid with moan;
> For we are born in other's pain
> And perish in our own.

But Thompson was not only a poet, for "it might almost be erected into a rule that a great poet is, if he pleases, also a master of prose. Indeed there is manifest reason why a poet should have command over that 'other harmony of prose.'" And Thompson was pleased to show himself a "master of prose." Though we may say that his essays, with the exception of "Shelley," fail to reach the artistic heights of his poetry, nevertheless throughout his prose-compositions are evidenced those very qualities which have won for him the poet's laurel. Of the Shelley essay, "the greatest literary contribution to pure letters in English during the last twenty years," he himself says: "It is written at an almost incessant level of poetic prose and seethes with imagery like my poetry itself." Listen, for instance, to his all-embracing plea for the straying child, poesy:

> This beautiful, wild, feline poetry, wild because left to range the wilds, restore to the hearth of your charity, shelter under the rafter of your Faith; discipline her to the sweet restraints of your household, feed her with the meat from your table, soften her with the amity of your children; tame her, fondle her, cherish her, you will no longer then need to flee her. Suffer her to wanton, suffer her to play, so she play round the foot of the Cross!"

And there 'neath "the foot of the Cross," did Thompson make "sanctity and song" grow together. Thompson was the "poet of the return to God." The essay "In Darkest England," which is a review of General Booth's book, exhibits the powers of the master-critic, for therein Thompson has combined keen criticism with consummate literary skill. Having vividly portrayed the brilliant section of London, with it he contrasts:

> A region—is it not rather another universe? A region whose hedgerows have set to brick, whose soil is chilled to stone; where flowers are sold and women, where the men wither and the stars; whose streets to me on the most glittering days are black. . . . Misery cries out to me from the kerb-stone, despair passes me by in the ways; I discern limbs laden with fetters impalpable, but not imponderable; I hear the shaking of invisible lashes; I see men dabbled with their own oozing life.

It was only such a master as Thompson who could portray these contrasting scenes in their true light, for he had known by sad experience the awfulness of the scenes "of that life which is not a life." Hence did he exert his every power in this essay to rouse to arms the Catholic army, the Franciscan Tertiaries. "Sound to the militia of Assisi that the enemy is about them, that they must take the field."

Of an entirely different type is "Paganism, Old and New," in which "it was sought to expose the fallacy of searching for love of beauty and sweetness in the pagan mythology." Thompson believed that the ancient Paganism possessed only a soulless beauty, that it was only the advent of Christianity which gave to the world that true beauty which is exemplified in the "Madonna and a greater than the Madonna." In Francis Thompson's single volume of essays will also be found the beautiful "Mœstitiæ Encomium," wherein he says "a world without joy were more tolerable than a world without sorrow. Without sorrow where was brotherliness?" and "Finis Coronat Opus" together with the well-known essay on "Health and Holiness." Throughout all of this author's works is evident the absence of that fault of so many moderns, "the predominance of art over inspiration, of body over soul." To him language was but the channel, the means of expressing his inmost thoughts. Artist that he was, however, he chose the best means at his command.

Such are the masterpieces one may find within the volumes of Francis Thompson's treasures of poetry and prose: rich, imaginative, but above all, Catholic. He can scarcely be called a popular poet, but to those who have opened his books, what a treasure-house is unlocked!

> The chambers in the house of dreams
> Are fed with so divine an air,
> That time's hoar wings grow young therein
> And they who walk there are most fair.

ALOYSIUS J. HOGAN, S.J.

REVIEWS

Filibusters and Financiers. By WILLIAM O. SCROGGS, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This book, by the Professor of Economics and Sociology in the Louisiana State University, is the story of William Walker and his associates. We are all familiar enough with Walker's name, but how many of us know anything more than the name? Professor Scroggs, therefore, has put those who take an interest in American activities in Mexico and Central America under an obligation. "Thou shalt not covet" is a precept of both natural and revealed law: the forgetting of the precept gives occasion to many evils of which one is filibustering. But there are filibusters and filibusters, those who go abroad and those who stay at home. To the former, danger and often death; to the latter, not infrequently, the fruits. If all that Professor Scroggs tells of the rivalry between the Vanderbilts and the Garrisons and of its connection with Walker's Nicaraguan career be true, and there is no reason to judge otherwise, the reviewer thinks better of the "little pigs who went to market" than of "the little pigs who stayed at home."

Professor Scroggs holds that Walker was the last of American filibusters. Though the opinion is not altogether indisputable, the reviewer is not going to dispute it. But in adding the limiting term "American" he knew what he was about. Quoting the London Times, always virtuous in word, on Walker's collapse in Nicaragua, Professor Scroggs remarks: "Fine words, these, from a nation which owes its beginnings to buccaneering expeditions of Viking and Norman, and its mastery of the seas to the buccaneers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Yea, the Jameson raid in the Transvaal is still fresh in the memories of men." He might have said more to the point, that, when the Times was taking such a high moral tone regarding Walker, Palmerston, the prince of stay-at-home filibusters, was in his heyday organizing his filibustering expeditions into the Kingdom of Naples and the other Italian States. Within three years, the Times approving cordially, Englishmen were to be enlisted openly in London to serve under Garibaldi, and all England was to go wild over that filibuster and his associates, not the least famous of whom was "Garibaldi's Englishman," Peard. But in the case of Nicaragua "British interests were involved," which made all the difference; and the action of an English naval officer in bringing about Walker's sad end seems to have been not exactly chivalrous.

Walker was a graduate of the University of Nashville, and from this Professor Scroggs takes occasion to depreciate the American Universities of the early nineteenth century. Yet this must be said to their praise: Their graduates wrote good English, the fruit of fair classical studies, something the modern university professor does not do always. There are far worse writers in American Universities than Professor Scroggs, but his language might be purer. He speaks more than once of "Walker's ranking officers," meaning his subordinates of the higher grades; the expression really means officers of a higher rank than Walker. He shows an inordinate attachment to the ugly word "governmental"; but this is venial compared with "to install steamships on the Pacific." When electricians misuse the word "install," we can pity them in patience: a professor should not look for like tolerance. Neither should he speak of "the prayer pro tempore pestilentiæ." The Roman Missal does not pretend to classical Latinity, but even the Mass-book does not fall into such a barbarism. Lastly, it is not good taste to use the language of Holy Scripture in flippant narrations of the doings of such people as filibusters. Professor Scroggs may say he only follows the example of Professor Oman of Oxford; but in more things than one Professor Oman is not a safe guide.

H. W.

Saint Catherine of Siena: Her Life and Times. By C. M. ANTONY. Edited by Fr. BEDE JARRETT, O.P. With a Preface by Fr. THOMAS M. SCHWERTNER, O.P. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.80.

Though we already have the scholarly monograph of Mr.

Edmund Gardner on this renowned fourteenth-century mystic, and Theodosia Drane's admirable biography of the Saint is a Dominican classic, the present volume is none the less welcome, for the author undertakes to tell the general reader the story of the Popolana's remarkable achievements and wonderful visions. Few saints have combined more perfectly than did Catherine of Siena the perfection of the contemplative with the fulness of the active life. She lived during one of the darkest periods in the Church's history and was the Providential means of bringing the Popes back to Rome. When the great schism began we find her on the side of the true Pope, imprudent and unattractive as he was, though multitudes of the Faithful, including a large proportion of St. Catherine's own Order, were giving their support to the amiable anti-pope.

But besides being a diplomat and a woman of affairs, this daughter of a Sienese dyer is one of the Church's greatest ecstatics. Particularly interesting is the author's account of the origin of the famous "Dialogue," a better title for which is "The Book of Mercy." On October 9, 1378, she went into an ecstasy after receiving Holy Communion, and during the next five days, for four or five hours daily, she dictated to a secretary the revelations she received. They were all taken down in such choice Tuscan that St. Catherine is now considered one of the foremost writers of the language. Catherine was called to heaven before peace was restored to the Church, but she never faltered for a moment in her belief that the schism would finally be healed. In her last letter to Urban VI, the legitimate successor of St. Peter, she exclaimed: "Take courage! Fear nothing! God will provide for this, as for everything, for He is the Protector and the Master of the Ship of the Church, and of your Holiness."

W. D.

Under the Apple-Trees. By JOHN BURROUGHS. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

This is a series of essays whose unique claim to publication in one book is that they were all thought of in the same place: "Under the Apple-Trees." Roughly, the papers fall into two classes, those dealing with natural history and those in which the author has ventured into the field of philosophy. For the former there is nothing but praise. Besides manifesting that extraordinary power of observation for which Mr. Burroughs is justly renowned, the papers on natural history themes are written in a simple, unpretentious style that is quite attractive. Had the author not seen fit to transgress this proper demesne of his, the book could be unreservedly recommended. But when the author becomes philosophical, he becomes not only uninteresting but unscientific as well.

Mr. Burroughs is uninteresting because it is so hard for his readers to know what he means. In the first place the author suffers from his fear of definitions and hence from obscurity. He has a latter-day proneness for ponderous generalities, and hence his plentiful lack of idea-bearing words. He is negative rather than positive, and asks his readers questions which he should answer himself. The author is unscientific principally because he takes for granted the theory of evolution. For science, if it means anything, implies demonstration wherever proof is required. Now, evolution is far from being a demonstrated fact. Nor can we admit, in the face of the philosophy of common sense, that the theory is self-evident. Had Mr. Burroughs, therefore, patiently and clearly given his reasons for the theory, instead of simply assuming it, as one would an axiomatic truth, had he answered a few of his own questions on Darwinism and explained Bergson's oft-cited élan vital, the author would, perhaps, have been saved from making statements like this: "Are we to look upon the universe as half-natural, half-supernatural; must it not be entirely one or the other to be a *uni*verse?"

The author remarks in his preface: "I am quite certain that the majority of my readers would have me always stick to natural history themes." Yes, indeed! Mr. Burroughs the naturalist in science we can accept, but not Mr. Burroughs the naturalistic philosopher.

G. D. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Here is the Bookman's latest list of "best sellers": "Just David," Porter; "Seventeen," Tarkington; "Nan of Music Mountain," Spearman; "Bars of Iron," Dell; "The Border Legion," Grey; and "Under the Country Sky," Richmond. These novels have already been noticed in AMERICA, and favorably too, with the exception of "The Border Legion," which is not fit to read. Everyone, however, can and should enjoy "Seventeen," for it is a merciless but faithful description of a boy's "calf-love" period. "Silly Billy," Jane, Genesis, Mrs. Baxter, George, Mr. Parcher and Miss Pratt are all true to life, and Mr. Tarkington's gift for describing ridiculous situations has a rich field for its exercise.

"The Soldier Boy" (Putnam, $0.75), by C. Lewis Hind, is a well-written little book containing fifteen sketches that are designed apparently to hearten and spiritualize the British volunteer. All the belligerents in this war are doubtless firmly persuaded that they are fighting for the cause of civilization and that the world's happiness hangs on their success. So it is not surprising that the author finds the Germans wearing "sacrilegious helmets," whereas "our" soldiers are "God-reverencing." Without question every combatant in the entrenched armies can profitably choose some warrior-saint as a "patron of chivalry." That will help to keep them brave and merciful soldiers and better fit them for a sudden death.

"Wild Animal Ways" (Doubleday, Page, $1.50) has to do with the great outdoors. A wild horse, a raccoon, a wild hog, a froward monkey, a faithful dog, and some wild geese are the central figures of entertaining chapters. "Atalapha, a Winged Brownie" will be found the best of the stories. The author's description of the bat's mating, and its race with the swallows is excellent. An instinctive love for wild live things pervades the book; no sentimental kindness is preached, but only a sensible regard for the interesting animals to the observation and study of which Mr. Seton has so well applied himself. A vigorous style suits the various sights in the volume, while the gentler incidents are marked by writing that is quite poetical in thought and appeal. There are 200 drawings by the author.—To boys who enjoy a story about warring Indians, and wild horses, and roaming buffaloes, in addition to the exploits of a picturesque hero, Everett T. Tomlinson's latest book, "Scouting with Kit Carson" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25), will doubtless prove very enjoyable, for narrow escapes crowd upon one another and the courage, perseverance and modesty of the hero are never overlooked.

The July Catholic World is a particularly readable number. It opens with Dr. Kerby's discerning study of the late Mr. Thomas M. Mulry's character, which is well summed up in this paragraph:

> Mr. Mulry was old-fashioned. To be simple is old-fashioned. To refuse to be misled by shallow ambitions, by short outlooks and aimless social rivalry, or to find home the fixed center of the world is old-fashioned. To shape life and guide affections by the eternal truths is old-fashioned. To peer unerringly beneath the accidents of life and live in the presence of its eternal laws is old-fashioned. To refuse to be cheated by the lesser joys of life and to steer one's way with a compass rectified by the hand of God is old-fashioned. In this way Mr. Mulry was old-fashioned. God gave him that surviving grace.

Brother Potamian contributes a good paper on Sir Isaac Newton, Blanche M. Kelly a study of "Hawker of Morwenstow,' an Anglican vicar and poet of Cornwall who became a Catholic shortly before he died in 1875. He wrote of the Sangreal the splendid lines:

> The selfsame Cup, wherein the faithful Wine
> Heard God, and was obedient unto Blood.

Monica M. Gardner makes "The Anonymous Poet of Poland," Sigmund Krasinski, known to American readers, Dr. Peter Guilday reviews Professor Meyer's "The Catholic Church under Elizabeth," Dr. Schumacher proves that Our Lord Himself was at times a "resistant," Dr. Shanahan writes on "The Originality of the Christian Doctrine of Life," and there are stories, poems and the usual departments besides.

Dr. John Rothwell Slater's "Freshman Rhetoric" (Heath) confines itself entirely to prose, and its twenty chapters range from letter-writing and note-taking to the use of a reference library and the interpretation of literature, and 700 original subjects are suggested for themes and essays. Because of his discursive style the author's explanation of the precepts is somewhat unwieldy and cumbersome, while much of the matter could have been left to high-school text-books. The multiplication and lengthy explanation of precepts in our present-day text-books on the writing of English is making the confused student detest what could easily be made likable. The author of "A Text-book for the Study of Poetry" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.00), favorably reviewed in our issue of August 2, 1913, should now prepare as good a book on writing English prose.——"The Ideal Catholic Third Reader" (Macmillan, $0.40), by a Sister of St. Joseph, presents an attractive selection of child literature. The religious element is insisted upon, though there is also an excellent collection of patriotic and nature stories. The book is well graded and contains valuable word-lists and phonetic drills.

Mr. Alfred Noyes, the editor of "A Book of Princeton Verse, 1916" (Princeton University Press, $1.25), considers the volume capable of holding its own with any contemporary anthology and warns the Oxford undergraduates to look to their laurels. The selections made are from verses written during the past six years and twenty-six authors are represented. Mr. Ainsworth O'Brien-Moore's "Iphigeneia" is a good specimen of the anthology's quality:

> My father sent a ship and men who cried:
> "Come, wed Achilles!" So I rose, and went,
> And came where they were gathered, at his tent.
> (Slowly the great ships swung upon the tide; > Ever the wind blew west-ward.) Laughing-eyed
> I sought my future lord, all innocent
> Of the grim spouse those stern-eyed chieftains meant.
> None spoke. Then, suddenly, I knew he lied.
> At first I wept a little, and besought—
> Being but young, and half-afraid to die—
> But when I saw my father's face, and heard
> His broken weeping, and moreover thought
> That no one of the kings did more than I,
> I kissed him twice, and knelt without a word.

Mr. Noyes remarks that "It is encouraging to find the younger men in an American university developing just those qualities of lucidity, order, and proportion which are the first essentials of literature, at the very moment when the older generations, both in Europe and America, seem ripe for chaos in both thought and form."

Now that summer visitors have begun to flit hither and yon, the prudent hostess should snip out, mount on a card and place in a corner of the spare-room mirror these stirring lines from the London Queen on "The Perfect Guest":

> She answered by return of post
> The invitation of her host.
> She caught the train she said she would,
> And changed at junctions as she should.
> She brought a light and smallish box
> And keys belonging to the locks.
> Food strange and rare she did not beg,
> But ate the homely scrambled egg.
> When offered luke-warm tea she drank it,
> She did not crave an extra blanket,
> Nor extra pillows for her head;
> She seemed to like the spare-room bed.
> She never came downstairs till ten.
> She brought her own self-filling pen,
> Nor once by look or word of blame
> Exposed her host to open shame.
> She left no little things behind
> Excepting grateful thoughts and kind.

Even the most troublesome and exacting guest cannot recite these verses daily without being the better for it. However inconsiderately she behaves in the home she first visits, her conduct is sure to improve as the season advances.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The America Press, New York:
A Campaign of Calumny: The New York Charities Investigation. $0.05; postpaid, $0.10, $5.00 a hundred; Perfect Contrition Easy. By H. C. Semple, S.J., $0.05, $3.00 a hundred.

D. Appleton & Co., New York:
The Cruise of The Jasper B. By Don Marquis. $1.30; Your Boy and His Training. By Edwin Puller. $1.50.

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
How One Church Went Through a War. By W. Spooner Smith. $1.00; Sermon Reading. By W. Spooner Smith. $1.00.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Roma, Ancient, Subterranean, and Modern Rome. In Word and Picture. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, With Preface by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, Parts XIV and XV. $0.35 each.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
Dante: How to Know Him. By Alfred M. Brooks. $1.25.

Catholic Alumni Sodality, Philadelphia:
Catalog of Catholic Books in the Free Library of Philadelphia.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Book of Saint Bernard on the Love of God. Edited with Translation and Notes by Edmund G. Gardner, M.A., Litt.D. $1.25; In Khaki for the King. By Escott Lynn, Six Illustrations by Norman Ault. $1.50; Phyllis McPhilemy. By May Baldwin. Four Illustrations by W. A. Cuthbertson. $1.50; The German Republic. By Walter Wellman. $1.00.

M. H. Gill & Son, Dublin:
Harmonics. A Pure Thought Sequence. Being Wreaths of Song from a Course of Divinity. By Rev. T. J. O'Mahony, D.D., D.C.L. 1s.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
For England. By H. Fielding-Hall. $1.50.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Chief Catholic Devotions. By Louis Boucard. Translated by W. B. Mitchell, M.A. $0.75; The Sodality of Our Lady: Historical Sketches. Compiled by Augustus Drive, S.J. $0.60.

Mitchell Kennerley, New York:
Songs of a Vagrom Angel. Written Down by Elsa Barker. $1.00.

John Lane Co., New York:
Louise and Barnavaux. By Pierre Mille. Illustrated by Helen McKie. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Philosophy of Bergson. By Gustavus Watts Cunningham, A.M., Ph.D. $1.25.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
The Prisoner. By Alice Brown. $1.50; The Human Boy and the War. By Eden Phillpotts. $1.25; An Introduction to the Study of Organized Labor in America. By George Gorham Groat, Ph.D. $1.75; Poverty and Social Progress. By Maurice Parmelee, Ph.D. $1.75.

Robert McBride & Co., New York:
A Dominie's Log. By A. S. Neill, M.A. $1.00.

John Murphy Company, Baltimore:
Essays on Catholic Life. By Thomas O'Hagan. $0.75.

Oxford University Press, New York:
The Mechanism of English Style. By Lewis Worthington Smith. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Ships in Port. By Lewis Worthington Smith. $1.25.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
A Retreat for Women in Business. In Fourteen Conferences. By Rev. J. A. McMullan, C.SS.R. $0.75.

Yale University Press, New Haven:
Community Drama and Pageantry. By Mary Porter Beegle and Jack Randall Crawford. $2.50.

EDUCATION

De la Salle and Popular Education

IN virtue of the charter given her by her Divine Founder, the Catholic Church is essentially an educator. "Go and teach all nations." Such was the command given her by Christ Himself, who, though veiling uncreated Wisdom and Truth in the homely garb of parable and story, was the greatest teacher the world has seen. Faithful to that mission, the Church has ever summoned the passing generations to listen to her message and to heed her warnings. Unlike the pagan philosophers, Aristotle, Plato or Seneca, she has not confined her teaching to the chosen few, to the cultured minds of an inner and exclusive circle, but, imitating her Master, she has stepped into the crowded thoroughfares of life, crossed the threshold of the poor, stooped over the toiler and the outcast and lavishly opened to them her inexhaustible stores of knowledge and truth. Auguste Comte, a thinker whom we can little suspect of any leaning toward her practices or dogmas, has written: "The Catholic Church has been the most powerful and efficient promoter of the popular development of the human intellect." Yet she is represented by her enemies as the enemy of popular education. The story of the life and work of St. John Baptist de la Salle is an eloquent refutation of the charge.

BLAZING A NEW PATH

The world pays insistent homage to the memory of such educators as Herbart, Froebel, Pestalozzi, Sturm, Basedow and Comenius. Even such a visionary and unsound master as Rousseau finds his admirers. It has too often forgotten the name and the service of one of the initiators, one of the safe and sure pathfinders in the tangled jungle of modern pedagogy, St. John Baptist de la Salle. Yet this humble priest is one of the great benefactors of the people. The sacred cause of popular education never had a more practical or more unselfish champion. His holy life, the Institute which he founded, the cohorts of devoted men whom his example and his rule have inspired to imitate his virtues, have been the source of blessings to thousands. A child of that seventeenth century which saw France at the very height of her power, he is one of the glories of his country and his age. The schools of the Christian Brothers which he founded and where his epoch-making methods were first tried, reflect more glory on his native land than the ephemeral and sterile victories of the great captains of his day.

STRONG AND PRACTICAL SAINT

John Baptist de la Salle was born at Reims in 1651 and died at Rouen in 1719. The story of this high-born and noble-minded priest is as simple as it is sublime. It can be summed up in these words: "He had compassion on the multitude." The man who, in the spirit of Christ, goes to the poor, is clothed with a radiance and a beauty all Divine, even though he stoops to their lowliness, while at the same time he is endowed with irresistible energy and power to accomplish great things. God had given La Salle a priestly soul, the heart of a child, the tenderness of a father, the noble and authoritative presence of a man born to command, a keen insight into the heart of the people and their needs, and one of those indomitable wills, so often found in the saints, which knows neither doubt nor fear and inevitably triumphs in the end. The founder of "The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools" is one of the world's practical educators. To prove it we need only recall that he mobilized and vitalized the methods of popular education prevailing in his day, that he is the founder of the normal school, that he standardized the simultaneous method, and that he gave to the teacher a position and a dignity which hitherto had been denied him.

POPULAR EDUCATION IN LA SALLE'S DAY

It must not be imagined that the Church then neglected popular education. A collection of decrees taken from the synodal statutes of the French dioceses during the seventeenth century and the early years of the eighteenth, and bearing on the necessity, the organization and programs of the primary school, would fill a goodly volume. The Councils of Toulouse, of Saint-Brieuc, of Agen, of Le Mans order archpriests, parish-priests and their assistants to build and maintain schools for the poor. And the cause of popular education found eloquent and effective advocates in bishops, priests and holy men. Vialart de Herse, Bishop of Châlons, calls schoolmasters "workmen absolutely necessary to the Church." Froullay de Tessé, Bishop of Coutances speaks of the "holy duty of the schoolmistress." The saintly De Nesmond, Bishop of Bayeux, who in some ways anticipated the pedagogic methods of La Salle, wrote "A Plan of Instruction for the People's Schools." Bishop de la Poype de Vertrieu composed a similar program for the schools of the diocese of Poitiers. Somewhat earlier, St. Peter Fourier had elaborated for Lorraine a complete program for the education of girls and had founded that admirable body of teachers, the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame. At Lyons, the holy priest Charles Démia founded schools for the poor children of the city and wrote to the échevins or aldermen a famous "Remonstrance," in which, with apostolic boldness, he vindicated the right of the people to an adequate education, and reminded the "City Fathers" of their duty to provide for it. The Jesuit missionary, Michel le Nobletz, venerable priests like Olier, Bourdoise, saints like Vincent de Paul had spoken in the same strain.

LA SALLE SYSTEMATIZES POPULAR EDUCATION

But in spite of all this generous movement, the best results had not been obtained for lack of system and of coordinated effort. La Salle realized that individual effort, no matter how generous, could not deal with a national problem. In 1682, he founded "The Brothers of the Christian Schools." In the long and glorious files of the names of Religious Orders, there is no other, perhaps, which evokes in the hearts of Catholics a similar sentiment of affection and love. A body of devoted teachers had thus been mustered. Effort was no longer individual. A concentration and mobilization of educational forces had begun.

THE SIMULTANEOUS METHOD

A pedagogical difficulty faced the founder. How teach the thousands of pupils who soon flocked to his schools? His practical judgment suggested the solution. He applied the "Simultaneous Method" on a large scale. Though the Jesuits had applied this method together with the "decurion" system in classical schools, and De Nesmond and St. Peter Fourier had plainly outlined its scope and utility in large classes, La Salle was the first to apply it on a broad and consistent scale to the purposes of popular education. One teacher, one lesson, one text-book, one task, one correction for all the pupils of a certain grade and capacity, at the same time, such was the simple, but epoch-making innovation introduced by the Saint. It seems almost incredible that the method was not devised earlier. On the day it was introduced, pedagogy took a great step forward. In his "Conduct of Christian Schools," the founder elaborated his principles more thoroughly. The book is a masterpiece of simple but sound pedagogy. "Later works on the same subject," says Matthew Arnold, "have little improved the precepts, while they entirely lack the unction."

TRAINING THE TEACHER

If the Simultaneous Method primarily affected the pupil, La Salle's second innovation directly affected the teacher. It is to his glory that the first normal school in the modern sense was founded by him at Reims in 1684, thirteen years before the Pietist, August Hermann Francke, organized his teachers' class at Halle, and fifty years before Hecker founded the first Prussian Normal School at Stettin. The idea of the normal school is to be found, at least in germ, in the old monasteries where the younger members of the teaching orders were trained for their life-work. In England, in 1581, Richard Mulcaster had suggested in his "Positions" the establishment of a seminary for the training of teachers. But the idea did not fully crystallize into action until La Salle founded his school at Reims.

John Baptist de la Salle gave popular education a definite outlook, a scientific method and form. Obvious and simple as his innovations are, they gave modern pedagogy an impulse and momentum almost incalculable. He dignified and ennobled the vocation of the schoolmaster. He had all the love of the child and of the poor, which burned in the heart of Froebel and Pestalozzi. He added to these the supernatural virtues which have made him a model of sanctity and heroism for all coming time. The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is a splendid monument which ever perpetuates his name and nobly carries on his work. The cause of Christian and popular education owes a debt of undying gratitude to John Baptist de la Salle and his devoted sons. JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

In Praise of Folly and Crime

IN two respects, the late Father Timothy Brosnahan, of the Society of Jesus, was a very odd person. He believed in the science of logic, and he did not like cold weather. In winter, the good man's second oddity was easily abated by a stove or some similar contrivance; in summer, by the rising temperature. But to the winter of his discontent, occasioned by the prior idiosyncrasy, there was no end. To the day of his untimely death, his preference for logic kept him fiercely disdainful of the mental anarchy which he saw in the philosophy of his generation.

FATHER BROSNAHAN'S LOGIC

